THIS VOLUME CONSISTS OF TWO PARTS

INTRODUCTION TO VOLUME THREE.

The scenes of this volume, as its title should indicate of the progress of the war to an unusual degree, with many adventures of the heroines, heroes and the like following enormous battles, disasters and also among a race of child slaves which accord to the lives they were forced to live, they contempt and cruel treatment they ought to have been free long before the enormous war calamity occurred. But for of them another and a better day will be dawning very soon, and great conflicts will bring on their freedom for every strife. Every influence of literature, of poetry and of art which even in the times of the present had become more and more in unison with the great master of chord of Christianity probably could not make any good descriptions of these scenes. I have here written as far as I was able, in unusually long details to make the scenes more striking, but even then even I have not succeeded in accomplishing what should have been done, as it is IMPOSSIBLE to describe them as they really are.

The poet, the painter and the artist, even if they were to seek this all out under the allurements of fiction or truth, could not have accomplished any more. As is observed in this volume the desolation of the war in every incomprehensible way is everywhere stretched out, rearing into abuses of child slaves, increasing wicked wrongs, redoubting distresses, and bringing the attention of the world to the horrors of disasters that were never heard of in real experiences and history, thus bringing the sympathies of the world to the lovely child-slaves, and of Abbelesia's cause. In this general war storm which is sweeping throughout the states of Calvernia and Angelina and others unhappy Calvernia last last is being succored in what way possible, and w Calvernia who was righteously responsible for the war, and who now lies bound and bleeding at the foot of wicked and haughty glandelinia, and imploring compassion a vain is being taken care of by Abbelesia but the heart of the dominant glandelinia who have been her conquerors, had at length been crushed, and glandelinia has seen that Abbelesia can protect the feeble against any mighty power. Thanks be to God when in volume ten the time comes when Glandelinia bows down to Abbelesia like a slave who begs pardon, and all horrors of child slavery will be at an end. The object of these descriptions in volume three is to awaken sympathy and feeling for the Abbelesian cause in behalf of the child slaves.

The terrible flood disasters, the awful conflicts, terrific explosions greater than the force of Volcanic eruptions, the floods which wipe out hundreds of thousands in a day show what glandelinia attempts to win a war that is so unjust and wicked in its cause. The glandelinians who practiced a system so cruel and unjust as to defeat and do away the good effects of all that can be attempted for them by the holiest of countries have been in the end frustrated by the Christian laws more than contending against her for the benefit of the little ones whom Christ loves more than grown ups. In writing this volume the author can sincerely disclaim any suspicions on the parts of others that he favors any such a foe, but things have to be written at times in the volume in such a way as to make it seem he is, when Abbelesia is his side.

There are accounts also in this volume of Christian spies, who we hope the reader can disclaim any invidious feelings toward them who often because it seems an only way to obtain the information they are after use child slaves as if as an only way to obtain the information they are looking for use child slaves as if they were the masters and are therefore forced to be involved in the trials and ordeals of the relations of such slavery. But one point is when an information has been obtained and the spy succeeds in escaping he takes the little slaves with him to the Christian lands where they are free. And no one knows more than these successful spies do what may be gathered of the evils of this kind of slavery and which is not half of what could be written of the unspeakable whole.

Therefore the incidents which are to be here related will appear in time through this volume! It is a comfort of hope, as so many of the horrors and wrongs have been witnessed that the accounts here are of fiction only and not of truth, and when the war in this story is over may the souls of the houses of bondage in glandelinia and elsewhere be to the child-slaves like the remembrance of Egypt to the Israelites a motive of thankfulness to God who had redeemed them. For while the nations contend, and armies are arrayed this way and that in unbelievable conflicts, and disasters beyond record breaking occur, let us all hope that such scenes will never occur in reality in the future to come.

The Author.
H.J. Dargatz.

Greatest flood in immemorial, long. Refuge problem acute, as nearly a million pile up at Big Girl Knoll for help. Water still rising, November 25th to 26th. Flood crisis near but Big Girl Knoll safe, while lower waters peril other sections. More levees are floated, New and greater districts freely inundated. Hundreds of thousands run to hill and mountains at break of levees. Twenty trains sent by Abbeville to aid flood relief. Emperor Vivian sends war chiefs to find out cause of disaster, and get prevention data.

This before he goes to command armies at Vivian Bl. Wickey. Levee danger spots which help levee guards on the lookout. Nine hundred thousand given small fox and typhoid serum. Biggest flood list of war so far.

Flood grips four thousand miles more in Calvernia and Angelinia State areas. Desolation appalling as Wickey Lewisin crevasses continues on. Count De Biff goes south on flood survey. Plans for flood is laid directly to Glandelinia government. The beginning of the Vivian Wickey series. The fatal battles of Lieghburg landing.

The city of big girl knool which has a normal population of nearly as many people as Chicago has up to this date of November the 25th since the early part of October when the flood began has received nine hundred and eighty two thousand nine hundred and ninety six refugees of the flood to shelter, clothe and feed in side the city; not counting the fifteen immense emergency camps established on the city limits by the Abbeinnian Red Cross, and still they come. And the city of Big Girl Knool where 22 is the stage of the flood on the government gauge now shows more than fifty eight feet of raging waters piling down from the surge surge surges surges to the north which had been overwhelmed by the Lake Sololia flood further northwest, and still it comes; and for this section of the country, it rains, and rains, and rains and still it rains, while up north it is freezing hard and a foot or two of snow has fallen. While this goes on Big Girl Knool reported that on the 24th of November the city saw the passage of one of the most violent thunderstorms in its whole history and a cloud burst of rain and the city was hoping that there would be a lowering of the flood. The crest of the very refugees may not be reached for weeks, and the city has been compelled to prepare whether they will house 100,000 more.

From the breach of the Wickly Lamsin Levee which was letting out most of the water and from other break in the Arenburgs Run River levee at North Bend on the plantat ion near Conservatory Run owned by Emperor Vivian which he used as his summer resort the water was rushing in a sea two hundred miles long and fifty miles wide, and rising six inches an hour. Thirty new towns were in the path of this new section of the flood, and if not yet touched will be flooded. All of the southeastern part of Angelina country, and the middle section as far south of Angeline junction was under water from the Lake Sololia disaster and the waters of Mio-Whirther too, and the situation in the very Arenburgs Run delta was more than a temporary emergency. The immense drives of people who have been driven out of this area had nothing but the clothes they were when they fled.
Without congressional appropriations for the financial rehabilitation of these unfor tunate the entire Arenburgs Run Delta must be evacuated.

According to the Head Abbeinnian department of agriculture the latest list of the areas now under water, not in the recent sections of floods, but in the new around Angeline Junction showed the following figures whether the reader believes it or not (all figures are in acres): Adolphia State 11,345,000 to 12,500,000 acres; Bastrop State 11,000,000 acres; Olandorn State, 23,456,000 acres; State of Vivian, Calco, and Caldwellian, and also Sololia and San Pedro 150,000,000 acres. Believe it or not let the reader guess how many miles this flood has already covered, including also the northwestern section of Angelina, and all of southern Calverinia, putting together also the 100,000,000 acres of the Lake Sololia flood? A small figure if he likes to say it, and whether these figures take no account of the situation in Armer State and Angeline vine to boot, where the crest of the flood has already arrived, and where no one knows what will happen in the future with the billion-dollar damage done when it does arrive, call them
The cost of seed and of grain feed, to put back crop on these flooded lands then and where they emerge from the flooded land will run to about three to four dollars an acre.
With the expenses to pay for the carrying on of the war, the seiges, and the throwing down of the rebellion, where in the world is the money coming from? Let the reader make his own guess. This is as good as mine. Calverinia surely faces a famine and famine and these figures don't be according to this story be dispute either as over thirty million acres had been flooded at the Arenburgs Run Delta alone, this area embracing all the delta lands in the state of Haldine.
In Armer State now completely under water (try and find the trees) where the city of Greenham is now completely under water, and where the town of Nadgo Evans sent 99,000 refugees to one camp, ninety eight per cent of all small craft were engaged in evacuating scores of thousands from the flooded area in the northwestern part of Armer State which so far was the hardest hit section the natural difficulties attending this work the rescuers were meeting without resistance from Clandelinians who in ambuscade tried to prevent them from rescuing those caught in the floods Reports to Count De Biff and national auto authorities were that many thousands of Count De Giff and his party arrived at Henrietta on the 26th, en route back to Angeline Agatha. In the state of Angeline vine alone 10,456 as miles have been flooded driving an million persons from their homes from Angeline Vine city and fifty thousand from the state, and no hundred and eighty six thousand were to refuge in upper floors or on rafts and eight thousand miles were to go before exhausting its terrible passing Angeline Vine and had four thousand miles were to go before every penny of the terrible power of destruction Count De Giff said. He appealed for every penny of the that they will remain safe. It is estimated that from four to six months would be surely required to estimate the 2,440,555 persons affected flooded districts, while the rescue fleets man-sections. In great torrents also had isolated and endangered forty refuge restoration allowed them to return to their homes in life. All the Red Cross relief workers were anxious to see from the national drive for funds. They must have money and provisions. This was the situation in but one of a number of flood refuge centers. And the whole responsibility rests upon the rebellion.

relief. The Senator acted to raise the national Abolitionian aid from $200,000 to $1,000,000. The Senator acted after listening to a report from Count de Biff, and giving a huge sum out of his own pocket. The Count reported that more than two hundred million million acres had been flooded, and more than three million persons made homeless. Count de Biff recommended doubling the one billion dollar quota. He also urged continued expenditures of money by the government departments.

alone who have been driven from their homes, and this number is being steadily increased daily as the refugees continue to spread out, thus inundating the country on each side of the river. Those refugees wearing food, shelter and clothing by the Abbeinnion had Government as the agent for the mighty Abbeinnion, and the burden of their care will have to continue for months. Because of the vastness of the inundation districts of the flood, the sum even already called for will not be enough additional. The Red Cross has to care for such huge numbers is making their own situation desperate and the numbers are being doubled, and the worst of the big flood has not reached all parts. In order that these millions of your homeless fellow citizens may continue to receive all the care necessary a sum of two billion dollars will not be even enough. It is therefore desired that the sum originally made it should be doubled if possible."

It is therefore desired that the now originally named person be removed as possible prior to the Superior's appeal. It was announced that it would be impossible for him to tour the flood swept districts as had been suggested because he was needed to supervise the salvage of Vivian Wickey for at least three months. In his report to the Superior Court De Biss said,

"The crest of the flood is still two weeks away from the outlet to the sea and further breaks in levees may occur if the money vandals are not watched. Therefore the full extent of the flood and the responsibilities it may involve for the whole nation cannot be known for fourteen days."

While flood waters rose, the bank water from the many ponds in the neighborhood of nine stations, that fact that the levee so close to Big Knool still remained firm and that the Grandmoulinians did not come to even attack it so far apparently had removed the danger from the Big City as well as other places including Henriette's various stations to the northwest and southwest however were reported, with many thousands more - made homeless and many hundreds of thousands in the paths of the new spread of the southern intensity of the flood ready to flee to the high ground and other places' refuge. Yet some slight improvement in the flood cent on conditions in the region of Argonne was noticed with the water so far apparently over, and all officials of the Red Cross were now turning their chief attention to sanitation, and to reestablish the homes the homes of the refugees after the flood waters receded, and the quick recede was hoped for before winter came on as December was not far away.

With the waters of the Mica River still rushing down into Concordia state, from the breaks in the embankments already described, the Arroyo de San Javier still still receiving its own share of the enormous flood waters, was literally pouring over its western bank at Blaine west of and a mild inundating another large stratum of water was that coming down from a section of the Lake Bolina disaster which had spread throughout the counties south and east of Angeline Junction and straddle Angeline cities and also toward Jennia. A special report of war correspondents was that Lucy and John Gates were also under water, with ten other counties threatened, and one hundred thousand refugees already flocking toward Jennie, Warner city and also Mingo gaps. The flood waters have already threatened Mingo, Grand city and its neighboring towns and the whole state impinging sixteen miles of the Mica, Blaine and Gordon railroad tracks above Angeline (then Angellina state) in Richmond district or parish the water was reported to be eighteen feet deep at Barbel, with Kate Junction entirely swept away, the agent way and Torpe threatened.

swept away and "torpedoes" water. The sum of the water was already going into the Mayfield state and that the lake Angeline the Angeline river was also in the path of the two big dikes knowing that if the flood would rush into this terrible enormous lake and start up it was an appalling disaster beyond comparison strenuous efforts beyond belief were being made by all the inhabitants of Angeline Junction and all states within radius the huge lake to throw up temporary dikes around that lake with the hope to change the course of the flood and make it flood into the Greenburg area further west and into the sea.

If this lake should receive all the flood waters it would burst its bounds and the scenes of the Lake Bellia error would be quadrupled if not made a hundred times worse. The flood from the overwhelmed sections of the Aronburgs and Conservatory gun rivers began moving slowly into the lake and the water was also engaged in forming levees the lake AND AS THE LAKE was in danger large forces were also engaged in forming levees there. The combined population of people fighting to prevent the water from flowing into the lake was about four hundred thousand including men women and children.

Catahoula State, adjoining Concordia also was feeling the forest of back waters while southward in Aveyellon families were obliged to flee from the north side of the state, when the flood reaching there rose to ten feet during the day.....

besides inundating rich fall crops lands own sugar and truck and all other kind of farm lands the water had invaded oil and gas sections and even coal mining regions both on Concordia and Aveyellon and gas sections and that the oil wells hundreds of them were all afloat because of the enemy making snouts of flames many hundreds of feet high, and the greatest clouds of black smoke ever heard of sent high in the sky and cover ed it so much that nearly fifty miles of country was in total darkness. To the south of this district engineers continued the directing of the levee constructions around the lake to the north first where the flood was approaching from, while additional inhabitants mostly men only were drafted from other towns to fight the forest fires raging with increased fury since the Lake Bellia disaster.

Preparations for the citizens of this flooded country side was discussed at a meeting during the time at Angelina, gathia and prompt measures were to be taken to save the disaster stopped for with all bureaus giving out their warnings about the serious ness of the situation that would be presented between Angelina, gathia, and Angeline nees of the flood crest moved down past Angeline Junction threatening to go into the lake large armies of citizens of all sects and ages continued work topping and strengthening the levees in that section. General newleaves were reported to be in danger because of glandelinians threatening to mine them with the greatest danger point five miles south of Viviana city where a force of glandelinians were said to have about successfully attacked the defenders. Several hundred citizens and a whole brigade of soldiers were rushed to the place, placed and then later the engineers and scouts reported the danger had been overcome, and that the enemy had been dispersed for the present at least.

The levee bureaus gave warning however that the flood waters from all the other crevasses breakers continually moving southward and westward, and also spreading northward and eastward. The section again going back into the Brimlie and urban creeks would again pass back into the Mic-Whirther increasing the danger below the south of the Aronburgs Run, lower. The flooded sections of the Aronburgs gun river was steadily rising, and that the flood at Little girl knool was again rising as a result of the lower flood water reentering the main flood through the Smb a Smbous and gramine streams.

below Little girl knool the water was stationary or rising slightly, but at Big girl knool the gauge showed a drop of one half a foot, and this was expected to continue as the levees there, the reconstruction of the blast levees would be necessary, and if another such disaster was to be averted it was planned by the government that the only thing to do was to have every levee strongly concentrated by all troops of soldiers he held of the flood. General Argar asserted to General Vivian that Big girl knool and Lucille Jackson was now safe as a result of the successful defense of the powerful Big girl knool Big girl knool lay below that city but expressed the concern over the safety of all the other territory below Angeline Junction, and other parts of Angelina. He said eighteen thousand square miles of land has been or will be flooded, and that a hundred thousand are would have been inundated had it not been for the Big girl knool levee defense of the soldiers and citizens since Big girl knool knool had been in peril.

According to general Argar not only should all levee walls be more strongly constructed and built more high, but also strongly defended by all soldiers needed for the purpose. And the general said that much of the present big flood disasters would could easily have been averted if the levees would have been strongly defended in the first place, and he also stated that the levees ought to have spillways, spillways to trap glandelinians who sneak upon a levee to blow it up.

"The time will come," said general Argar, "when this catholic country of Abbeanna will go ahead and not only construct levees of stronger materials and which will hold long before blasting charges, but also have defenders and powerful spillways which will not only have good use in drowing at vandals but also to use for the good of all towns and cities not yet electrically lighted....."

At this time a lone glandelinian soldier seen sneaking near the vin city of the Big girl knool levee (he, he, he, he) was shot by an Aveyellonian country near the flood front and instantly killed. On the 29th of November the states of Concordia and others south of the city of Angeline Junction began experiencing the full force of the flood which had devastated so many thousands of miles of territory and a score of new towns and the torrent also was completing the inundation of Babel State with prop prospects that it would overflow most of the other sections, and a nearly threatened territory comprised about six thousand square miles. In the main river flood and up property value of more than fifty million dollars.....

With the main river flood waters claiming this new area, the overflow from the southern extremity of the Aronburgs gun was spreading over a southeastern catholic state, and the flow from another break really made by glandelinians was widening over the section adding hourly to the numbers of homeless and swelling the property loss. Our other big crevasses created by the glandelinian soldiers near the Aronburg levee came most unexpected and at a time when the levee engineers had thought they and the workers and soldiers had won their fight to dam up the water flowing over the slough at that place. The enemy succeeded in blasting after winning their attacks, making openings about two hundred yards wide, and a thousand long, the waters rushing to the lowlands sailing to the backwaters there, and gradually pushing on the sea ward field state where barriers are being constructed to prevent the flood reaching Lake Angeline in that locality.

At many new spots the Red Cross had been compelled to establish new camps thirty miles south of the new break and supplies were being concentrated there, and refugees filled the camps from the towns of Laasack and Illia when the floods came down on them suddenly giving them barely time to flee to safety. The Abbeanna held national guard which was now fully mobilized had about twenty thousand men in that region, and small and big boats were being rushed to the area. These new breaks though made by the enemy were expected to lower the flood stage at Angeline Junction but the weather department in a special warning reported that the waters from those crevasses were liable to return to the mainstream joining the flood from the Aronburgs gun river and intensify the flood situation below the mouth of the Aronburgs Run River.

A similar warning was given by all levee boards which stated that the new breaks had placed more in peril, and that all live stock women and children too should be removed immediately. Should another break occur the board said it would affect at least fourteen other counties, and many other states too. While a fresh army of men women and children went to work to strengthen the levees between Angelina, gathia, and Big girl knool glandelinian engineers at other points kept up the blasting of another dig north of Conservatory gun in an effort to be man enough to increase the as a result situation there. The opening state started on the 29th. The opening started on the 29th had been widened to a total distance of six hundred feet and the flow was like a torrent literally reducing the rivers level at Big girl knool and below instead of making matters worse as the glandelinians had expected. A drop of two feet in the flood stage of the river at Big girl knool was observed that day but since then the level of the river had been stationary. The Mayor of Big girl knool calculated that when the flood had reached its own peak near Big girl knool the stage along that section had not exceeded twenty eight feet as against the 33 feet stage forecast before the lower levee breaks were made. This was one time the enemy got far ahead.

At that however advice received in the towns south of Aronburgs Run were that the flood would be soon overflowing the country side there before the next day. From Chamberlains city came word that the Conservatory and Aronburgs gun Rivers at Edenia thirty miles north of that still flooded place was still being flooded because the enemy had burst another levee flooding thirty thousand acres more of farm and other lands, and driving thousands of persons from their homes. The refugees were taken to the concentration camps at Lucille Jackson city where seventy seven thousand persons had been already camped for, and in the night, believed to have been caused by glandelinian soldiers a terrible fire broke out which wiped out all the 10,000 tents in the camp and drove all the refugees into great confusion. With the greatest floods if of record forecast for the season, with a fleet of rescue ships and boats under fire while rescuing marooned persons out into danger sections by the coast guard and Red Cross, as well as up and down the rivers, the enemy is not content but must burn refugees out of even camps. A part of the rescue fleets was approaching Monterey and Edenville and was to take out all the people in the threatened areas, transporting them to the next concentration camps at Lucille Jackson and other places but these were often attacked or literally attacked and dispersed by glandelinians on other boats. A fire on one hundred and thirty six coast guard power boats was being unloaded at Flotilla of one hundred and thirty six coast guard power boats at this location of Big girl knool Big girl knool making a total of two thousand craft at this location of rescue work between Angelina, gathia and the latter city. These boats had been scattered over the flooded area to bring out those marooned on levees, trees house tops, and a pr of promontories. These too were fired on from some hidden point while unloading the refugees and a few were killed including two Red Cross Nurses and six children. Cannon were brought along docks of the river and answered the fire with killing effect. One day of November came over scenes of desolating desolation through widest stretches of the Mic-Whirther gun Valley, where more than three million five hundred three million five hundred thousand persons had been affected by the flood. With more dikes crumbling before the explosions set off by rebellious rebels in several places in Galvernia the river was enabled to even widen its old breaches because of afraid and the refusal of many inhabitants to quit their menaced dwellings because of afraid and being shot at by glandelinian snipers made the work of the flood or in the flood many very hard and difficult. At all points of the edge of the flood or in the flood many persons their food supplies crushed on dangerous levees, house tops or other points declined to even receive assistance. Held, Aronburg town was also inundated when the waters

It was estimated that if this threatened break would occur it would result in the early inundation of 22,000 and additional square miles of territory in five of other counties much of which was already under water or black water of the flood.

10. "The Engineer-Vivien made announcements that his war secretly has been preparation of PLANS of army engineers for future flood protection from so ruthless an enemy. A similar assurance of early action in this direction was given to the Governor of every state, and that the Government would do everything it possibly could toward restoration work in the flooded districts."

There was also formed a special session of the gyalpa, and the gasper was left for the front, had directed the Secretary of the War Department to accompany other gyalpa parties to the flooded Mic-Maurther. Man-in-power that the engineer corps of the army, and the River Commission, may expedite a report on flood war prevention. He was impressed and impressed with the dire plight of the hundreds of thousands of flood sufferers in the Mic-Maurther flood areas. He had the idea of sending him and his gyalpa to the front to further engage, blasting of levees. The gasper before he left the front had appealed to the nation to increase the size of credits for the draining of so vile an enemy, as glauculinia.///

While the human caravans of the hundreds of thousands of refugees continued to move out of places of safety the flood and back waters of the river and its overhanging branches (proving it is a tree) were completing the inundating of other lands in a hundred countries in northeastern and southeastern portions of Argentina and Galvian countries in the 20th of November.....

The end of the break nearest Hamilton city will be it was said bulkheaded and that the water will be able to widen the opening in that direction. As further precautionary measures are being construction near Lake Angeline to ward off the flood from that region were being raised rapidly and strengthened by large cranes of steel, and the experts hoping the flood would not come too soon, until the level of the river at pig Girkwood fell three quarters of another foot during the past twenty four hours ending at six o'clock a committee of army and state engineers reported that the gauge during the remainder of the flow would stay within a reading of 26.6 feet but added this would occasion no concern, as there would be no danger to the pig Girkwood city unless of course the other flood gates broke. The water in the

It was reported that a portion of the lake was being started to fill as the workers were not having the chance to make dikes around the lake fast enough, and other areas were being flooded, while a special warning from the levee departments at that section said the newly built levees below the point would cause the river at that section to rise a little for several weeks but added:

AT Mel dunville the Aramburg and river rose to crest level, and Aramburg peaked. The drop of the river was about two feet. The Aramburg Creek showed a fall of one and a half feet despite the overflow recently by the enemy. The population of refugees camped here every hour, any minute it seemed as persons arrived on foot, in long trains of wagons or were ferried to safety in flooded sections by the many large rafts of boats concentrated in these regions. And the great rescue fleets plied the waters at the mouth of the Aramburg to the Glendelian uniers, reaching the swollen reaches of every Therefore twenty trains were sent out to aid flood relief departments to rescue the victims. Count Joe Biff, appealed to mayor, governor and war chiefs to find out the date of the prevention date of the flood and to call a special session of the legislature to prevent such a flood from happening again.

and for which it must assume responsibility and therefore on that as I can see it is just as much the fault of the Abbotinian Government for this flood and fire disaster as the enemy's. It is plain the duty of the Emperor to call his loyal Congress in extra session at once to debate on what should be done to the enemy for bringing on purpose such disasters which are even surprising and horrifying the world.

Speaking of glandularian soldiers appearing at the case of levees are the main danger signals which watched by these who battle the Glandularians against their efforts to destroy other levees. Levee vandals are what the guards and soldiers call these glandularians, and unless checked promptly in their vile purpose they would succeed in blocking holes in levees with only a few sticks of dynamite which would cause crevasses through which the water of the rivers would pour our pour with great fury.

The enemy can even cause crevasses by sealing a small hole through which the water seeps through and which the current would quickly widen until a geyser appears. The Abbotinian Red Cross disaster relief headquarters have reported on the 14th of December that 3,455,66 persons were receiving aid from the many organizations in the Mic-Thirther Run Flood area, and that this was surely the greatest number ever cured for by the Abbotinian Red Cross in any disaster in that country, of course among the Lake Gelicia, and the forest fire horror. And more than nine hundred thousand of the refugees had been given typhoid, typhus, and smallpox inoculation by the medical division of the Abbotinian flood relief forces. There was an increase of over 10,000 victims of typhoid, and the end the rate was expected to increase as even larger supplies of serum were to be rushed to these concentration camps. Also reports from the Abbotinian health officials, either National, or State continued to disclose new cases of typhoid and smallpox in the many refugee camps. The health officers of the St. Angeline vice reported three thousand cases of typhoid, and eight thousand of smallpox.

Scattering cases of both diseases were also reported from the Turner State Concentration camps, and the head state health officer Doctor Janborne declared fifteen thousand cases of typhoid typhoid were being treated within the flood area of Peru state, and that the thousand cases of smallpox were reported.

Also there came reports from concentration state camps of California that 16,000 cases of typhoid typhoid were listed, and that still even now the refugees in a situation to tonight the region was being badly improved, no improvement at all as occasionally sneaking enemy vandals could steal into camps and start fires among the rows upon rows of tents that nothing could stop, and many suffered from burns and other injuries and this happening with no fire departments available. And again more under fire continued continued in the newly flooded areas of California, while others were reported slowly falling in the older flood regions.

And across these raging streams, and new lands some rescue forces still continue to move swiftly in the race with the flood waters for the safety of scores of thousands of persons in northwestern Angeline. Junction section, Glandularian thousands who had sought safety on the remaining Mic-Thirther Run levees near the city of Angeline Junction and Jennie Turner, between Gertrude Angeline City, and Crosswell Junction were saved under severe fire to refuge camps at these places, a higher ground within full view of the flood from above. The national Abbotinian guard officers however reported that between 100,000 and 200,000 were at other points on the protective embankments and had entrenched themselves to avoid the snipping fire of hidden glandularian vandals.

At many points where the waters had risen sixteen feet the rescuers frequently met with flat refusals of the inhabitants to leave. Three-fourths of the one hundred and twenty thousand still in the flooded parish of Angeline Junction, preferred to remain by their homes and farms and others points, rather than risk going to shelter under fire of glandularian snipers which they dreaded more than the fury of the flood, that therefore they were determined to remain until the flood should recede. The inhabitants were living in the upper stories of their homes and barns, or on scaffolds built above the roofs or on large rafts, improvised against fire from the wicked Glandularian snipers. And with no more immediate breaks in the levees threatened as they were being too strongly defended, the state and national relief machinery were able to give their full attention to relief work and rescue work, although there was no relaxing of vigilance and effort in all danger zones. Scouting parties from Angeline Junction reported to the flood dictator of the Nation John M. Reids that the waters, from the Aronburgs, on were still moving swiftly southwestward, and that a stranger current to the southeast had developed over practically all of the inundated area, and that a portion of the Lake Gelicia flood was joining it here thus meeting all dangers elsewhere. This therefore was forcing huge volumes of water into the branches of the Aronburgs run, and this caused engineers and thousands upon thousands of workers strain all their most desperate efforts to keep this flow in that direction to prevent inundation of newly vast stretches to the south and north which could devastate million more of acres of rich farm lands, and many more towns.

It was necessary that efforts should be redoubled as the flood situation was growing worse and more serious every hour, the flood really being one of the greatest in this part of California and Angeline countries. Within a day, every city had subscribed for over a million dollars a city, many or all of them had taken up huge collections and remitted their offering to the Red Cross, and yet greater pity had been called upon, calling upon the nation to double its giving. The total flood refugees exceeded four million, those all looking upon the Red Cross for food clothing, shelter and medical care. General General Parker claimed he had thought of a plan which would for all time save in the future all parts of the Abbotinian, south or north, north or any place from a repeat of the disastrous floods caused by enemies and he had offered it up to the Abbotinian government. He tendered the plan through his chief aid Benbow and the plan was based on the employment of mechanical methods to end the flood flow of water in spite of the enemy. It would cost one thousand times less than the present system of enemy and flood fighting, by guarded dikes, dredging and the like and would require a thousand times less time to put into operation.

On the first of December while large fleets of boats piled the Angeline Junction flood waters taking immense droves of refugees to safety from the floods that were joining together from Gelicia and Mic-Thirther run, large medical forces and long broad lines of the greatest Abbotinian war relief machine in the worlds history of fiction maneuvered into position to care for the swelling ranks of the homeless.

Immense supplies of medical aids, including disease antitoxins, food and clothing, and tents, were a continually sent to all concentration centers. Behind the newly flooded districts where the relief work had been under way now for a long period supplies though plentiful for the one million refugees, were often seized and carried away by raiders after being successful in attacks upon the camps. Thus a great deal of apprehension was expressed by medical men because of these camps not strongly enough guarded by the military.

Also an epidemic of dysentery among the refugees of many camps caused the Red Cross and authorities concern, and the type typhoid was increasing and was proving especially dangerous to small children and also to the Red Cross members themselves who even contracted it. It was believed to be brought on by the refugees compelled to drink flood waters before being rescued. The head supreme medical director of the Red Cross reported fifty thousand cases in all scattered through the refugee camps, and vaccination both for typhoid typhoid and other diseases had continued as rapidly as serum could be could be transported to the concentration centers.

Only about ninety thousand persons were said to be free or inoculated with typhoid and smallpox sera, and that also the Red Cross was compelled to request the loan from the army of many mobile laboratory laboratories for use in the flooded areas to purify water. Additional cases of smallpox, and even some cases of hydrophobia and cholera were reported at Angeline Junction though the health workers had inoculated all the remaining inhabitants. Three persons believed to be suffering from rabies and yet not having been bitten by dogs were found in an Angeline Junction hospital, and it was believed a number of rabid dogs might have been drowned in the flood and that some portion of the flood had these germs upon these three took in when they had changed the peril of drinking the water rather than suffer the pangs of thirst. Among these was the Mayor of the city itself and was rushed to the city hospital in a critical condition.

Evacuation of towns in southern California still continued despite that fact that in most places the waters were receding slowly. Lake Anger village had been evacuated to the government levee across the lake there, and tents and food had been shipped there, and while boats were quartering women and children until accommodations for sheltering them could arrive. About 10,000 persons were still living on the fragments of the Wickey Lanch levee from which torrents of water was still pouring though now at quite a diminished volume. Devastation of some other parts of southeastern California, and also a portion of Angeline for a distance of four thousand miles more, was rapidly becoming complete on the 25th of November and also the 30th, as the badly rising flood waters continued southward, and more levees were blown asunder by glandularian vandals, the levees being near Wickey Lanch which caused a new army of refugees to be sent on the route increasing the homeless to four million three hundred and forty-two thousand.

Rice, farm lands, hardwood, and gas and oil lands were also being claimed, adding almost immeasurably to the staggering total of the dreadful property loss throughout the two countries.

Many flood waters even now covered near fifteen thousand miles in Angeline gate, alone, and an added twenty miles in California, and the picture of the desolation and horror was appalling. For hundreds and hundreds of miles southward and westward along the Mic-Thirther Run there were only a few scattered patches and little hills, not under water. From Little Owl Knoll city almost down to Angeline again a stretch of more than a thousand miles as the grow flood and back waters were everywhere, the river itself now flowing through a great inland sea out of which faint lines of its levees could only be seen, and these levees had been the salvation of thousands of thousands who had since the beginning sought refuge there before the flood waters, until rescue craft could be sent to move them to safer ground. Small hills, mounds, and natural promontories had been the means of protecting other thousands when the rising waters engulfed the flood waters. A peering through four new breaks in the sand river walls during the past twelve hours the river flood waters were cutting wide channels into other places and rushing to meet each waters from other levee broken rivers, as well as from breaks in the main levee of Wickey Lanch.

The rescue machine of workers set up by the authorities was now moving swiftly to care for the still increasing number of refugees and to move out the thousands who had clung for the still increasing number of refugees and to move out the thousands who had clung for the still increasing number of refugees, rather than face the fire of rebels, anxiously to their homes in the face of dangers.

and below the wider section of the flood, other levees were still firm but with the approach of the street of the flood which already had drowned out the levees to the north, north, apprehension was felt for the safety again of the levees. The northward of Big Girl Knoll as rumors came that a large force of Glandelinians was advancing to capture and blow it up. Again on account of these rumors the levee department had warned that extra precautions should be taken along this stretch against the record stages already forecast, for it was said that the feet of so many levees had blown up it really was impossible to stop the enemy in his purpose.

In the state of Peru, a terrific outbreak of typhoid fever had quickly augmented the need for the many Red Cross relief among the many flood victims, and for the conditions was aggravated by the fact because of two severe battles further up north said to be at Delight Junction and Leighburg, leading the army needed many Red Cross workers and was drafting them back from various places. To tell the truth for this story the Nation might as well have been a patient suffering from a stroke of Paralysis.

The Medical director of the Abilene and Red Cross said that the result of the typhoid conditions caused by the flood, as well as other diseases will probably not be known for a long time as it usually takes about a fortnight for the former disease to make itself known after having been contracted. He said that nearly seventy-five thousand refugees already had it so far as he knew, despite the fact many had received the typhoid and small pox serum, and also there remains many scores of thousands for whom the vaccine should be rushed, and with the army needing so many doctors and nurses for so many millions of victims of the two tremendous battles just passed, made the situation for both situations extremely critical and embarrassing not to say very complicated. Refugees by hundreds of thousands have been forced to drink flood waters in many instances, and it was therefore feared that many cases of typhoid and other diseases might spread beyond all Red Cross and medical aid.

The chairman of the Red Cross organization, Gordon Parks, stated that national director of disaster relief for the Abilene and Red Cross, asking field workers and supplies, and received the word, that no more could be sent as the cities near Vivian, Wiley and other places needed them. He said that the war so far had raged at Leighburg, Delight and Delight's Junction, to find out if such rumors were true a field worker on some war correspondence were dispatched from Big Girl Knoll to Vivian, Wiley, and close to the state battle fields, and found it was more true than said that the terrible battle at Delight's Junction (see chapter of battle) could not be exaggerated. The population of so many refugee camps at Big Girl Knoll was over 1,000,000 but the Chairman said it is liable to reach five hundred thousand more in another twenty-four hours.

Personal of other concentration camps was also counted on the line as the relief personnel moved forward to care for these thousands of refugees, and found many without tents, as they said that enemy fire came and often strikes configurations that destroyed all means of shelter. Many boats, and everything parties were over and they could of the inundated regions continually engaged in rescue work, pulling supplies, and bearing relief workers to new points. However conditions in southwestern, Angelina and southwestern Calaverina also were so improved that it was considered too dressed emergency situation there was absolutely passed so far as flood waters were concerned. The number of refugees in the refugee concentration camps had not been listed at any headquarters at this section but it was estimated that two hundred thousand were at the town of Eagle Grove alone. With citizens of Lucille, Menden, Chamberlain, Iowa, Iowa, and other places returning to their homes, the population of several refugee camps were being reduced although many of these people were never seen in the concentration centers but scattered the flood with relatives on the rivers and in levees.

North of Big Girl Knoll, at Beverly Dale, and also, cities in Eastern Angelina, interstate boats by hundreds continued to pour, at outlying districts for war-torn pool people and carried food and supplies to two hundred and fifty thousand persons who chose to remain stranded in their homes in order that they might not face the fire of Glandelinian snipers, and also to guard their belongings. Health conditions in southwestern Calaverina where winter weather was coming on, remained quite on the right stage, but with flood waters either already receding or flowing, over marsh, measures were being under way to safeguard the health of the communities in the wake of the flood.

While lots of rescue work continued on, even under fire of Glandelinian snipers or even while being attacked by Glandelinians in the Mic-Hairther and Flood regions, and were still toying and fighting enemies to protect the levees along all stretches of not yet injured most attention had been maintained to move moving refugees out of temporary concentration points, within the flooded districts to higher ground outside the levees. Food supplies were not plentiful at most places and some stores had opened business in Jennie, Warner city, the worse hit by the flood of all southern Angelina vine towns. Governor Held of Angelina, the state arrived in Eagle Grove city, on the steamer of the former name for an inspection of many refugee camps, and the flooded town, and he was accompanied by many other state officials.

A high powered speed boat of long, or of great length and width reared in the flood districts from prairie Calaverina state, forty-five miles south of Big Girl Knoll city, and won by a day at least a thirty mile race with death, under shell and rifle fire in the bargain for a forty eight year old woman and her husband, reported dying from wounds they received from the rifle fire of Glandelinian soldiers who continually peppered their names. A canoe went up on the shore at Big Girl Knoll city itself as the floating speed boat damaged by fire of enemy guns split up the water and came to a hurried stop. A waiting ambulance too the man and woman to a hospital but the attention said both were mortally wounded and had faint chances of recovery. Mother Superior Sister Mary Helen superintendent of the Catholic hospital, and others stood by them two slaves as nurses and doctors fought to overcome a five day no forced neglect of their dangerous wounds. As this speed boat arrived at Heidi Farm some miles from the house of these two old couples hundreds of persons though risking the danger from enemy snipers and opened the inundated lowlands for a small rowboat into which the woman and man were taken under a blinding rebel gunfire from their shot riddled home to a levee. Finally the chug of an outboard motor was heard through the trees. Then a few minutes later tender hands lifted the prostrate bodies over the levee and placed it in the fast motor boat, the man and woman suffering from dangerous bullet wounds, while the others were put on board, one suffering from typhoid fever, and the other had lost an eye in some accident. Then the race with death was on and the boat had been powered by Glandelinians in other boats for miles until Christian rescue craft sped into the water and drove off the next casualties. Yet the two the man and woman were not expected to live, and the man with the loss of an eye had long undergone an operation.

While one hundred thousand of their country men including soldiers to the extreme south were in a forced night march before flood waters from Mic-Hairther Run River; Crevasse above Big Girl Knoll, to residents of Caldwell and other eastern Angelina towns kept a night vigil only to find with the coming of dawn that their flight to keep off vandal Glandelinians and to see the flood waters had then in vain. Through three crevasses made by the enemy to the north and south of Heidi the rushing river poured out into St. Johns district and from a score of towns anxious eyes scanned the river for the fleet of rescue boats hurrying from Angelina, Agatha Big Girl Knoll and other places to take them to refuge camps before the water inundated the towns and cities.

Northward in Caldwell districts which also was rapidly being flooded through newly made crevasses at three more points along the river front, special trains carried one thousand from Tulsa, and heavy by teams, while those from the back country not yet flooded came their way to high ground during the night in wagons, many furnished by the state rescue organization and horse drawn teams, and all these men followed themselves.

During the night while a terrific battle with the foe was raging to prevent them from making a break at headquarters, forward north and south of the same district scarcely a person slept in the town of Caldwell or in other places. Throughout the dragging hours of darkness lights gleamed in houses, beacons for the men who fought and labored unceasingly in the losing battle against the relentless enemy advance to beat back the levees and let go the relentless currents punning at the levees. Women and children assembled in prayerful groups or hurriedly gathered to their own valuable possessions against the coming of the flood. Through it all their ears were trained for the mighty roar that would warn them that their men and soldiers had lost in the desperate fight against the foe's attempt to let go the river upon the land.

That roar came with the early dawn not at one place, where one of the greatest dangers was believed to lurk out at many places making certain the complete inundation of the whole territory much of which was already under such waters from the levee breaks of the Mic-Hairther Run and from the Greenburg Run River. The roads began immediately, many Mic-Hairther Run and others moving out with their household goods, to await the gathering on the levees and others moving out with their household goods, to await the coming of the rescue boats.

In the mean meanwhile the first desperate step in rallying out against Vivian order that a comprehensive flood control effort be made in the Mic-Hairther Run Valley was started, when Vivianmen big army having arrived started to concentrate. As many men as there was room for soldiers and artillery on a great number of the still remaining levees. General Glandorn placed on one levee a mile long 10,000 men to defend it against any efforts of Glandelinians to raise it. While the flood of the flood inhabitants of St. Bernard and St. Francis Counties fled before the approach of the enemy, the efforts of the enemy to blast levees many others refused to flee from the fire of thousands of hidden Glandelinian snipers. In fact they knew to advance of being shot to move preferring to take their chances in fact they knew to advance turning to sections of the country, which was strange to them and which may have many hidden enemies lurking to shoot them or their children down.

Most of those who had remained were the men folk and the muddy waters held were were familiar with floods and other disasters and the most part were also less terrors for them than the sniping enemy. Their homes for the most part were also exposed to the fire of Glandelinians, and it was planned recently by the Red Cross and relief workers that there shall be a rescue passed that the remaining flood of

There will have no say on the matters and will be rescued by force. Preparations for the reception of the flood waters was made in most cases when the inhabitants heard that the levees were to be broken by glandelinians, and being assured nothing could stop the enemy from the work they passed it off with a "let them burst the levees" and shrug.

Their one pound deck guns ready for action, their machine guns in position, sixteen seventy-five foot coast guard patrol boats had turned out from their normal activities of patrolling glandelinian life blockade routes and are out patrolling the flood waters of the region for refugees and clearing every nest of hidden hidden Glandelinian snipers from their hiding places as fast as it can be done.

The commander of several one of the boats said the majority of the people in the flooded area are afraid to come out for fear of hidden enemy snipers and that they prefer to remain in their houses in interior rooms than go out and risk their children being shot at by glandelinian snipers.

"There are about fifteen thousand at Heidelberg Lake Section that refuse to leave unless they can be assured there are no glandelinians within a hundred miles of them," he said. "But glandelinians are sniping from every little piece of ground surrounded by flood waters, and the fact that they are not marooned is because they are well supplied with boats, with which they often come out to attack refugees of concentration camps, and fires among the tents of these camps occur every day."

The rescue of nearly a hundred and fifty thousand men, women and children, many thousands of them cornered by the repeated flows of water from the enormous Wickey Lamsin breaks during the time it started became now the immediate problem on the 1th of December of the Great force of relief workers, craft of every size and type, from the lumbering river steamer to the barges, flat boats and dredges, propelled by an out board motor were still kept busy in the wide stretches of the flooded areas moving the increasing numbers of homeless to concentration camps. Many swift motor boats roared over other sections of the flooded flooded areas to locate many more refugees reported clinging to roof tops, trees, and the tops of promontories projecting above the seas of swirling waters.

Even the life savers of the lighthouse and other departments played a prominent part, even men who had fought the mountainous waves of the Mio-Whirther seas for years to find a new and strange enemy in a mighty river writhing in the throes of its greatest man-made flood. As the rescue went forward always under fire from glandelinian snipers many heartrending scenes were enacted. Children by thousands were dazed or frightened by a war catastrophe yet new in their lives along to their mothers, who fight back their own fears and anxieties to ally those of their young. Men by thousands struggled along weighted with treasured household possessions, exiled from the homes and fields where their years of hardest labor were being wiped out by a flood brought on by such a ruthless war as Glandelinian.

Occasionally as the caravans moved slowly to the high lands groups of glandelinians rush out to meet them with rifle fire, but the men folk who were armed for such occasions answer back from behind rocks and trees and finally driven to desperation act as only their own hearts tell and when shipping the widest stretches, these refugees too give no quarter, with the archers and horses, go miles cattle, asses, pigs, and many varieties of dogs and cats. But not all of the livestock would be saved. Many heads will be caught in the flood to swim until exhaustion pulls them down into the fury of the yellow waters.

As this battle for life proceeds to the eastward, other battles still go forward to the south and west. At the bottom of the flooded areas, large armies of soldiers and even citizens, engineers and laborers pit their wits and strength both against the great masses of water bearing down from the northeast in an effort to divert it back into the Mio-Whirther Run, and save the rich corn land in the south central part of the state, while at various points, ten places a day on levees and elsewhere hundreds of thousands of soldiers fight battles with Gettysburg losses per day in killed and wounded to prevent equally numbers of Glandelinians from driving them off and spreading the levees to spread further floods.

Northward at Heidelberg Lake and West Mary Mio-Gallister Gendles another large army of soldiers and engineers and laborers labor and fight desperately against a front and flanking foe, the swelling flood waters coming down from the Archburg Run to flood a swamp behind the towns, and scores of thousands of attacking Glandelinians who make repeated charges to carry the levees. Along the other fronts breastworks, hastily erected in the desperate efforts to drive off glandelinian forces and save little communities and the standing levees were being strengthened and topped against a flood now present or yet to come as the great waves slowly down to the sea, while the soldiers guarding the army of workers repel repeated charges of glandelinian hordes to stop them from blowing up levees.

On board the great Mio-Whirther Run River steamer called the Mayenfield there were about five to ten thousand refugees, while the same ship was towing a barge with pyrotechnics and the standing levees were being strengthened and topped against a flood now present or yet to come as the great waves slowly down to the sea, while the soldiers guarding the army of workers repel repeated charges of glandelinian hordes to stop them from blowing up levees.

here the flood was lowering they were greeted in that region by the captain of a motor boat that there were 33,000 to 40,000 persons marooned on house-tops in the flooded country surrounding this flooded city, who must be taken off some way or other within the next few hours as they were hourly, day and night under terrific fire from glandelinian snipers from various mounds of land in the flood, and from wooded country on the shores of the flood on both sides. With those on board this great rescue ship were Doctor John Mio-Loria of the National board of health, and six and cross nurses, five catholic priests, and a hundred nuns all from Angelina Agathia. After unloading the five catholic priests, and the steamers proceeded for the levee with the motor boat al unloading these refugees the point at sunrise, and found the refugee steamer marooned to a tree some twenty miles south of Big Girl Knoll with three hundred glandelinians on board, and the Glandelinian flag flying. It was observed this ship had been captured by the glandelinians with an equal number of refugees on board, and had been captured by the glandelinians on board had been thrown off the ship into the water in that the physicians and nurses on board had been thrown off the ship into the water in perfect "dead as a nail" style. Half of the refugees were ill and one man whose foot had been crushed by a fallen tree was in a bad condition.

Having on board the bigger steamer a large force of marines proceeded at night in boats to cautiously approach the captured ship, and suddenly boarding it without warning surprised the resistance treated them as pirates by making them all walk the plank.

Doctor Mio-Loria and the Nurses and others then transferred the three hundred refugees to the bigger boat, and the doctor performed an amputation on the man whose foot at night. Then the Mayenfield proceeded northward toward Big Girl Knoll with refugees taken off the levee hoping to be set a few miles south of the city by other doctors and Red Cross nurses with a motor boat load of other refugees as there came word there were thousands more awaiting rescue.

Just how all these people were to be taken off the roofs or top floors where they were marooned and transferred safely to Big Girl Knoll with endless sniping at the boat for every half mile with artillery was a big problem indeed. The city of Little Girl Knoll still relieving the waters of Wickey Lamsin breaks were under water and was without transportation by rail, and not a house top could be seen. Where the city formerly stood were only water-water everywhere. The strong railroad station also was under water and though it was believed as the current was also slow moving, the houses would be swept away, nevertheless all the interior of the houses would be ruined.

The people who had remained in other towns in the vicinity of Little Girl Knoll were living in the second stories of their homes, and many were housed in box-cars. Wherever there was a foot of high ground such as the top of a strong-levee there were colonies of refugees with their live stock. It was evident the latter would be sacrificed. When the boat left Big Girl Knoll the orders the orders received by the captain was to bring back to live stock but to devote all the efforts to saving human life first. As the boat came past Beppo Lamsin, many miles south of Big Girl Knoll they were able to leave the main channel being caught under severe fire was forced to turn back which was now a wide sea. The ship being caught under severe fire was forced to stop for the night not far from the normal course of the river, as soundings showed forty feet of water. As far as eye could see in any direction from the town of Beppo Lamsin the water ranged from fifteen to forty feet. There was little hope for saving anything in this territory except the inhabitants, like the Mayenfield were over- of sufficient boats to do that, for government steamers, like the Mayenfield were overwhelmed with the task, and wherever the ship was tied up and sounded the whistle it was seen the center of a fleet of motor boats and rowboats coming from every direction with a load of frightened ferocious refugees that had been taken off roofs. They hardly even have clothing on their backs. Long ago they had abandoned all hope of saving any of their household goods or personal effects. They were marooned everywhere.

One despairing message just received at Big Girl Knoll said that two women and five children were being desperately to be rescued from a roof of a floating house some miles of the town as thought the house seems safe and strong, yet every time it swings around and makes the eleven refugees facing the wooded shore, crack, crack, crack, goes rifles and bullets whistle dangerously close. A armored motor boat started for them and they were carried off safely and taken to one of the camps. The captain of the boat saying two good shells routed the glandelinians out of their ambush, work, and good heavens how those shells routed the glandelinians out of their ambush.

It was believed that enough of the monstrous flood had rolled back into the mighty Mio-Whirther Run to make the main stream again show a rise on the even- ing.

ing of December the first from Big Girl Knoll as far southwest as Angelina Agathia and Dorothy Gale, the levee bureau at Dorothy Gale announced that there had been no change in the river passing Big Girl Knoll with very little alteration of the level indicated for several days, but slight rises of the lower portions of the Archburg Run near Lucille taken and myriads were observed and the streets of the former again re was said to have three feet of water, and more than eleven thousand of the inhabitants had been driven down to upper stories. The towns of San Pedro and a hundred others were also being deserted, as were dozens of smaller communities in the paths of enormous torrents streaming and spreading from the continued amount of waters from the breaks of the Angelina Gate had been given over to virtually all of the northern section of the Angelina Gate had been given over to the terrible floodwaters, and twelve thousand more residents were affected by the flood which spread northward this time over new ground where over five hundred thousand acres of land were being covered. A priest going on a mission of mercy was drowned near Gray Point where twenty hundred persons were marooned upon high ground where glendelinian soldiers were said to be firing upon them as if upon an enemy in battle. A shot hit the priest in the heart, and the monstrance which he carried was hurled into the water.

Into the river and the sacred spot was swept away in the flood with the priest. A swift current prevented the boats from reaching the marooned who had to lay low to prevent the fire of the enemy from striking them down. Further west and to the south many authorities appealed for men to aid in restoring a broken levee near Lake Angeline which had received millions of gallons of water from the flood and that the city of Angeline Junction was already under fifty feet of water. Reports came in a hundred thousand perished. An attempt of the enemy to cut the levees along the stream at that section was absolutely successful, and hundreds of thousands of glendelinians succeeded successfully preventing the workers from building further levees and dikes around the lake measuring many thousands of the men, women and children and starting the lake at flood running torrents. Menzies state was under water, and other sections were threatened, and therefore hundreds of men and thousands of soldiers were forced to do a fierce about to face to fight both enemies and a mere dreading for sneaking traitors who hid the glendelinians in their vile work. Work was also started on along another levee. A levee extension which would place the town of McAllister behind a barrier that would hold out the water, but the workers were driven off and the levee blown sky high, and the people of the town it was said had no chance to escape and every one perished. Refugees streaming into Big Girl knoll located on a ridge in Alland filled the camps beyond endurance and then enemies came and set the whole camp afire, burning thousands to death and rendering the rest homeless and attacking and shooting down hundreds of Red Cross workers and driving the refugees to seek shelter in swamps and risk of disease and other dangers rather than face such an enemy wicked but tremendous. So successfully in every way they did. Between fifty-five thousand and eighty thousand persons were still said to be removed from the levees in the regions of St Joseph but the enemy prevented any further rescue work for good till the ending of the flood. A plea was made to the christian armies under Vivian but the army could not do a thing and was helpless itself though it over held the attack and other glendelinians a hundred to one.

General Vivian sent a note to superior Vivian for additional troops and long range artillery giving a full account of the horrors they were committing. In heaven could stop the enemy from the horrors they were committing.

Five hundred thousand refugees most of them women and children arrived to Big Girl knoll on the 24th aboard steamers and other river craft and were transferred to a concentration camp. Many of them boarded the steamer at Angeline Junction against their will, being forced to do so being forcibly persuaded to seek safety against enemy and flood waters running into the city from the overflowed lake and when many refused to go, the rescuers aided by soldiers went into the houses and literally dragged them forcibly out. Many of them had not sleep for three days and night and the rescuers said that though the reports of so many perishing was not really a fact, yet the loss of life in the city from those overwhelmed was really great beyond belief. Goods were also relieved at Angeline Junction that the village levee south of Big Ryans were where a crevasse had been made by the enemy had been burned summer, and that as the whole levee of the Wickey Lousin region was fully giving way, the flood was increasing in double fury, sweeping buildings of a hundred towns completely before it giving little chance for many thousands of others still marooned on the levees. Water from the sea came down was also within half a mile of McAll and as the town this time expected to be overwhelmed the inhabitants prepared to flee. Because the levee of Wickey Lousin had finally given way altogether improvement in the defenses of the levees along the river near Big Girl knoll was continued. Low points here and there around the city were topped and additional thousands of sand bags were filled for emergency use, while all the able bodied male inhabitants of the city were ordered to go out and work with the rest to make the city safe from flood.

Workmen and soldiers were in readiness to keep a watch out for approaching glendelinians who may come and make another assault on the levee. However the river had risen till it almost topped the levee, but then it remained stationary, although the blasting of the levee on front of Gavaron to the south of Big Girl knoll was completed accelerating the flow through the new crevasse which was nearly two hundred feet wide.

Announcements were made to the authorities at Angeline Junction that there was nothing under heaven could prevent the glendelinians during flood time from burning levees and that the big Wickey Lousin crevasse having increased immensely in size was joining with other crevasse water already in that area, which was retarding the progress of the flood crest toward the right point, and slightly reduced the safety of Big Girl knoll, and that the city of Big Ryans was being flooded deeper, and Lucille picked was a Venice. The crevasse waters of Wickey Lousin dike was further intensifying, intensifying the flood situation around Aronburg, and that the stream of Sunbeam creek, formerly a beautiful little creek of fifty feet in width, was now a sea of water a hundred miles wide, and that it seemed the regions of Conservatory Run was becoming an Atlantic Ocean of California.

The water from the Wickey Lousin crevasse was already turning other streams into lake and yet into lakes and yet falling to drain the risen Mis-birthier gun river and had caused a rise of two feet at Big Ryans, and poverty Gals in twenty four hours, and that in Angeline Junction and Gerrow Angeline Cities, including Lucille Klousen, Lorisania, and Jettetta only the windows of the highest buildings were to be seen and all the inhabitants were crowded on roof tops or up upper floors.

The water had risen in Lucille taken from the beginning of a foot, to forty feet in twenty-one hours and was still rising at ten inches a day.

Because of the sudden new increase in the flood, health forces drew their lines close on the 8th of December to check possible spread of diseases in the twenty flooded states of Angeline Junction, and strong guards were placed outside the camps to warn of approaching glendelinians, for since the flood started, a hundred camps had had their tents washed to the ground, and many of the refugees buried or burned or injured, and as wicked as he was there surely was no stopping the foe, and never had been. There was already a report of nearly sixty thousand cases of typhoid fever in the refugee camps, and many others were feared, and the worse part of the health problem expected to come in a week or two days was of other plagues, caused by the fact that many had no tents, and enemy armies were seeing to it no further tents or provisions and other aid reached the refugees, when argued with to Manley by the authorities Manley had answered:

"I'll do what I please in a war and if you want to save refugees caused by the floods and other disasters, you are to sign a two weeks truce, and restore to the glendelinian authorities the three hundred thousand child slaves already set free by your christian armies. Otherwise no quarter will be shown to neither armies or inhabitants."

The health problem was to increase as so many doctors and Red Cross from extreme necessity were drafted away from refugee camps to be sent to the armies where losses were so heavy in battle. Eighty thousand persons thought to be afflicted with typhoid and small pox, antitoxin contracted other diseases such as diphtheria, colds, and the drenched tables, and there was an increase of Scarlet fever, victims to a number of 10,000 and five out of six were dying from the ailment. Fifty five doctors and a corps of sanitary or engineers were drafted from a concentration camp at Big Girl knoll and sent to Lighburg Landing near Vivian Wickey to take care of wounded soldiers where the health department had reported as many as sixteen million badly and severely including actually wounded, and a dreadful list of dead, whose bodies were being disposed of in every way possible. The Red Cross which had requested the loan from the army of ten mobile laboratories to purify water in the flooded areas, were not only refused but ordered under penalty to come and take care of wounded soldiers and have the refugees sent to armies for care. Protests came from the Red Cross, but the generals stated, "The conditions of the army consisted the safety of the nation, and the army fighting battles under all difficulties has the right for care and treatment of wounded ahead of refugees of floods and other disasters, and types of Red Cross and others who refuse to come to serve the army in caring for wounded will be suspended from service in disgrace or shot."

The Ablesania health authorities had also requested aid in the task of caring for an estimated army of five million five hundred thousand refugees, but the army would not let them come, not until all wounded soldiers were taken care of. The only orders was that the refugees should be sent to the various armies at abolition camps where some chance of care could be received, as the fighting army could not afford to go with either Red Cross nurses and doctors when such enormous numbers of wounded needed care. With either let the wounded soldiers perish, and the armies go home to fight no more or let the refugees do what they can with a little Red Cross nurse as could be used, do it local cases of small pox and even malaria were reported even at Angeline Junction city not yet even touched by the flood, and the few health officials there inoculated nearly the whole population of the city within three weeks since the flood elsewhere began, again at typhoid, four hundred persons were in Angeline Junction hospitals suffering from typhoid.

At the request of the Secretary of War, the military officials had embarked upon a council concerning what was to be done in the Red Cross situation. A number of conferences with representatives of the stricken area had been decided upon immediately and the first was held on December the 8th when a committee of generals, and of Red Cross high officials aided by Nurse and priests met with general Laderlinia and Greatheart and other war department officials including the Vivian GAPA Prisoners.

In a department of how many Red Cross nurses and doctors the army should have, and how many the army should be to attend the refugees, and which was the most greatest necessity for the drafting of so many Red Cross nurses and surgeons from refugee camps had caused a hot dispute between the War Department and the Red Cross Commission. Questions of health situation among the refugees, and of the conditions of the wounded in the armies predominated at the conferences. The army claimed it could not under the military law advance or allow so many Red Cross nurses among refugees when in the big big battles just battles, gave them forty million wounded to be taken care of, when by both floods there was only about less than one hundred cases of sickness out of a refugee population of 10,000,000 and that therefore the army had a right to the greatest number of Red Cross nurses, but it also said that if conditions were pressing in the refugee camps and Red Cross nurses are needed there in great numbers, then the advice is "Concerned by flood and backwaters about one hundred and fifteen thousand innocent lives of beleaguered districts -- men, women, and children, were forced to depend entirely upon relief and other boats for their salvation or remain marooned until the flood receded. Hundreds from St. Joseph City, and other municipalities were in peril, and as many as twenty-five hundred people were stranded on Big Girl Island could not get away. An army fleet of boats rushed to the rescue, but the current was too strong. An appeal was made to Angel Island boats across with cannons barred all approaches. An appeal was made to the Virginia to send a large force of soldiers. In August, typhoid fever broke out among the marooned were liable to perish. The charging flood waters of the Mississippi god was still completing the devastation of all sections though still regaining at other quarters.

At many places the levee embankments were broken at nearly a hundred paces and swift currents were passing through even the deepest of the breaks, and therefore the only hope for the ending of the flood was of the flood rivers confluents of the rivers going down. The waters of the Arnona, on which could also be used, came back into the parent stream through the gorges north of Mombi, and those of the first breaks in the Miv-Gilther run river were pouring down the Arnona M river valley to mingle with the mother stream through the other flood waters. This vast sea of water bearing down toward the sea, and threatening to swamp the line of the Miv-Gilther run river, had created a new stubborn battle front for the Glandelinian army to all that is possible to avoid them. Why not as Ablesennians in the same way. The government should extend full protection on all towns and villages, and full flood protection from the source of every river to its mouth. If Glandelinians make forest fires, capture the Glandelinians and throw them in their own fires. If they make floods, throw them in the floods. If they massacre children, massacre as many soldiers as children who were slain and officers not excepted no matter what the rank. In everything else our government is good. It has good appropriations, too construction of flood control works outside of war disasters has been a good job, so that it is discovered by this disaster it takes a ton of explosives for to make a breach in one small levee. Contractors and job holders in the levee districts have exercised a political influence and have banded together into such associations, that as a result all of the work had been done in such localities, as to result in every case of segments of good strong levees joined even by levees that appear to be of inferior construction but which no flood stage of the river has even topped, or which it takes a hundred to a thousand tons of dynamite to even breach. There has always been a standardization of levee heights at any cost, width or type in local and other levee districts with those of the Federal government on the Mississippi River. These levees went into construction in 1861 and never before until now did we have floods and such disaster as ones. The levees should need further protection, an array of soldiers with artillery, and strong bodies of cavalry should protect levees in the far future. Since the last flood of the river, the associations had pledged themselves firmly to the adoption of a broad national policy, which insured the full development and utilization of the water resources of our holy nation. Standardization of all levees in the river valleys, of dangerous lakes, or storage of water in mountain canyons at the heads of streams the reforestation of denuded areas had been accomplished with as good a purpose and with as great expense as ever recorded, so that ever since not one of the nearest levees has ever sprung a single leak. But no levee yet has been made so that they cannot be blasted, and never will be as it cannot be done. But they can never spill ways to use to flood out these vandals, and to be guarded strongly. And if such disasters occur through the intentions of the Glandelinians why let them pay, as we surely can be. No enemy in any war ever created such disasters before, like floods, that lay waste thousands of miles of country, wipe out forests by fire, blast cities to the ground. Yet Glandelinia does this and we let it go at that. And all the christian nations of the world are laughing at us. A nation holy, in its way, a nation with not one woman man or child, ever committing a fault, children obedient in all ways to its parents, grown people loyal, citizens and non-residents and rulers in the land, no sinners, all people good church goes every day, and yet of all nations in the world; Ablesennia, is the biggest lack of all.

Trudging along a hard frozen ground in the Big Girl knoll General Conner's Union station camp a big, refugee camp for flood and even forest fire sufferers, a twelve year old girl was almost dragging by the hand her little younger sister. The girl was Jean Marie who with her mother, and three brothers, fled before a flood that came through the broken Wickey Lamsin levee near their home in farm thirty miles west of Wickey Lamsin city and eventually were brought here by a Red Cross rescue steamer. The children and parents was all they managed to save. When they reached the refugee camp the Red Cross officials allowed them in, and thus in the great tented city that had arisen on the heights of Big Girl knoll there was this girl and her parents and sister and brother who out of every as in the camp were the only foreign persons living in this section of Ablesennia, and they were Italian.

Knowing that though foreign they could speak Glandelinian because they learned it the Red Cross official asked; "I of the little girl."

"Want to sell your little sister?"

"No sir" she replied earnestly. "She is my only sister. I have."

"How did you and your family happen to be saved when the flood came so suddenly nothing else could be saved, and you lost everything else in the world?"

"Well a man comes riding past at home about seven o'clock in the morning on a horse, yelling to us that the enemy have blasted a levee near Wickey Lamsin, and that other portions of the levee had given way, and telling us to grab whatever we could and make for high ground. I got dressed before any of the rest did for we sleep apart late that morning and by the time the water reached our house I was outside with my little sister gripped firmly by the hand. My mother and three brothers did not have time to save anything. A man picked us up in a rowboat and took us to a levee. He stayed on the levee most of the week on small provisions given us by the men until a steamer known as the Grumwell came along, and brought us here. By that time the whole town where we lived was under water entirely not a house could be seen. I never saw so much water before in my life. And the last I saw of my home it was floating down stream like a ship."

This is one of the tragedies of the flood, this devotion of the refugee children to their brothers and sisters, and even to their pets and their grief over their failure to save them. When the Red Cross relief ship the William cast off the other day with a cargo of provisions for the Big Girl knoll flood territory, thirty miles south of the city one of the passengers was a farmer named Mr. Ben Hunter who rode with his wife and child out of the flood that engulfed them on the farm north of Chamberlaine and landed them safely in the Big Refugee camp at Big Girl knoll.

"Are you going to take the chances of going back to see that you can save?"

she asked.

He grinned.

"There is nothing left on my place to save except my mother's Bible and I'm going back to try and get that Bible," he said, "and I'll test you why. You see when the flood hit us we did not have much time to fool around with salvage work. I've lived in this country long enough to know that our levees will stand, but I never expected anything like what really happened. I reckon the very nation is surprised. Now the word came in the middle of day to pack our stuff and get out of the house because a levee was destroyed by an explosion and a wall of water was on the way. I took my wife and child on the roof, and tied a row boat to the chimney. My little girl is only six years old. My mother who is dead, gave me a Bible, requesting me never for her sake to lose it. Well along before evening we had to light out, not even having time to look up the Bible. But my little girl told me that before we left she had brought out the Bible and nailed it to the roof of my house, and therefore I believe I should go back and get it."

The entire crew of the ship wished him good luck as he doubled back on the route to the Big Girl knoll region determined to get that Good Book, and he did. While a thrilling drama of attempted life saving, while being covered by the fire of many soldiers was unfolding across inundated Angelina Vine State on the 3th of December, engineers directing the forces of rescuers and workers, and also those combating the attempts of the Glandelinians to increase the size and intensity of the Big Girl knoll. The flood adopted a policy of watchful waiting along levee fronts where dire danger was likely to develop as the crest moved on up to the Mississippi River. Hundreds of reports were received at Angelina, Agathia, Dorothy Gale, and many other cities and towns.

From many sections of the flooded areas, word came that the rescuers could not get to remote places were trapped in their homes, and that the rescuers could not get to them because the Glandelinians were frustrating all attempts at rescue now. The task of searching them out in the face of Glandelinian rifle fire and taking them to safety was a job of suicide for both rescuers and rescued now. The Red Cross general Vivienne was preparing to save the rest of his army camp, the flooded districts in boats and chips and to fight it out and do so the rescue work themselves.

About 10,000 were seen on Angelina rising ridge which were threatened to be swallowed up by the rushing, rushing flood waters, and officials expressed regret to the general that none of these could be removed to safety before their refuge would be inundated because the Glandelinians frustrated work of rescue in that direction. With nearly a score of new towns already flooded, others were threatened with serious damage. Water in St. George was three feet deep and rising two inches an hour. South of Angelina where a new threatening situation was being developed by the rising tide in the Aronburgs Run river more than 10,000 men went at to try and combat the flood waters and save the city, while by the new orders of the governor and the christian generals all Glandelinian prisoners who could be sent were conscripted to aid in the work on restoring levees, and under guard of two soldiers per man as these Glandelinians have to be watched. Back waters from the Aronburgs Run Lowlands still were battering the strong levees at Mic-Holleston Run, threatening the town of Mic-Holleston Junction, and had entered the lower sections which were being abandoned. The water was not expected to get much higher. Although the weight of the great Mic-Whirther gun made lake to the north and to the edge of the Mic-Holleston Run levees had a set up a swift southern current, the two hundred and eighty mile front of the Mic-Holleston Run levees still held however against the assault, while hundreds of thousands of men worked on the water side of the levees, preventing sand boils and other breaks.

An increasing feeling of security was noticed also in Big Girl knoll as a result of the forecast of the river bureau that the river there had not risen any more but was continuing to lower. Yet at Big Girl knoll there was more than 1,500,000 of the four million refugees in the sixty eight concentration camps, and all these here were said to be immunized with typhoid and small pox vaccines. With a small scattering of new cases of both diseases reported to the head medical director of the Red Cross the efforts were made to hasten vaccination for all persons in the flood zone since the recession of the waters which were occurring northward very rapidly now was expected to increase the dangers of the plague. Meanwhile the Red Cross, fearing that the levees on the Mic-Holleston Run may also break under the strain of the flood waters from the Mic-Whirther gun crevasses moved to establish new relief centers in the countries of Agathia and close to the Mic-Holleston Regions. Advised by residents of these districts that a break in these levees seemed to be only a matter of time, the national director of disaster relief for the Red Cross ordered supplies and provisions rushed to the region where the relief work was to be maintained chiefly by the local chapters of the organization. Between eight hundred thousand, and one million new refugees were expected in these districts should the flood force the foist to leave Angelina Agathia at night thirty in the morning to go out for a second survey of needed sanitation measures in the Mic-Whirther Run flood regions, and no was to be accompanied by the head doctor of the city, Doctor John G. Grattonia, and also a large party of other doctors and surgeons.

The mayor of Angelina Guthrie, (you ask him his name) was also requested to make the trip. The party was to go first to Big Girl pool, where they would be joined by the city doctor there, Francis, Esq., and also the head of the state health department of Big Whither run and would co-operate with the police, the Abbeonian public health service, and the national health authorities. Their work was mainly to do, to another survey, at these of the most critical critical points, Wickey Leland, Lucille Picken, and Big Girl pool. There it was thought that Dr. Hoff Bliffe previous experience in the other big Calvernia war disasters, and the forest fire and bloody battle disasters, and other war horrors would be very valuable. The Count was then to return to Angelina Guthrie within two weeks, or at least three days before Christmas the day of the birth of Our blessed Lord.

The first of December brought Angelina Guthrie aware of the relief fund above forty million dollars, and the national secretary of the Abbeonian police, head of the volunteer service, of the organization, rescued that city from disaster far more in Abbeonia. For this flood was no sudden dreadful and spectacular catastrophe disaster like forest fires, and the Lake Belicia disaster but a stupendous quiet, steady onrush of water, of which the crisis had not yet been reached, according to her opinion, and that the work of restoring homes was impossible until the crest of the flood had passed. Even then it would be weeks, even months, before the water would have receded so that the authorities could begin restoration.

All the inhabitants of the districts around Angeline, San City and also Angeline Junction and Angeline, and others had become terror stricken by the stupendous devastation brought by the floods to the southward, and therefore nearly all the men, all of all towns and villages near by were working assiduously to stave off further disaster to the one million inhabitants in that region and prevent one hundred and forty million dollars worth of property from being injured.

On the fourth of December Count de Hoff and his followers reached Big Girl pool, with the purpose to confer with the mayor of that city on the following morning. The main danger point now was where the flood of the Mic-whither, Mic-whither, and the Lake Belicia horror were threatening to converge just north of Angeline and Angeline Junction cities. And that vast inland sea clanking the whole northern section of Angelina Guthrie along the west and east banks of the Mic-whither run already had begun to work its way into the big Lake Lake Angeline, and it was feared that at each passing hour the inhabitants would see the waters steadily rise until the crest had passed and increase the horror ten fold.

At about midnight a mysterious earthquake, winds of almost tornado force, and violent blinding blizzard storms added to the flood apprehension in all sections of southern Calvernia and northern Angelina. The earth tremors though only lasting a few sections seconds appeared to extend within a one hundred and sixty mile radius of Angelina Guthrie, and effected all towns not flooded for a distance of a hundred miles so that windows were broken, furniture displaced and structures cracked. Whether an explosion did it or not it was hard to say, but nevertheless an explosion was blamed as they could not account for it otherwise as real earthquake shocks had different tremors and lasting longer.

In the meantime the siege of Vivian Wickey and especially her fortresses was gaining great sway. General Hanson's armies had grown and welled too gigantic size from other armies being sent to its assistance, and worse than that, General Hanson Vivian and his brother and even Williamberger Zimmermanns armies had approached to Vivian Wickey despite the outcome of Calvernia Hills and it certainly did look bad for the enemy. Hanson was concentrating forces of troops and heavy artillery upon a portion of gorm, an called Lieghburg Landing. Here stretched a portion of Vivian Wickey called Tataria, and this portion it was Hanson's purpose to capture. General Robert Vivian was concentrating his armies also but it was not known by either the enemy or the war correspondents where he had placed his great armies but in the direction where he may have had his armies there had been for a long time such a roar of battle, and cannonading, and such fires that was shocking to all who saw and heard it at a great distance. General Conscientious Aronburg or Williamberger Zimmermann himself was moving his immense armies upon Jennie Vivian and the Gloria fortifications along the Sunbeam Creek but he did not expect to become engaged until after December as his plans were to concentrate first as heavily as possible and then to storm the enemy as hard as he could. It was therefore by delay and his best plans of concentration that general Conscientious Aronburg probably fought the first most sanguinary battle of the war that raged for nineteen days along the Sunbeam Creek known as the series of battles of Sunbeam Creek or Jennie Vivian and Gloria. He won too, I'll say.

The armies under general Hanson Vivian, his brother, and Zimmermann, were immense being about one hundred and fifty million pieces, and it did certainly look bad for the enemy.

And to make matters worse general Hanson had seized all towns that had been around Vivian Wickey even was in possession of Carbondale and several times the enemy had during the time of Hanson's approach roared upon Carbondale a titanic artillery duel of great intensity but only to receive a fierce fire of artillery from Hanson and get worsted with terrible destruction and loss of life.

The main one however who was worried was general Purragatorian and He-allister Stanck. Of course to tell the truth the armies under general Hanley, and his great generals had arrived near to Vivian Wickey way before general Hanson or his brother and Zimmermann did, and had son entrained their armies on the Evangelina Grania heights, and at Jurdancallio and Lieghburg Landing but it did not hold a good proposition for Hanley and his cronies were still heavily overwhelmed by the three big national armies and it did not seem as if Vivian Wickey was going to be saved. Hanley's plan however was not to allow the three Christian generals to attack. As Robert Vivian himself was believed to be concentrating a strong force of Nationals before the section of Sunbeam Creek known as Battery Line river and the St. Dominick fortifications Hanley decided to frustrate all plans that Hanson may have in mind.

It was general Hanson's intention to move at once for Evangelina Grania and to have his aiding lieutenant general Hansonin Stanlin to storm the Evangelina heights while he himself was to strike the enemy a blow at Jurdancallio and then capture Evangelina Grania from the south. Hanley must have found out these intentions as so on December 10th prepared to strike Hanson a blow before Hanson could strike him. So according to the outcome in next chapter the battle of Lieghburg Landing really was started by the enemy when general Hanson himself never had any intentions of fighting at all at Lieghburg Landing. Had Hanson been able to follow out his plans and not be attacked first by the enemy all would have gone well and the whole city of Vivian Wickey and her fortresses would have been captured, but he had no idea that general Hanley's armies were at gorm gun until he was attacked by the rebels.

It was also general Hanson's purpose to capture the section of Vivian Wickey called Annie Aronburg and the fortresses near her. He was of course his armies had a chance to attack and drive the enemy for a time before them but to have any good luck at Lieghburg Landing and elsewhere was out of the question. General Hanson had fought with Hanley at Calvernia Hills and elsewhere but at this part of the siege of Vivian Wickey he found out that wicked as he was general John Jackson Hanley was proving himself to be one of the worstest generals. His father was also being commissioned as a general and had big army at his own stead being Jackson Johnston Hanley. At his army was not yet killed upon and it was fortunately that it had not been or otherwise general Hanson could have never reached the city of Vivian Wickey. However he failed to join in the siege though he did succeed in carrying out his plans to leave an immense army there under general Hanson. So now on with the affair first at Aronburg and then Lieghburg Landing!!!

PART TWO OF CHAPTER THREE
THE BEGINNING OF VIVIAN WICKERY'S SERVICE.
THE FATAL BATTLES OF LINGBURG LANDING.

After this he decided to capture the city of Aronburg as proposed and thus hurled forward the ten million men. The attack was desperate, as desperate as any attack can be and resulted in the full withdrawal of the glandelinian divisions toward the city, but to capture the city was out of the question and the glandelinians were repulsed and finally driven back with murderous loss. During the retreat of the glandelinians a scene of peculiar occurrence made all marvel. One of their officers who was a herculean in built was attacked by a score of glandelinians at once but he leaped at them fist to fist and sent one of his assailants hurtling across the ground as if shot from a bow, and then the grayest lay still with a broken jaw. With another blow he felled one of the other assailants but at the same time other hands grouped about him and he was forced to lay about vigorously on both sides. The glandelinians yelling like demons rushed him with the ferocity of mad dogs, and he knocked many of them spinning like a top at every blow. A whistle blew shrilling and other glandelinians came running up. A whistle piped, and almost before he realized it he found himself in the center of a pack of fierce faced men who were struggling like demons to pull him down, and striking at him with clubbed muskets, daggers, sabres, and trying to bayonet him also. With a sudden thrill he realized that this was no ordinary fight, this was deadly, he must beat off these fellows or be killed. But as fast as he cleared them away others came as if by magic until a dozen or more were swarming upon him like hungry ants. They clung to his arms, his legs, his clothing, with a desperate courage wholly remarkable in itself while strokes were aimed at him from every quarter. Thus and again they dragged him off his feet, only to have him shake them loose. Though most of their blows and bayonet and sabre thrusts went wild or found a mark among their own number, many were felled at last by the surviving assailants. At this the survivors never to rise again. At this the surviving assailants fell upon him with fresh fury, and some would have shot him down but Captain, Robert's, Lieutenant Ropes, Lieutenant Baldwin, the Cannon Johnson, and several other strong officers came upon the scene and seeing their officers plight rushed forward with a screaming yell, and a more desperate hand to hand conflict ensued. Baldwin grasped one of the glandelinians and sent the ruffian reeling into a snow bank with a broken neck with one directed blow, that brought the blood to his mouth. Germaine and Cannon rushed into the midst of the ruffians and managed to trip five, and then prostrated the others with telling deadly blows with their pistol butts, and sabred many of the glandelinians, and then sailed into the others like roaring bulls striking out right and left felling their enemies like ten pins, clearing a passage through the starry glandelinians. James pistol cracked as a stalwart glandelinian started toward him and he went down sprawling. Captain Cannon who immediately drew his sabre he found himself surrounded by a number of yellow faced glandelinians with gleaming sabres upraised against him. He however seemed to be getting the best of them all in spite this, felling one after another, but then Robert's pistol cracked spitefully several times also and at each report a form fell and writhed in death agonies. In the meantime the Angolinians had rallied and a desperate hand to hand fight was going on all around. The battle of Lingburg Landing had really begun.

Still more of the glandelinians leaped at the Angolinians. Officers and the supporting Angolinians and again and again plunged into the most desperate hand to hand fights ever seen in the war and the losses at close quarters was dreadful, Angolinians and glandelinians being beaten and shot down mercilessly, while still more greater numbers of glandelinians swept forward to try and capture the Angolinian officers. Other divisions of glandelinians had been coming up and now desperately engaged with the Angolinian battalions which were thrown upon them, the enemy charging forward at a rush and flinging themselves clear through the massive purple surges making desperate efforts to force them back still further.

However a great and strong concentration was massed upon the enemy who battled furiously for six hours in vain hurling thirteen onslaughts against the Christian lines, the firing on both sides being simply dreadful and made the scene like a smoky inferno of a woods affire. However when the enemy seemed to be retreating at last and when general scurrying artillery which started to shell and tear at the enemy's line and simultaneously hurled a curtain storm of shells and hellish destruction upon Annie Aronburg and the regions of Lingburg Landing, a message came and reported to him that a large force of the enemy under a general who was found out to be called Crooket Nose but whose right name was Frank Schmidt had made a desperate assault of tearing violence upon general Vivian's whole line now concentrated along the whole stretch of Tatarin or Lingburg Landing, and that other forces of the foe under Adelo-De-Servus were massing in overwhelming force upon the whole of Hanson's line, and it seemed as if the bloodiest battle of the war was now raging. Evans believed the report because he all that time heard the wildest firing close by that he had ever noticed before in the war and he said: "Blow up every sea bridge across Sunbeam creek and across the Hedge-Rivers and Tamar River, and warn general Vivian to prepare for general action, and to mass his strong batteries upon all the positions of the enemy at gun Aronburg."

"But said the messenger: 'We have blown up the many bridges the very ones you mentioned but the glandelinian column of assault have turned one of their wings and are now advancing it from Lingburg Hook toward general Vivian's left wing commanded by general Ben Benigan in person. General Ben Benigan's general Vivian's have some of his forces moved across plankton River and cut off general Calamunda Ghosman from the sea in Aronburg Woods so that he cannot make any junction with Hanson during this great assault.'"

It was right just as he said. A large force of the enemy under general Crooket Nose proceeded with a perfect stream of skirmishers had already crossed. They had rushed on with a shout toward the Christian line under generals Benigan and Benignus. Crooket's corps consisting of Benignus right though surprised by an overwhelming force met the enemy bravely his men pouring in a deadly fire, while general Great Heart sent a messenger to warn general Vivian which was accomplished and though general Vivian's line was soon engaged and met the desperate attack of the enemy fiercely general Great Heart did not have any good luck and after hard fighting for several hours his troops were forced to give way even before reinforcements could reach him. Benigan and Benignus still held their positions having repelled the enemy's assault in overwhelming numbers and tearing the enemy's line to pieces, but elsewhere the enemy still met success.

Having swept back Crooket's troops the glandelinians swept on with wild yells like mad furious gray billows and the next blow came upon Mc-Gantler's great host of Abyssinians. The attackers that assaulted his line were Zassaramians, Mo-Gellostians, gargolians, and Ouarians and the fighting was most terrific and the firing on both sides incessant the discharge of firearms being one long continuous roar. During this terrific firing and fighting the enemy succeeded in breaking a portion of Mc-Gantler's line but one of their general Turner Anderson was killed, and general Hardacre Francis severely wounded and the losses of the glandelinians so inconceivably heavy that they were checked. At other portions of the battle line the enemy still swept on and as more troops were concentrated upon them the fighting went on with redoubled fury brought on awful slaughter, but nevertheless a fierce rush of Zassaramians broke the Christian line in the middle under general Joseph Mc-Gantler the other Mc-Gantler's brother. A dangerous breach was visible now but as the foe columns rushed through the other portion of the line delivered a most furious discharge of fire arms and the glandelinians fell in columns.

The moment however was terrible on both sides, as the foe rushing to better shelter returned a storming fire. The Angolinians now started hammering away with their cannons the destruction of life became more appalling the glandelinians lying in windrows like grass cut by a lawnmower. The glandelinians now being held in check at all points of both Mc-Gantler's lines their troops assembled in double wing wedges and despite the heavy assault of the enemy being timed with redoubled fury retained their formation unbroken. The conflict now was awful as general Vivian rushed fresh troops to hold the line firm.

Not for a single moment did the roar of musketry and cannon cease, and general virian continuing to mass a concentration of troops caused the firing along the christian line to shake the ground with great force from the concussion. Through whole corps of the indians had fallen riddled with bullets hundreds of thousands of the glandelinians came on at another point and flung themselves against the christian flank under general Francis Henryson driving them back and breaking up the whole column, driving it into hopeless confusion.

Along general Mac-Gentlers, and Henry Adden had divisions of glandelinians under cannon, and had been wiped out. A long chain of machine guns and had been wiped out. Nevertheless the two divisions of christians under the two Mac-Gentlers were becoming terribly thin. Through all the seemingly endless slaughter along his own lines, genligan did not lose his courage and as the fierce turnermans, yelling like demons came headlong at his forces the angelinians fairly tore their main line to pieces with a well directed withering fire that roared like a world of planets bursting to pieces. The smoke and f of firearms and cannon increased as more came to the aid of the angelinians under Benighman and along his lines the battle raged with increasing fury. Here however the enemy charged against overwhelming numbers, but never theless they started to surge over the christian works in a perfect wave and the angelinians fairly swung their muskets, and used their bayonets and pikes, and daggers, like mad-men but on and on they pressed while at other points many more thousands of glandelinians began to press over general Joseph Mac-Gentlers positions his own men, clubbing, cutting, stabbing and firing away point blank like fierce cannibals and those using pistols hammered away. Scores of thousands of angelinians at once met the surging enemy furiously, pouring in a terrible fire, but the foe pressed forward still more desperately fighting hand to hand at every step, general Mac-Gentler trying to restore order within his lines. The struggle raging hand to hand was terrific but as concentration of troops were sent in the enemy was soon compelled to yield, and over the whole line of works sprang whole divisions of christians to the charge, and over the plain and meadows they rushed after the retiring enemy, but the fire along the foe line was so terrific that hundreds of the christians fell at every step, but the survivors still rushed on sailing into the glandelinians mowing down many thousands, and capturing many prisoners.

Joseph Mac-Gentlers forces were however crushed to fragments during the charge as the enemy leaders brought up fresh columns, but genligans divisions still rushed on charging toward the enemy, while Mac-Gentlers line was driven back crushed to fragments. His brothers were also driven back mangled and bleeding. Nevertheless Benighmans whole line pressed onward toward a long stone wall where Crookets whole line was retreating, and where more glandelinians were entrenched with a long line of cannons. To take this stone wall seemed impossible but nevertheless it was decided to be attempted so genligan reforming his troops ordered them forward and to the charge they again swept. The cannoniers behind the stone wall began loading and firing as rapidly as possible and the christians now went down like grain before the thrashing machine. Nevertheless the survivors of Jule Benighmans forces assailed the glandelinians at the stone wall with terrible fury but the enemy made a very brave defense pouring a most galling fire that again mowed the christians down like grain before the thrashing machine. The survivors still undaunted continued to rush on steadily, but to the surprise of the angelinians instead of yielding, the glandelinians with fixed bayonets sprang over the wall and while their own cannons were again dealing awful havoc among the christian lines, the glandelinians counter charged the massed angelinian columns who with their lines torn in places, and every one of their regimental flags shot to pieces retreated in the wildest confusion. A succession of explosions occurred toward their right coming to throw the contents of the world into the air and the din was ear-splitting and sounding like a hundred billion cannon going off simultaneously.

The scene was like madmen's hell in supreme confusion, but by dint of courage the christian officers managed to rally a portion of the confused angelinian troops while general Mac-Gentler now ordered forward his battalion which soon rushed forward toward the advancing glandelinians with fixed bayonets, while another division was sent forward under the support of a battery of light artillery, which were unlimbered and ploughed breaches in the enemy's lines.

On and on rushed the battalions closing with the massed army and driving them back, but most of the foe again retreated to the wall, and then general Pugnose brought up divisions of Gonsentians and these were hurled upon the christian attackers, but the assault supported by Abyssinians was so inconceivably violent that even general soon general Pugnose was doing his utmost to keep his men from faltering, while Crooket passed men rallying behind the wall soon started in pouring terrific volleys anew upon the surging christian waves. Then while the christians again broke into confusion general Pugnose brand brandishing his sabre cried in a loud voice that could be heard above the din of the frightful battle:

Instantly with most frightful yells that fairly deafened the christians the glandelinians again rushed forward fairly stampeding forward toward the battalions of Angelinians who retreated to the wooded plains and started to pour a murderous fire from behind trees and rocks as they slowly retreated and once again the scene was like a smoky inferno. The glandelinians slightly faltered for a moment, but their leaders spurred them on, and again they pressed forward but now the discharge of firearms from the retiring christians became so galling and destructive that it looked as though the many thousands of glandelinians who fell, were just doing it to lie down and die, but they were hit and fello to rise no more. Again the survivors faltered, but their officers thundered orders to press forward, and again they rallied and rushed forward once more returning the fire furiously, while the gunners left behind at the stone wall now commenced pouring a storm of shells into the woods and filled it with a maddening inferno of deafening explosions, and death and destruction to boot.

Just as the survivors of the glandelinians reached the stone wall the angelinians suddenly appeared in greater numbers, and with fixed bayonets and with loud deafening shouts, and war of war cries of every description plunged at the graycoats. Pistols, revolvers, forty fours, six shooters, muskets and rifles were discharged, face to face, while again hundreds per second fell under the bayonet thrusts, rifles and muskets also being used as clubs, but despite their losses the enemy strove against overwhelming numbers, and with super human efforts and with amazing courage, to force their way into the wooded inferno of the battle-hell and force the same scorching floods in purple and red uniforms back. But fiercer and fiercer the christians fought and now the enemy being slower and in the woods began to fall in myriads and now confusion broke out among the surviving glandelinians, and being once more driven they fought all the way back to the stone wall the furious angelinian battalions pressing on their color bearers flourishing their tattered banners, the angelinians once more being determined to carry the stone wall. The glandelinians' glandelinian cannons were discharged again and again with the most destructive effect but on pressed the battalions who were now supported by infantry and more artillery and so even Gonsentinian cavalry, and with a yell rushed forward with irresistible force even swarming over and struck at the enemy furiously, the enemy fighting like demons, stabbing and striking and firing upon the charging christian cavalry with all the energy they could assume. But more and more of the Angelinians swarmed over and step by step the enemy at first fell back then broke and fled precipitately, the angelinians being now in full possession of the stone wall. But could they hold it? At the moment they had captured the stone wall a force of fresh glandelinians under general Pallen had arrived with five hundred cannon of heavy calibre, and with machine guns to add, and he deployed his troops to check the further success of the christians, and then his artillery opened with still more destructive effect, and then by a desperate counter attack the foe checked the angelinians, first, and then by another counter charge drove them back in confusion, and again brandishing his sabre general Pugnose ordered another charge, and again with bloodcurdling yells the glandelinians once more charged, but encountered a scene as scathing fire from the christian machine guns, and so appalling was the slaughter of the glandelinian troops that some of the surviving columns broke into confusion. Some of the other columns however still swept on returning a deadly fire themselves, but the angelinian forces who had taken possession of the stone wall discharged the captured cannon with all their energy and most incessantly for several minutes, and so badly was the glandelinians were torn up, that the onset also having no effect the appalling survivors were compelled to fall back, the other troops of angelinians also managing to hold general Failens forces at bay until general Jones came, arrived with two more divisions and still more artillery bridge brigades. Rallying the combined forces under Pugmose and Failen, the glandelinians again rushed forward and once more a regular hail of firing broke out along the christian lines. Fiercer and fiercer this time became the desperate attack of the men enemy and awful was the roar of storm of flames and in the enemy suffering excruciating losses now, but rallying after some confusion the survivors resumed the attack with unabated fury, the ground now being strewn with heaps of dead and dying, the enemy meeting with such desperation that it was amazing to see.

Despite the fact that along this point the battle was being broken and mangled, and general janson who was watching every outcome of the battle, was also watching the enemy whose right was contending with his own left in all their violence, the glandelinians having however attacked in a cautious manner as they had found out that they had quite enough to do, as they had crossed countered and attacked.

As they now made a furious rush his men brought down thousands simultaneously by delivering a volting fire. But the great wave of gray coats closed the gap, and now charged more cautiously now since they had been discovered. They came forward with such force and fury that they soon swarmed over the works and drove in at the christians and firing some of the most terrible volleys right into their very faces.

T They managed to press some distance over and beyond the works but general janson's generals had also commenced a great concentration that soon drove the glandelinians out after more fiercer fighting.

Other divisions soon came on to renew the attack, and despite the raking fire they met, charged up to the works like a swarm of an angry gray bees and again a furious hand to hand fight raged. There were quick exchanges of blows with musket butts, and several christian lieutenants cut down three stalwart glandelinians who rushed upon them with drawn sabres. The lieutenants were quick and watchful as a cat, and they knew enough to keep out of the way of the swinging blows of the sabres of the glandelinian officers. Indeed all of the Angelinians were keeping up a skilful fight but they were being slowly pressed back. A glandelinian officer even rushed at captain janson as he was dashing right and left on his horse, but captain janson brought his sabre down on his assailant's head a blow that sent the glandelinian to his knees, and then outstretched on the ground with his head split and his arm cut off, and the upper part of his chest split.

A large mass of purple coats now appeared at the rear of the furious enemy, and as the whole christian force on the right of general Hanson's divisions left wing gave way, the flanking christians were approaching nearer unexpected by the glandelinians, and every moment approached nearer yet. They now began pouring volleys upon the wicked glandelinians driving them into some confusion but the survivors quickly rallied and the larger part of their force turned upon the flankers and pressed them back. The christian left grand division had however received heavy reinforcements from the rest of the main line and were also rallying to make a greater effort.

Suddenly as the conflict was abating a little several general officers galloped up to janson and said excitedly:

"A large force of glandelinians under a general called called by the name of Boe-Booe with his frightful banners of skulls and bones flying has advanced with general Butcher Go after crossing the river by pontoon bridges several miles from glandelin neck and have swept upon the big christian forces under general Helderf and his lines are now hidden in a mass of smoke by the frequent discharge of firearms. Not much of his forces are hurled back yet but the enemy under general Butcher Go has crossed the river beyond his rear, and is well on the move to attack general janson's divisions on his flank."

This was confirmed by a pall of smoke that hung over the forces at that far distance and of the incessant roar of firearms and artillery and he knew that Boe-Booe's men were in vigorous action and by the desperate defense of his forces the enemy had some difficulty in gaining their rear and in breaking the christian line, who were keeping their formation unbroken despite the galling fire of the enemy's battle batteries, and of the firing of infantry that was sweeping their men down in mass as at once.

at the heavy fire of the enemy had inside of fifteen minutes swept thirty thousand christians out of existence. The battle had started with the attack on Aronburg at five o'clock that morning and it was now twelve o'clock noon and the battle was only raging with redoubled fury all along the whole entire christian line of all the main commanders combined. Even general Evans was fiercely engaged and the roaring of firing along his lines resembled a million cannon thundering incessantly, and probably there was from the din. Even along general Evans' lines the attack of the enemy was the most violent and fiercest. Along this portion of the battle line the firing was wild, but accurate, and the enemy had to be cautious and advanced with a rush firing at every step. General Evans had already reported to general Hanson of the wounding of ten of his best generals, and two others who were dying, and that his own left wing was without a commander entirely. His batteries however were in good shape and only general Helderf which was on general Evans' center seemed to be in some danger for the enemy assailants being mostly gargolians were close up to the christian positions and it also could be seen by general Helderf's surviving generals that the infuriated glandelinians were making the most desperate effort to get around his rear, despite the deadly fire, and counter attack of the christians on the other side defending a long line of salients and rifle pits, and ledges of rocky ground, besides a long strip of woods, and defenses crossing the Ruben Creek. Here the attack was most desperate. Other christian forces at the same point which had been thrown into action by general Evans were also keeping up such a lively discharge of firearms and artillery that thousands of brave glandelinians fell and lay most of them with outstretched arms on the ground. The nearer the surviving glandelinians came the more continuous was the fire of the christian line and more frightful was the carnage.

The christian generals rode up and down their veteran line encouraging them by word and example, while on an on pressed the glandelinians in fearful array, and frightful became the roar of firing as sixteen hundred fresh cannon burst forth into action, and general Phila long brigades of cannon also kept up an awful uproar upon but nevertheless with devilish yells the glandelinians still continued to rush on the glandelinians not faltering this time and with more deafening yells rushed right among the christians and the hand-to-hand fighting was terrible to see. The glandelinians despite their contending with overwhelming numbers continued to press on but most of the christian line still held firm despite the fact that scores of thousands of the nearest glandelinians made a sudden rush with fixed bayonets making the slaughter hard to hand more awful.

At the moment that the broken christian lines were dashing up through the thick smoke haze and charged with their flags flying and crashed upon the veterans who plied their firearms and artillery with more destructive effect than before tearing the enemy lines to bits. Despite all the fiercer resistance the survivors of the glandelinians still madly rushed on with apparently irresistible force and again surged up against the remainder of the christian line, but the christians however made such a desperate defense that the surviving glandelinians with baffled rage and confusion retired their many colored standards all ragged and torn by the fierce storm of bullets disappearing out of sight among the wood smoke shrouded trees.

"Charge!" screamed the many christian commanders waving their sabres. The veteran soldiers and their command leaped over the banks of earth and charged toward the retreating glandelinians. On and on rushed the rushed the Angelinians still onward they pressed but at the center portion of a large plain they were suddenly opposed by a large division of mounted glandelinian cavalry. A renewed hot fight at once ensued, but the mounted cavalry was forced back the christians still pressing on and swarming over the whole open plain surrounded on every side by a half charred forest. Here a fresh force of glandelinians under general Hankergoon appeared rushing and flooding over the left of the large plain, and yelling like demons they soon came charging forward.

"Stand firm!" yelled the christian commanders. Then waving their sabres as the big swarms of the enemy came rushing on they ordered a terrific counter onset. With a cheer the fierce Angelinians dashed forward. There was a simultaneous discharge of musketry from both sides as the christians tore their way clean through the swarming wedge of glandelinians and now they used their bayonets with alarming effect.....(A. J. J.)

The struggle on the plain was indeed terrific. The christians fought the enemy with the greatest and savage fury and with amazing desperation. More fearful grew the struggle as the glandelinians tried with great courage to press on but the christians only fought the more harder. They fairly met the charge of the enemy as only a army of men could do and fought with such desperation that they soon drove the glandelinians back with exorciating loss and also with the deaths of their generals James Pieface, and general Grabapple Isaac.

In the meantime the conflict raged fiercely along general vilians whole line. The glandelinians here however were pressing the Angelinians back step by step. On pressed the enemy fairly hewing down the christians and forcing themselves through their very lines. But the brave christians defended their positions as desperately as they knew how, and soon general diamond took cowardly force of gonsentinians came up to the scene at a gallop and swept the enemy down in as many numbers as a sack would kill a big swarm of flies with their murderous fire.

The slaughter of the glandelinians caused by the cowardly was frightful. The enemy's fire death awful havoc among the troop of cowardly but they did not falter, and even the charge of the cowardly was too much for the glandelinians, and the enemy were compelled to retire. At one thirty o'clock there was a lull in the fierce conflict. Then at quarter to two a division of the enemy came cowardly suddenly appeared along general gindermine front dashing out of an open wood. At once his Angelinian veterans began to pour in their fierce volleys into the massive gray lines from behind the breastworks, while five hundred cannon was discharged and again the battle raged, and in the midst of the bedlam the christian officer general pansoda balls fell shot through the head. At the same time there was a shrill of smoke the firing being so fierce and monstrous gaps appeared in the lines of the enemy's cowardly, but the surviving horsemen came tearing on like rascals returning volley after volley, and again the christian troops discharged their muskets, a while the gunners were reloading their cannon as fast as they could, and then the Angelinian generals in command of a force of gonsentinian, Angelinian, and Abyssinian lihan cowardly ordered a counter charge. Over the breastworks sprang then the perfect swarm of christian horsemen in blue, purple and red, charged fiercely toward the enemy, closed and grappled with them, and after an inconceivable slump of men and horses, and a scene of some of the wildest confusion finally drove them back. General Jack Dane found plenty of work to do many times making charges upon the enemy's lines, now here, now there, appearing suddenly in unexpected places dealing all the havoc he could until he fell seriously wounded.

There was again a short lull then at five minutes after two the glandelinians were seen ascending the hills as rapidly as possible. The Angelinians again rushed upon the glandelinians with fixed bayonets, only to face a galling fire and were repulsed, thousands being killed and wounded. The enemy soon renewed the attack against the christian position and ginsentions cowardly cowardly divisions were directly in line with a part of this impetuous charge but stood their ground finally pouring a series of terrific volleys upon the enemy. A division of general Hanson vilians veterans quickly supported Wisnetien and after a hard fight and a terrific counter charge drove the enemy back once more. Wisnetien charged at the head of his brave cowardly divisions and the glandelinians were sent flying greatly to the amazement and rage of their generals.

In the meantime a large body of glands, glandelinian infantry under general Swine was sent forward by Ma Hanley and wheeling his infantry made a furious charge upon Godfreys left flank who though being surprised made a most determined resistance, and held them back, until unable to hold out any longer, when they began to give way, but one of general pansoda large brigades came to the rescue, and their leader charged furiously at the head of their men and again drove the glandelinians back.

A, along general Benligan positions far in front over the distant plains in front of the enemy positions the large feathered hats of general Hellers glandelinians of his right and left wing, appeared coming toward the right and center of Wisnetiens divisions. Soon another long great line of the foe appeared to surge forward while the struggle with the other forces was being renewed. It was evident that general Hanley was determined to force general Hanson vilians and his brother at all costs.

The glandelinians advancing upon the right wing of the christians were deployed in three huge columns and as they came nearer general brigades divisions deployed into a long line and began being commanded by Phil in person started destructive firing. Then at ginsentions command a million one hundred thousand men rushed out in one long line with fixed bayonets to meet the foe and soon engaged the center of the massive gray line. As the center of these glandelinians was separated from the left and right wings they were outnumbered by the Angelinians ten to one. Yet the tremendous odds did but slight effects in checking them. With appalling yells they flung themselves upon the Angelinians with the ferocity of demons mowing the christians down again like grass, and then with their musket butts they beat them down like sheep, and bayoneted hundreds per minute. The Angelinians were now rapidly giving way but general Phils brigades delivered a murderous fire and raced forward only to meet a storming fire along the enemy's lines. Though they dropped in myriads the survivors rushed on, and supported the other forces, crowding them up, stayed their retreat, which would have been a total rout if commenced, and after more desperate fighting the center of these glandelinians was forced back. The left and right wings had started to encircle the Angelinians but they were now compelled to fall back, and supporting the shrunken center and they were just in time and it soon began to look as if the glandelinians were going to conquer in the hand to hand fight on even ground. Another division of the enemy from the left wing was seen approach approaching right from the breast. Breastworks already captured and rushing toward their second line of works. "How men this is our time." cried the Angelinian commanders as they waving their sabres. "Make every shot tell."

As the cannons were brought into action there was a perfect fusillade and every shot told mowing the glandelinians down as fast as they came on. But with mad yells the survivors came rushing up toward the second line of breastworks, but the battalions at the order of their commanders charged upon them, broke the first line of the enemy and scattered scattered it in all directions.

But the rest who were attacking Godfreys men cut in the field were pressing on savagely. The position of the Angelinians at the breastworks was such that they could fire directly into the enemy's flank and they did, although they took good care to mow down those of the enemy in the thickest of the fight. By this awful havoc added, the Angelinians were enabled to press forward and after still more desperate fighting force the divisions of the glandelinians back.

Dead dead and wounded lay in many windrows and swarmed the plains like grains of sand and though the flanking fire was mowing down their best men the glandelinians who were at first confused by the unexpectedness of it soon rallied and pressed forward once more with greater force.

At one point now the christian line was weakening for the charge of the glandelinians was so terrific that nothing human could withstand it. Suddenly there was a little break in their lines and the foe closed in with a cheer and broke through and turned the flank of Wisnetiens army and nearly capturing the general himself who escaped by a narrow margin.

As a result the Angelinians to the rage and surprise of their leaders were thrown into great confusion, and despite the efforts of their officers broke away and retired. Soon all along this part of the line the conflict began to cease having lasted over four hours that afternoon. The Angelinians under general ginsentions had still retained their main position for the enemy had failed to force it, and had lost over five hundred thousand in slain in the four hours struggle in the afternoon. In the meantime continuous hostilities still prevailed along other portions of general pansoda's lines. General Evans cowardly and brigades under his brother John Evans had made several desperate charges in their endeavor to open a general gap in the enemy's lines, and in the third onset they pressed on at a lively clip having been severely repulsed in the other two.

As they neared a large plain close to the Tataria river within the vicinity of Leighburg landing general John Evans who was with this immense command saw many large puffs of smoke in the distance, and six hundred and sixty gaps tore into the first column of veterans, and the Angelinians wavered for the moment at the unexpectedness of this new artillery fire. But suddenly from behind an angle of works in the great plain a large mass of glandelinians under general Pugnose appeared in three lines which quickly formed into one huge solid column.

The main column of christians had elowed up in their advance ar across the wide meadow quickly supported by artillery, and they all still pressed on with fixed bayonets in the face of a galling fire. More glandelinians appeared and started a storming fire. Had this been all general John Evans's men need have felt but little alarm. But another mass appear ed under general Ganat ar, and still another. The Angelinia Angelinians now dropped to their knees or laid down leveled their mskets, and opened a general fire. Three million three hundred ad thirty thousand of the ferocious glandelinians confronted them and returned a deadly fire.

A more terrible fire was being delivered by the enemy who had also halted and laid down like the Angelinians had, but soon some of the nearest had arisen and was coming forward again with a rush but not yelling. And indeed this was not the worst. All the Angelinians had believed it possible to retreat should the struggle with the three immense columns of Glandelinians prove unsuccessful. But as general John Evans chanced to cast a glance to the rear a sharp cry of alarm escaped his lips. A most terrifying sight was revealed.

He could not believe his own eyesight. There plainly visible, advancing threateningly were four more columns of the glandelinians, armed with the bayonet. Hemmed in behind as well as in front. Words cannot depict the situation. To retreat retreat to the right was impossible for high walls of rocks were in position of the enemy also and extended to the distance of three miles. It was surely a trap which they had fallen into.

"On merciful god," Gasped general John Evans. "We are in a trap and actually besieged."

A whole line of Abbiecians numbering 23,344,444 came swarmed into whole blotches across the plain and his blades away at the enemy from rear and front the mskets of the brave christians making a deafening roar that reverberated loud and cont inuous and scores of thousands of the glandelinians began to drop into dead and wounded at once, and the first line wavered, but the survivors returned the same deadly fire, tearing up the whole christ ian line. The firing was dreadful and the whole plain was fogged in smoke. Here the fiercest part of the whole first day of the battle seemed to be raging. It was like an inferno of hell broken out on the plains, and many officers of all rank on the christian side generally not excepted fell dead or wounded by the score, and fearful as the firing was the broken lines of the foe reformed quickly and again advanced in a fury that was dreadful to behold being urged on by their officers. Cannons shook the plain like an earthquake, the plains and the enemy's lines were seemingly shrouded in the smoke of explosions but still the attack continued more desperately and there seemed to no time to lose in disposing of the brutal Glandelinians and accordingly four columns of the Angelinians lay flat and poured in a series of deadly deafening volleys miles long until the whole region became filled with smoke.

Hundreds of the glandelinians literally fell per second all along the line, but the others seemed to resist the storm of mskets balls and cannon volleys. Meanwhile the glandelinians in the rear were still advancing and it began to look as if a hand to hand fight was certain. General John Evans placed a fresh revolver in his belt bullet in his revolver and waited until one of the glandelinian officers had come within range. Then with deliberate aim he fired the shot directly in the officers abdomen, and the glandelinian with a dying groan plunged forward and fell in a heap on the snow.

Then another series of destructive volleys four miles long were discharged and one whole line of graycoats the same length was disposed of.

But the second line had soon closed with the right of general Evans forces and the brave Angelinians were now combatting them with the butts of their mskets and using their bayonets, and sabres and army knives and pistols and it looked as if two whole nations were grappling hand to hand and the whole fight seemed for the width of three miles across the plain and was horrible to witness, the struggle being a most terrible one hundred of thousands falling immediately at the first clash hand to hand, and the Angelinians themselves were slaughtered in frightful numbers, and still the survivors strove in vain to drive them back. It seemed as if all of civilis civilization was broken up and was trying to slay each other by the nation full.

The wedge of glandelinians might have been driven back with the aid of the general columns but they could not aid them for the four other columns of the glandelinians in the rear were now upon them and the situation had reached a most startling and critical phase. A most awful hand to hand encounter now also followed in the rear, and of course they were enabled to give the glandelinians a good display of their pikes and bayonets and got pistol and mskets volleys face to face to face, but though the serious resistance brought whole scores of thousands down per second for those few moments the survivors pressed on clubbing away with their mskets, or using their own bayonets or thrusting, and stabbing madly, and striking all about them right and left. The scene looked like a maddened hell let loose upon earth, hell with its sulphurous fumes and with the legions of demons let loose upon christianity with the purpose of annihilating all of gods faithful servants. It was now indeed a very desperate fight and the tumult was beyond describing. Again and again the Angelinians under general John Evans surged up against the massive gray lines, and shot, and clubbed, and bayoneted many thousands down per minute, and stabbed countless numbers with their bayonets and pikes. John Evans plunged his sabre into the abdomen of a glandelinian general he was struggling with. He was bleeding from a score of wounds received from the sabre of the glandelinian. Fortunately however Evans's sabre had suddenly struck a vital spot and the glandelinian general fell and lay in death agony. It was found that the main leader of these fierce glandelinian assailants was Shoozavie and Adole-De-Garbo, and Accourante, and also general Leonia Moldonia Jelwell.

General John Evans hardly waited to regain his breath but turned to the assistance of the rest of his generals who were struggling with the furious crushing glandelinians. At this moment he saw one of his most own beloved friends underneath one of the brutes. The glandelinian was about to shoot him with his pistol which he aimed at the colonels head. With a wild cry of horror and a thrill of deadly resolution John Evans threw himself forward in a mad effort to save the generals life.

John Evans was just in time to save the Angelinian general from a horrible death at the hands of a cowardly brute. The loaded pistol of the stalwart Glandelinian would most assuredly have put an end to his existence had it not been for timely action. Just in time John Evans thrust his sabre through the cheek of the glandelinian, and shoved the blade into his throat. The glandelinian with a howl of rage and pain he gave Evans a blow with the butt of his pistol which sent him reeling many yards away. He was upon his feet almost instantly. Spring beyond the feet of the crushing glandelinians Evans hastily jammed a cartridge into his pistol. Then he fired almost point blank at the human fiends and several of them fell. The scene was now like a whole sale massacre of two nations going one on massacring the other. The surviving glandelinians were rushing on and back and forth among the Angelinians and several more of them rushed at John Evans yelling like demons. John fired his pistols incessantly until they were empty. Then he snatched a well loaded double barreled shot gun from the ground and fired. A glandelinian officer and a private went down sprawling simultaneously head over heels. Again he fired the shot gun and another fell upon the snow. Again and again John Evans reloaded and fired the repeater with deadly effect while the desperate hand to hand fight around him was growing fiercer every moment. The line attacking his men was now broken and wavered but the rest meeting with no resistance had come on with the same continuous fury. The Angelinians had closed their shattered ranks and was firing again moving down lines of the assailants each time the slaughter being awful but upon every hand now the glandelinians were again swarming upon the christ ians and the second storm of hand to hand fighting was more awful.

General Jack Evans however had seen this occurrence and realized that his brother was attacked on two sides with appalling fury and that his escape was also out off he decided to do something mighty quick. Fifteen minutes had passed since the hand fighting started and he took in the situation of the battle at a sweeping glance. He was determined that his brother should retain that plain at all hazards. He had at hand general John Benligans divisions and these he ordered forward to strike his brothers enemy enemies who were attacking him from behind in the flank, while others were sent forward to try and get around those who were posted behind the long high ledge of rocks and take them in the rear.

Then he massed his batteries away from bombarding Aronburg and concentrated them upon the enemy attacking his brothers rear and soon tore large gaps in the line of assassins. The fresh columns which had been sent forward surged against the enemy rear, and now general Kindermans sent one quarter of his division on to the same ledge of tall rocks and struck the blow just as Evans wished about the same point and struck the blow just as Evans wished but the Christians met such an exasperating fire that their impetuous advance was stopped. A large battalion of light artillery was sent also to the support and which kept up a incessant discharge but it seemed but lie, and the fury of the battle only extended further and the enemy continued to press on against against John Evans, while those defending the long ledge of rocks met the Christians in determined resistance. At all points it seemed useless for the Christian Christians to stem that tide. Gertrude Angeline even who had been attending the wounded behind the firing line, took aim at a glandelinian officer who had tried to bayonet her and shot him down. Even while at her duty when ever a glandelinian rushed toward her she fired with telling effect and stuck to her post under all conditions and made the very enemy feel awed of her. The onrushing columns of glandelinians were now forcing their way across the whole plain and even though a fire of fresh artillery was concentrated upon them they could not be stopped, the numerous masses of glandelinian infantry armed with long bayonets surging with impetuous array through the Christian columns and there was soon a perfect backwards flow of Christian army as troops the enemy driving both John Evans and Benligans troops back despite their heavier numbers.

General Goehorns glandelinians with fixed bayonets attacked while bridges brigades with terrible fury. Time and again the biggest glandelinian columns of all were driven back mangled and bleeding, while lines making determined resistance. Nevertheless for a time new columns added to general Goehorns glandelinians and with the utmost determination of carrying the works charged again, and soon swarmed over the very works bayonetting the Christians fiercely, or obliterating down masses and shooting down hundreds. A every pistol volley, and cutting down the brave artillery men with their pikes. General Philans divisions arrived hastily and hurled themselves upon the glandelinians, clubbing, bayonetting and firing and stabbing with all their grit, but general Phil had been killed with ten of his generals and twenty others wounded, his brigades had been reduced to regiments, and the infuriated foe could not be checked, the glandelinians pressing on with all their might, cutting, slashing clubbing and stabbing like axe brigades in a fire. Two generals on the enemy side were killed and twenty eight wounded, but it did not daunt their courage, and even men when many more masses of Angulians added to the more efforts success seemed no nearer. The battle was a roaring screaming inferno of damnation. The Angulians in their desperation clubbed away with the butts of their muskets, even a hail of bayonets failed to check them, and back once more were thrown the Angulians general Aronburg rushed on the Christian side was killed, and a so more Angulians arrived and rallied those driven back the scene of carnage became appalling. It was indeed a horrible battle and enough men lay on the ground now along this portion of the battle line that they could have been piled up all along the line for miles and used as breastworks. Indeed the Angulians being again reinforced tried still harder to stand their ground despite the loss of so many of their generals generals both sides clubbing, shooting and bayonetting each other fiercely. The enemy again pressed forward irresistibly and drove all before them but swift as a flash general James parry's command urged forward despite the appalling resistance his troops hurling themselves upon the Angulians also pressing their torn and ragged line hard threatening to crush it to fragments. Only a second did the glandelinians gaze at the retreating Angulian columns wrathfully ere they charged forward once more with firr estile force and again threw themselves upon the Christians assailing them savagely and driving them back still further in confusion.

The Christian troops under a general called Stowmell Jackson and a also fell back with their leader mortally wounded, but still many of the other columns under general James Bob, Raderma, and M Benligan retained their formation unbroken though they received a series of most desperate assaults in double line. General parry's divisions were sent by general Jack Evans to stem the tide of disaster, and these hurried forward as quickly as possible, and to all the Christians it meant the fiercest kind of a hand to hand fight win where the Angulians must do their fighting at close quarters at many intervals. General Kindermans whole line of positions were defended by many musketry and cannon, but yet there was also a great danger of his forces being hemmed in from seaward and being trapped like general John Evans army had been. The new divisions soon arrived pairing in a most terrific fire upon the enemy and trying to force the foe masses back. On pressed the glandelinians only to be brought up sharply by abutting wall of bayonets behind of which was a perfect wedge of yelling red coats presenting bayonets and pikes. The glandelinians however attacked with the ferocity of demons demons and strove with might and main to press in upon this solid wall of pointed steel and endeavored to drive the Angulians back with their own pikes and bayonets but two more brigades of Christians arrived and got into fierce action and were thrown upon the glandelinians, and the glandelinians thus along general kinder nines front were forced to recoil though elsewhere they were pressing on successfully. Only along Kindermans front the enemy failed to gain any success and the Abyssinkillians seeing them retreating pressed forward themselves with fierce and wild yells that rang the very hills and valleys with deafening echoes that rebounded a million times like the outcries of wild savages and demons put together, a yell that fairly outcried that of the glandelinians, and the enemy broke and fled precipitately.

Along gone general John Evans left the glandelinians were still pressing their attack though swollen back elsewhere, and the Angulians along this point was falling back in confusion because of Evans being dangerously wounded. Over this outcome general Jack Evans was furious, and he blamed half of his officers for not doing as he told them declaring that they frustrated his purposes by making the fatal blunder of standing ground in the plains when they should have attacked the enemy there just and of letting their forces be attacked. This was true in most cases and general Jack Evans cursed and swore loudly and drove forward with his cavalry to do all possible to rally the confused troops. All along his own line even the count was more hotter and bloodier, a terrific onset being made with terrible violence, the glandelinians concentrating in great numbers upon him, but while he did his best to restore order in his brothers left wing, he simultaneously hurled all his Abyssinkillians upon his own assassins and soon repulsed the foe with the complete destruction of 6,000,000 glandelinians within four hours. The fray was the wildest ever imagined, the firing roared roaring like millions of cannon and while he was striving to a still rescue order in general John Evans line a second terrible charge was made upon him and led by the glandelinians under general Darger Raderma and his brother glandelinian, and these glandelinians threatened to force all before them in spite of facing overwhelming numbers the attack of the Abyssinkillians being made with great vigor and most appalling to fury, the ferocious glandelinians frightfully distorting their faces hideously like demons, and giving forth a storm of universal yells. Many terrible and most horrible volleys were delivered by general Jack Evans long chains of artillery and even loud reverberating explosives told that hundreds of mines were being used in the attempt to check the furious onslaught. The glandelinians attacked in long lines, but several of their main line of assaults had encountered a withering fire and seemed to be melting away. General Benligans divisions were decimated in meeting the enemy's annihilating fire and at this point the enemy succeeded in capturing the works and holding them against counter attacks of the Christians, until their most massive lines were mangled and cut to pieces, and by general Jack Evans most greatest efforts the remainder were forced to retire, and sweep back in the wildest confusion. Evans was bound to stop Shoemans attack upon his brothers divisions at all costs, and all the while the struggle was most violent and general. The battle line here extended from the small village of Maldon at base, and across a portion of the plain, beyond the high ledge of long stretched wall of rocks, and on some meadows, and also extended from Tataria to High Lightburg Landing, and all this distance the battle maddest forces of both sides roared and screamed in furious action and a hundred thousand cannon thundered and crashes crashed with the most horrible din filling the valleys and the very air with a hundred million of scarping echoes, and the crash of fire arms and explosions of shells swelled the din terrifically and many soldiers closed their ears to prevent themselves from becoming deaf.

Three great columns of Abyssinians under general Picknell were hurled upon Shoemanna's center in a reckless manner while all efforts were being made to rally Phil's brigades, and restore John Evans' broken lines and this part of the awful sanguinary struggle resulted in the destruction of many Angelinian brigades, and five brigades of the glandelinians within half an hour. Even from two long chains of batteries along Shoemanna's center a stream of shells were hurled upon the disordered christian columns under Evans and Phil to prevent them from reforming and rallying, and the detonation of the heaviest cannonading of the war succeeded each other so rapidly that it produced a most ear-splitting roar of continual prolonged fury heard within a mile long down the quieted lines nearly ten miles forward. Both sides were surrounded in sheets of smoke, and the screaming shrieking blood-curdling yells of both enemies and the incessant million cannon roar of musketry was added to the tremendous cannonading.

Picknell's columns in their attempts to restore order, and to check the infuriated enemy had been repulsed after having their main line of 5,000,000 men torn to fragments, and met the charge of the enemy at a better position on the banks of Sunbeam Creek, Picknell's cannon being placed where the enemy were fully exposed, and the fearful broadsides of shells and canister swept their lines a mile long down once after another, and tearing huge lanes and ravines in their main line of assault all the while the other christian forces under John Evans and Phil were rolling in confusion. The survivors of the glandelinians at first faltered, but urged on by their officers they closed the huge gaps and swept on to the attack with the fury of an avalanche of demons' force, and again their columns were torn to pieces once after another. The thunder of artillery all along the battle line was still incessant and appalling added by the series of violent detonations of great explosions that seemed to shake earth and heaven tremble, and so fierce was even the musketry fire along Picknell's lines that whole columns of the enemy were swept out of existence one after another, and hundreds of thousands of trees were shattered by canister and exploding shells.

By withering discharges of musketry two other immense divisions of the glandelinians were swept out of existence, but other columns seemed to be surging swimming forward in overwhelming numbers to support them and again surged forward with irresistible force and energy, but again many of their columns were swept back a considerable distance before another portion of the christian line finally gave way. The battle raged with the greatest desperation and fury along these lines for four hours and series of hand to hand conflicts raged....

The artillery of both sides still thundered with unabated fury and upon the main line of christian veterans who still stood their ground the brunt of this frightful onslaught fell at a critical moment when 10,000,000 Angelinians skillfully handled kept twenty million glandelinians at bay, these glandelinians under Pollie Nickerson, and Shoemanna who had been attacking with supreme fury suffering losses beyond repair, and so this stayed the tide of victory for the glandelinians which had been rolling steadily forward for hours.

Along the left of Picknell's christian column the charges of the enemy were still more terrific and had followed one after another only to be hurled back with appalling losses. The withering fire delivered by the Angelinians had been more frightful than before, and the thunder of artillery so deafening, that many of the christian commanders who had arms not yet in action became alarmed and started a general concentration upon the foe. Though charges after charges had been repulsed the glandelinians only returned to the onslaught and pressed with fearful weight upon the christian lines but again were hurled back with more frightful losses. Along general Picknell's center the glandelinians seemed to press forward in full force assaulting the christian line with the fury of hell the struggle raging still more frightfully and extending all along the lines. Evans himself had committed half of his very force upon general Picknell's assaults, the struggle having already grown fiercer and the mutual losses more dreadful and enraged by the series of bloody repulses the wicked glandelinian commanders requested Shoemanna to bring on the whole of his force and soon over eleven million of the glandelinians moved forward to make an irresistible charge against Evans' line. At his command this whole line proceeded by advancing batteries rushed on again over the long plain under a fearful storm of christian cannon and musketry fire that tore their lines to fragments.

For two more hours the struggle raged most frightfully men on both sides still falling in myriads and lay dead in windrows and like a forest for those two hours.

THE SECOND DAY OF THE BATTLE. WILDER SCENES OF HORROR.

WORTH of hell too. It was like just like what was said in the Bible, and forefathers were soon on their knees begging for peace and mercy, and all you got was a good trouncing and whole devastation of your towns of and cities and mercy was a thing of the past. And that lesson had not done you fools any good. When your recent comrades slaughtered children at Crowley they did not slaughter Angelinian children but children of other nationalities only as no Angelinian.

Three great columns of Abyssinians under general Giskell were hurled in a reckless manner while all efforts were forces and soon over three million of the Gandelinians move forward in an irresistible charge against the Abyssinians. At his command this whole line proceeded by advancing batteries rushed on again over the long plain under a fearful storm of christian cannon and musketry fire that tore their lines to fragments.

For two more hours the struggle raged most frightfully men on both sides still falling in myriads and lay dead in windrows and like carpets of grass cut by a scythe. The roar of firing for those two hours was again incessant and the artillery worse than the thunder itself.
Both armies were frightfully engaged and it seemed as if many brigades would meet with awful annihilation. In the meantime both sides had been massing all their batteries for general action and soon were plying them with the most destructive effect raining vast broadsides of shot and shell and high explosives upon each other by many thousands per minute.
By this tremendous cannonade the whole region was effected by it, all the other woods and forests being shattered to shivers and set on fire and thousands of the animals in the forests were even forced to flee for their lives. For four hours this tremendous artillery duel continued with awful vigor and for a time it seemed as if both sides were threatened with mutual annihilation. Finally a sweeping charge by the whole of Shocannias five million cowering men was made, and it was so sudden and irresistible that the right wing of the Gandelinians was cut to pieces and in the space of thirty minutes during that great irresistible charge the Gandelinians lost six hundred and sixty thousand men killed and over one million one hundred thousand in wounded. Though some parts of the left wing of the Gandelinians did not press their advantage the conflict finally closed with the left and center still maintaining their positions. The foe were in possession of the plains however and also a good part of general Givians positions were in the hands of the foe. At five o'clock general Givian himself heard that a large force of Gandelinians directed by general Ke Satakie was marching all the christian women and children captured at Tataria and Evangelina Grania to slaughter, and bound to prevent this he sent one million three hundred and sixty five thousand men to check their intention. After a vigorous assault lasting for an hour and made a struggle of inconceivable violence for the sake of the forces engaged the Angelinians drove the Gandelinians back the Gandelinians back but not without sustaining the loss of over five hundred and fifty five thousand in this terrific onset that to that of the enemy only fifty thousand in killed and wounded. Thousands of prisoners were taken however, and general Givian riding up as the butchers were being taken within his lines, with the rescued ones also addressed the Gandelinians thus;

"Well here you are doing it again. In Angelinia, where we are now, or in other places as well, it makes no difference at all. You Gandelinians always get to bold about the slaughter of the innocent women and children who have done you Gandelinians no harm under any conditions, and you call it war. I started this very damn war because of the slaughters of children at Growley and Jemie Wren Town and still it still continues. But it will be a sorry days work if you ever succeed in making any more assassinations of children, when us Angelinians gets through with you Gandelinian assassins. A man of my mind and temper never forgets and even never forgives these assassinations of children even if I myself do not receive any forgiveness of my own sins if I have committed any. Hee/hee and you call yourselves soldiers. He, he.
And you say it is not fair in war for us to bombard your Gandelinian cities before women and children leave, and yet you torture and butcher christian children, and then say the war is not over religion, but in defense because we are forcing the war upon you fool Gandelinians. Of course this is no religious war. I don't give a damn if you men worship the devil before my eyes, or if his has a thousand times it is none of my business. And it is true that we started the war on you Gandelinians, and just or unjust as it may be the rest is no nation in this world that would stand for the massacre of children, without any reason like the massacres you fools committed at Growley, and the vil villages around Jemie Wren Town and you know it. And what did the King of Abissinnia do to you Gandelinian skulls when your fool forefathers sank the ship loaded with children, and his own wife and daughter on. He died of a broken heart, and the result was that his fierce war like brother be brother a man that lusts in war took his throne as a successor and he trimmed you skulls like we are going to trim you now and throw war upon you and to the very mouth mouth of hell too. It was also just like the turning of a worm, for your forefathers were seen on their knees begging for peace and mercy, and all you got was a good trouncing and whole devastation of your towns and cities and mercy was a thing of the past. And that lesson had not done you fools any good. When your recent comrades slaughtered children at Growley they did not slaughter Angelinian child ren but children of other nationalities only as no Angelinian

b But mark you my dear sirs if slaughters of children follows one after another us Angelinians will be changed men, our temper will come out and we will show no mercy or give any quarter to any glandelinian army that is trapped. So I will give you a last solemn warning. You know what character the Abyssinians are. They are not Angelinians and they are not Abissinians. They are christians but different than we and they thirst for the chance to massacre all glandelinian prisoners that have been captured during the war. I warn you that if I hear of another massacre even threatening, I'll turn those christian barbarians upon all glandelinian prisoners and order the Angelinians here after not to take any more prisoners even wounded, but massacre them all. Our patience is exhausted. Now remember that I have warned you. Some of you will be exchanged for Angelinian prisoners to morrow and I have given you a good chance to make good and restrain your comrades from committing such a horrible crime that God can condemn worse than anything else, the ruthless slaughter of little children not because they are christians, but because to defy god. Shame away to the rear with you. I go not care to see your faces."

With this he rode away storing and fuming. The first days battle of Tartaria had raged in a furious manner but in separate conflicts and it had been very severe and wild. Gertrude Angelina was saddened at the sight of the awful harvest of human beings, and did cry a good deal at the sight. General Hindale St Clare had also occupied a long row of Stockade fortifications called Silverbell and Silverhair which were situated in a stretch of beautiful parks and glens of the Tartaria plains. General Hanson having had his shattered right wing reinforced by the many large forces held in reserve and not having been active in the first day of the battle decided to assail these long line of fortifications early in the morning, and if he could succeed in capturing these Manleys line would be broken, and the siege won, and probably end in the capture of Manleys whole army.

CHAPTER TWO.

THE SECOND DAY OF THE BATTLE:
WILDER SCENES OF HORROR.....

So general Hanson vivian took all night preparing for the great struggle that was coming. In the early morning without the slightest warning the Angelinians under general O'Brien pressed on toward the silent line of fortifications and the gowath corps of the glandelinians though surprised by an overwhelming force resisted with desperation for a while filling the air with swirling clouds of smoke and flame from all their heaviest guns a fairly drenching the plains with a perfect rain of thousands of shells, but soon the glandelinians were forced to give way even before support could reach them.

On pressed the Angelinians a furious wallow of purple in the morning light. After merciless excruciating fighting for over an hour they succeeded in turning the longest gray line to the left of the fortifications driving all before them. Still onward they pressed, and after fighting which brought on frightful slaughter another breach was made to the right, and with terrific fury the fierce Angelinians pressed through this between two galling fire of the heaviest cannons from the other fortifications and from terrible long lines of musketry. Yelling like demons themselves and after a more fearful struggle ten times harder than they managed to capture a long line of trenches near one of the stockades, and then three of the forts by charging through a regular entrench of works in the face of a withering fire which had cut the Angelinian troops down in many columns. So progressively and rapidly was this done that nearly one million and a hundred and sixty five thousand prisoners, glandelinian troops and officers were taken by the Angelinians who carried all before them. Simultaneously the guns of the first line of fortifications fortifications about 11,700 guns were soon vigorously in action and after a two hours incessant cannonading compelled the abandonment of nine batteries consisting of nine thousand cannon each which for all that hour had filled the very region with a horrible storm of echoes from the horrible reverberating roar and cannonading thunders heard as stated after the battle to have been heard for many hundreds of miles.

Hundreds upon hundreds of thousands of Angelinians within an hour had dashed into these under a new and fiercer storm of batteries under general Zimmerman, and all the guns who dashed for the batteries soon had them in their possession and opened fire upon the fleeing division of glandelinians annihilating them with their devastating fire of high explosives and shrapnell which seemed to tear the very plains and battlefields asunder with their perfect sea of tremendous explosions. Soon from all points the christian armies were carrying all before them, Shoemanj Shoemannias whole line of works and batteries were in their possession and the fortifications of Silverbell and Silverhair were occupied by the Angelinian troops, while the remainder pressed on after the fleeing columns of Shoemannias army. The glandelinian armies were indeed totally routed, and never before in the war was the glandelinians so totally defeated.

Had it not been for Fort Vivian, and the fortifications of Jennie Purser and Evangelina St Clare the christians would have indeed won a sweeping victory of the whole battle and threw Manley completely out of his position. These fortifications were situated southeast of the city of Amie Aronburg and extended each singly for the distance of two miles and each had twenty thousand cannon. Fort Jennie Purser was the first to open fire with the big guns tearing the christian line crossing the plain to fragments and the din was dreadful sounding like a million volcanoes in eruption. Evangelina St Clare followed in thundering salvos that made the rear intensify with the sea of explosions and then all three fortifications were in action and these fortifications after a most terrible cannonading of all their guns that could be brought to bear which continued for three hours with an unceasing spasmodic roar heard for a hundred and fifty six miles as plainly as if you were in front of the forts soon checked the onward rush of Hanson's main line by tearing his army as a sunder and even filling the whole region which they were crossing into a terrible blood of horror. Evangelina Grania a big substantial town of two hundred and fifty houses collapse into total ruins under the concussion of the cannonading and the earth elsewhere shook like a titanic earthquake and the din was heard for a thousand miles. Hindale St Clare had been enraged over the sweeping success of the christians on Shoemannias army and so rallying a part of Shoemannias divisions also gathered half of his main forces and soon came on in formidable array to make a counter attack, and recover the lost ground.

At the same time all the main batteries of the other glandelinian positions within two hours were also massed and soon over two hundred thousand cannon were massed upon the two immense captured fortifications, and upon the main christian forces rushing forward forms were forced forward over the plains in millions of men per hour. Within a few hours more a most tremendous cannonade of all burst forth in a terrible prolonged explosive roar to which the main christian batteries even those along grass lines included had almost tamely responded, the cannonade of the captured stockades hurling fearful broadsides of shot and shell and canister upon the glandelinians as they charged furiously upon the two forts in two monstrous lines and so terrible was the din of the three hundred thousand cannons of the fortifications and enemy batteries alone, besides that added by the clamor of the christian batteries that the fighters had to plug up their ears to prevent themselves from becoming deaf, and yet despite all this they could not keep out the terrible sound.

The roar of over four hundred thousand cannon was simply sounding earthrending and the smoke that hung above the contestants was like a pall of storm clouds, and who could imagine the fury of the many thousands of explosions per second which tore up the very ground like blasting volcanic eruptions. After fighting which raged with for four more hours with unceasing fury and which was too horrible to relate in detail the three christian or glandelinian batteries were retaken and soon the nine others also added massed upon the fortifications still in the hands of the glandelinians. Onward still onward pressed millions of the glandelinians whose lines were torn to pieces one after another, but in the onward rush that was not checked the glandelinians soon came into close quarter with the Angelinians, and now Hanson's veterans fought with the utmost fury of desperation and the conflict roared with the fury of a million bells.

As the roar of musketry on both sides was drowned out however by the titanic crash of cannons. The glandelinians were now checked somewhat as forty of their highest generals were killed and wounded in the hellish bedlam, and then repulsed with excruciating losses, and with two others of their main main generals having fallen and one of them was Hindsale Johnston who was killed, the other being Hindsale St. Glare who was slightly disabled but not able to retain his command.

The frightful thunder of the glandelinian batteries was now increasing and in the meantime Shoemania having rallied his own main forces came to the aid of Hindsale St. Glare's divisions and also rallied them and again the furious assault was renewed with redoubled fury and the glandelinians within another hour were rushing forward with tremendous fury and in ten tidal waves of men. The series of assaults was so fearful each one more fearful than the ones before and the roar of artillery and musketry was redoubled to ten fold, but soon unable to withstand it any longer and suffering from consecutive attacks from three directions at that the Angulians began to move out of the smoky maelstroms of hell. Back into the captured fortifications no many of them went, and out leaving all the cannon they had captured in their desperate efforts to regain their main lines, and escape the destructive and desolation of firing which was moving down their brid brigades in tens.

It was a general withdrawal of christian troops back to defeat and disaster.

Along general Hanson's main left wing that same early morning at a different point and far out of the stockades view general John Manley himself was busy at work. His glandelinian cavalry was the first to advance and quickly opened a galling fire upon the retreating Angulians who who pursued them close to two crossroads crossroads. In a few minutes however general Hanson's artillery began also to discharge fearful volleys, dealing awful havoc among the among the glandelinians. But on and on they came followed steadily by other columns. A horrible broadside of shells and three tremendous at ranges from a long chain of gathering guns ploughed the Free Masonic line lines but still onward they advanced upon the retreating christian columns driving all before them. The infantry which supported the cavalry now charged with irresistible force, and the renewed carnage which followed was more appalling. Both sides delivered a withering fire at once, and the glandelinians after a desperate death struggle drove back the right grand division of general Hanson's right wing. Gallies big cavalry force of glandelinians advanced under a most heavy fire of artillery and amid the dreadful carnage crashed upon the retreating Angulians in a fiercer attack and carried all before them driving the christians in scattered columns and brigades in the greatest disorder to the main line. As soon as they came up general Hanson's officers rode fiercely among the panic stricken troops and strove to rally them but in vain, the troops streamed in a stampede toward the rear, and general Hanson had to hurl forward his whole line of reserve to stop the wild headlong drive of the massed glandelinian tidal wave from the wild ocean of hell's legions of horror.

The enemy came on furiously 10,000,000 strong, but their was not a sound from them. They did not yell but their faces were frightfully contorted, their eyes flashed and their expressions showed that the glandelinians were filled with such determination to win, and that they were bound to win if they had to crash into hell to do so. On and on they came and just within two rods of the christian lines they suddenly broke into a precipitate run and let loose a storm of yells that fairly shook the trees. Just as they came within a rod of the christian lines there was at once a volcano of flame and din all along the line, the gray wave was torn and horribly gapped; and some portions gave way, but the rest rushed on wildly, and the Angulians met the charge most furiously, but after a dreadful struggle the christian line was broken and many officers were killed and wounded. The glandelinians continued to advance, and bore down upon the line in purple, especially those under some generals nicknamed generals Love Child, and Devil Biter in a furious charge, general Robert Macellor's cavalry striking general Meroy Love's right in a resistless manner, but encountered a deadly fire that annihilated half of his column, and with desperate courage, the glandelinians having crossed a mile of open ground under a most terrible fire of the christian guns, and had come rushing forward with the same tremendous fury noted in other great battles of this horrible war.

Their lines had been ploughed through and through but the men had not faltered. They had even charged way up the slight rise of ground and broke a part of the christian line, and now the struggle was very sanguinary, but general Jack Evans himself had made a heavy concentration upon Hanson's desperate specialties and after a final struggle one of the bloodiest ever seen in the war before the foe had been finally repulsed and thrown back all the distance across the plains with dreadful losses in men and officers, and their torn and tattered flags were blood soaked. At another point along general Howell's gunter Johnston's lines the enemy had made a desperate attack of the same violence attacking at the same time general Myrka's lines but after a struggle that was thrilling their charge was also repulsed in succession with the worse losses. The glandelinians led by Atania himself made a charge upon Kindernine's position at the same time and during the bloody fight made a great breach in the christian line under general Salven, and with mighty fury the glandelinians attempted to pass through the gap and take the christian line on the flank, but the fierce Angulians poured in an annihilating fire from every side, and tore and crushed to fragments in this mighty long wave of gray coats, and causing them to withdraw in a frightful panic. At the same time this occurred, a large glandelinian cavalry of 40,000 men in gray the fire flew east of all the Angulians bore down in a most furious assault upon the right of general Roberts' lines, while a battalion struck them a crushing blow on the left, and a dragon crashed down upon their center, which was well protested and a horrible struggle ensued. These three christian divisions were pressed back by the horrible charge, the cavalry divisions of the glandelinians riding into the first immense brigades of the recoiling Angulians with appalling fury blazing away with their carbines, while the infantry under a heavy fire charged straight through the line of purple coats, and their sixth corps and brigades, swept upon them like a hurricane.

The fury of the glandelinians during this pandemonium was such thing awful, and ninety thousand prisoners were taken by the foe in a few minutes. General Robert deeming that such a furious assault of the foe was resistless ordered his survivors to retreat to the main line. Then he fell mortally wounded. In ten minutes a fresh body of christians arrived having been sent by Hanson to repel the fierce headlong attack, and frightful was the sudden roar of one million muskets. The slaughter was appalling awful. The glandelinians however at this point were overwhelming in numbers and after a continuous struggle crushed the christian line to fragments. The glandelinians pressed on with most terrific fury and crashed again at seven powerful lines of infantry and the carnage being renewed became more and more appalling. Hanson's cavalry divisions hurled themselves also against the christian lines, under generals Hobbs, Child, Meroy, Jallen, great heart, and Penigan, with merciless fury, but the christians although suffering fearfully from the artillery fire of the glandelinian batteries which all this time kept up the same unceasing activity and which supported the glandelinian assault maintained their formation unbroken. These glandelinian cavalry divisions were not supported by infantry however and one of them under general Child's murder was compelled to withdraw from the heavy christian artillery fire from the right.

It was indeed a battle exceedingly wild and sanguinary. At all points however by the efforts of general Evans and Hanson the drive of the glandelinian army had been repulsed and there was now a hill. After his tremendous repulse at Fort Silverbell and silver hair general Hanson was not discouraged, and determined to show the glandelinians that he was not to be beaten unless he himself was down. However at other points the Angulians had failed though they did their best to check general Ig norance's glandelinians, and galdonia had been sent in with his troops with the forces under general Francis Schmidt and this part of the line had soon been reestablished and held. During the full general James Hindsale believing that his right wing was in no danger massed eight available battle lines supported by five hundred gathering and machine guns, and eight light undred other cannon for a fierce counter attack on Hanson's center which was almost shattered in aiding in the great attack on the christian line just past. General Hindsale decided to lead this assault but had he had no time to do so. The glandelinian generals had been withdrawing those already decimated during the other attack and had been sending forward fresh divisions to storm the christian lines once more. General ignorance was detailed to lead this assault and Shoemania was to follow, while general Leonia Meldonia, McKnell and Adels-De-garbe were to assail Evans' strong position. Ignorance made a vigorous effective assault on the right grand division of the christian christian center of panos command. The battalions also advancing against general panos in person met a most intense destructive fire from the christian brigades and after a terrific struggle equally as severe as the assault of a few hours before was repulsed with exorbitant losses. The prompt support of general panos gill verhair protecting Goodhearts left, and an impetuous charge of general Goodchild with ten million five hundred thousand men crushed the glandelinian battalions to fragments and made the survivors fly pell-mell. General silverhair, ad and Love child fell wounded, on the christian side. General Ignorance would have accomplished a sweeping success indeed, but for the fact that the blow he made fell only upon the right grand division of the christian line, and when he did throw forward the rest of his forces and storm the whole christian line a disaster occurred which resulted in confusion, and in trying to stem the panic Ignorance was severely wounded, and general panos' H male taking his place, also tried to rally them but was killed.

General James gindale his brother then took command and succeeded in rallying the glandelinian columns, and by night and main succeeded in getting them to fairly cross the christian works, and drive the christians back half a mile but amid the dreadful carnage the Angelinians rallied and during the furious inferno of firing the glandelinian attack was checked, and then thrown back in confusion. Then general James gindale fell across severely wounded. While murder then took his place and immediately was shot in the leg and severely wounded. The slaughter indeed was terrible. General Shoemanna hearing of the tragedies had to take command of these forces with general Grosile as his aid, and as the glandelinians were still firing furiously general panos was advised by his generals that that by the scenes witnessed it was evident that shoemanna decided to give his battle in full force. Satisfied of this he sent word to the other christian generals to hasten bringing up their reserves. Kill-childs command moving forward at one point encountered during the bloody fight some of general panos's cavalry and defeated it, and general stranglechild and his glandelinian horsemen entered a tataria but was annihilated after a furious struggle. The streets were covered with dead and dying the results of the horrible ambushade. General stranglechild was taken prisoner by the christians. General Donaldson then approached the city to wrest it from the Angelinians. The streets were swarming with the soldiers who had thrown up strong barricades, or took possession of all the houses to commit the horrible work of sniping. As the enemy came on all the Angelinians opened fire from houses, alleys, and from the barricades in the streets, from housetops and from windows of factories and child slave places and other means of defense mowing the enemy down in whole swarms. The glandelinian survivors still came on and made a desperate assault at the barricades and tried with fury to capture the houses and set fire to many. The christian fire could not check the impetuous charge of the glandelinians and as most of the town was burning they were forced to abandon it and withdraw, but they took their time about going and showed such fury in their resistance that the glandelinians could not capture one single prisoner. The town of tataria was taken by the enemy but impossible to hold, and the Angelinians soon swarmed back into the town capturing six hundred thousand glandelinians and three more generals and burned the town totally to the ground so that the enemy in case they came back could not occupy only ruins.

Another lull after this scene of action occurred and then at five o'clock that evening a large force of christian cavalry came dashing up and resisted another storming attack of the enemy that was beginning until the main line got ready to struggle once more. The christian cavalry countered and crossed and charged but could not hold back the assailants. Again the same fearful firing at once ensued as the enemy came on and the falling of the soldiers was again as equally appalling as the falling of the soldiers was the glandelinian survivors the Angelinians however giving such resistance that they again and again hurled back their charges with terrible losses to their own side and soon again finally drove the glandelinians back taking many scores of thousands of prisoners. Shoemanna hastened to the scene of action and the bloody conflict raged now more incessantly.

The roar of eight million fire arms and seven hundred thousand cannon was intensified in tensified like the din of many volcanoes blowing up into the air.

Meanwhile the seventh corps came up and the conflict grew more bloody still. Shoemanna with eight million men, with satans, and with general Hate child fell heavily upon the main christian line, held by gradually extended to the center with more horrible fury. It was now completely a deadly death struggle with the foe on the winning side completely. The struggle was for tataria proper but for a time the Angelinians firmly held their positions against the fiercest assaults. Heavy brigades and divisions were thrown against the christian veterans with awful force and violence, but during the marvellous and most sanguinary conflict these brigades and divisions were thrown back crushed and mingled with their lines completely torn to pieces. While the sound of merciless conflict in tensified in din on this part of the field it was also heard on the right and center where general No-good and Killston es surerannians advanced to the attack with great vigor. After merciless fighting they were thrown back, but after another fierce charge which raged the struggle frightfully for another bloody hour without e easing and the losses appalling the glandelinians succeeded in penetrating and holding for another hour against a merciless assault, the works on the extreme right of general vilians army. But during the frightful drama of horror general vilians during the counter charge and a fierce concentration drove the glandelinians out of his lines and some distance back. Series of sudden and violent attacks occurred elsewhere simultaneously. Shoemanna had thrown his main force forward gaining the advantage and storming general vilians divisions where the same sanguinary kind of struggle ensued.

Within a one hour attack the ground along this point was strewn with five hundred thousand dead and wounded and dying glandelinians but finally this assault was also driven back with frightful losses and a part of Killstones division was fairly cut all to pieces. The slaughter was appalling, unmerciful. Enraged over this repulse Shoemanna had during other great onslaughts again opened upon general panos's lines four hundred and eighty thousand cannon from the main line of batteries of gunleys commands and from the fortifications, and within an hour over 300,000 christian cannon were responding with all their might and for the space of two hours and a half a good portion of western galverinia for the space of nearly a thousand thousand miles was made to tremble by the loud thunder of 700,000 cannons. Then like a gigantic wave of the sea during a great upheaval of the ocean in a typhoon, the whole force of glandelinians proceeded by clouds of skirmishers, swept over the broad plains under a most deadly fire from the christian guns, and assailed the Abbeannian line with the most indescribable fury. Over the whole plain, whole monstrous divisions of glandelinians charged with resistless energy, and though they were cut up and torn to pieces, swept before them in that final charge general robert vilians whole left wing. Fearful was the struggle and more fearful the loss. All the christian divisions were hurled from their main line of positions by inferior numbers at that, and driven back mangled and bleeding, while hundreds of thousands of their fallen paved the fields. Both divisions at this part of the bloody battle line were dread dreadfully shattered by the collision and general Benigan whole command of one million one hundred thousand was also crushed to fragments, by the fearful onslaught, and he himself severely wounded, and another christian general by the mass of benigan Grenburg killed. Also general Jackson Phelan on the christian side fell riddled by bullets, general Joseph Mc-Gantler fell severely wounded as he strove to rally his own tired army, and general panos tarring on the side of the glandelinians was also slain as he crossed the christian parapet on horseback in the face of the christian withering fire that shot his own whole army to pieces. Even the general Ignorance will g child whole command of Angelinians had been shot to pieces, and general pedo Shoemanna was killed as he also strove to rally his panic stricken christian troops, while James Pickens himself was mortally wounded.

At the fall of their generals, and at such frightful losses the survivors of the Angelinians became panic stricken and retreated in the utmost confusion, crowding over the rear of the plains, swarming over meadows, in a stampede, and pouring across roads and the Sunbeam Creek, and even across the highburg landing and even over remaining bridges. The pursuing glandelinians opened an increasing fire upon the panic stricken Angelinians. General vilians purple coats at first fled toward tataria river and on toward the town of Jennie vilians, but a large force of glandelinians cut off their retreat in that direction and his men were forced to run precipitately toward the woods near Lucille Gordon, the glandelinians rushing on after them with the same precipitate haste causing more confusion. Close to the woods was a big bend of the beautiful gunbeam creek with a large wide plank bridge over it. All of the yivirvians Angelinians could not cross this bridge at once so multitudes of the Angelinians swarmed in streams across the creek, hundreds being shot down by the excited glandelinians glandelinians. Faster went the Angelinians crowding through the woods, and they were compelled to dynamite trees to make obstructions to bar the enemy's advance. This of course made a slower retreat for those who stayed behind to do this sort of work and this resulted in their capture, the glandelinians gaining on the main force of Angelinians like the spread of some great storm cloud. Reaching an opening in the woods the Angelinians rushed away as swiftly as they could.

General trying to rally them was killed by a glandelinian sharpshoot er. On after them still rushed the glandelinians with their myriads of beautiful banners flying. Reaching another portion of the woods which was not so thick scores of thousands of the Angelinians tried to rally to make a stand but this was useless and also suicidal. Onward sped the glandelinian troops after the fleeing Christians who soon came in sight of another portion of the same creek where it made a perfect wide wind and here a large and awfully long bridge spanned. This bridge two rods wide was soon crowded with confused Angelinians, ambulances, wagons, trains of ammunition wagons, and artillery. It was indeed a slow matter to get across this bridge no matter how wide or long it was. General Lackheart with his divisions attacked and cut off many of the Angelinians capturing them and thirty pieces of artillery and ten regimental flags. It was quite a long time before the bridge was cleared of general yivirvians commands, except five or six wagons and twelve twelve wagons and some big guns that had toppled over. The glandelinians now crowded the bridge also and even poured across the stream elsewhere, and those on the bridge to clear the way showed the wagons all into the stream, but taking care of the wounded left behind in the ambulances and the poor horses which were not injured as all belong to glandelinians the soldier soldiers being wounded glandelinians only. Confusion was indeed everywhere among general yivirvians. Thousands of baggage wagons, were aground in mud and sand, ambulances were upset and captured, and men and all mixed up in confused masses, horses rearing and plunging; and there was a scene of so complete confusion. General Glaseson placed fifty wagons in a line near gunbeam creek and tried to check the pursuing glandelinians under general Hoogoo but the glandelinians charged upon the battery and captured it, and also those who had dared to remain behind to discharge it a second time. By clever ruses the general escaped. Many a time the Christians who had the chance fired back many a telling volley but this did not check the glandelinians at all. A large detachment with fixed bayonets dashed boldly into the rear of the retreating line of Christians who tried to cover the retreat of their comrades, while a detachment of infantry under general Fva Frank who with dare-devil recklessness, charged their right, and another detachment with fearful force swept upon general Gimbearts left and during a cruel and bloody running fight broke their line in many parts and attempted to pass through and head them off, but they broke in such confusion that the attempt was frustrated. Reaching another opening of the woods a portion of the Angelinian army again tried to stem the tide of disaster by trying to make another stand but the glandelinians came rushing on with such irresistible force and fury that the Angelinians were compelled to resume their retreat after a short and sharp struggle. Several large Angelinian brigade brigades were now quite in the way of the pursuing glandelinians who with angry shouts "Get out of the way you purple coated devils we want to pass pass as to go home" quickly cut them off from escape, not without a desperate fight though and captured the survivors.

1133. On and on sped the Angelinians, over other bridges and roads running their best to escape the pursuing glandelinians who were dangerously close behind, many flinging away their firearms to run better, but nevertheless the glandelinians were coming closer and closer. Reaching a railway called the Gordon across which also was a long line known as the Gordon line the Angelinians poured to the other side and tried again to make a stand, while the remainder poured across a long railway bridge the structure swarming with confused Angelinians. These Angelinians were under general Gracels Johnston. Around a portion of the crossroads a large detachment of glandelinians swept and managed to cut off and capture a hundred prisoners. When all of the Angelinians were off the bridge, many of them set it on fire underneath and even blew part of it up with powder, but it did not check the foe and then suddenly there was a terrific roar that seemed to split the earth and all the glandelinians who had swarmed out to the bridge to the amazement and horror of those who had gotten across across were hurled into eternity by the explosion of ten mines set under the bridge.

In the meantime both foes without knowing it were swarming toward general Jack Evans main right wing on the nearest side, and Gertrude Angeline who had been out scouting as all had been quiet along his lines it being four o'clock was startled by a pandemonium of yells and series of musket volleys. The whole line was even startled by the din. In alarm Gertrude sprang for the Christian line at a full gallop and warned the generals and then viewed the scene and was appalled at what she saw. Dense multitudes of purple coats were stampeding toward Evans right wing, yelling, cursing, praying, and swearing. The Angelinians along this point at first thought the glandelinian officers with Gertrude Angeline in the midst were the glandelinians in disguise and swarmed forward to meet them as the bayonet, but many of the officers saw the real situation through their glasses and warned them it was the rear of some reinforcements and so they did not show hostilities and began rallying somewhat at the sight of one of the most beautiful friends of the yivirvian girls. General Evans riding to the scene ordered the Christian line to open and let the panic stricken forces pass through. This was obeyed and an hour after as soon as the pursuers came closer enough, and the last of the fugitives had passed through the gap it was suddenly closed, and then suddenly the whole line fell back for a certain distance itself, then suddenly hell seemed to break out along their lines and terrible was the scene as the completely surprised glandelinian columns went to pieces amid the dreadful carnage.

"Now then down to a man!" was the order of their commanders and they did. Shoosamma's ferocious advance within twenty minutes more of whole scale slaughter among the glandelinians was finally checked, and the shattered armies that had been so badly routed were enabled to retreat safely to the rear. But it was not to cover the retreat of those badly smitten armies did that wing of Evans command hold its ground, but to give general Shoosamma the impression that it would take more than his to force them out of their position.

At five thirty the most heavy firing along this wing told general Evans that general Shoosamma's revengeful over his failure to crush the retreating columns was again assaulting general Evans right wing with the most terrible violence, the Christian guns having trained more than eight thousand cannon upon the assailants and it was the terrible roar of these guns that startled general Evans. Thousands of shells boomed and banged, houses and sheds, and trees rose on wings of dust and smoke and great geyser of explosions swooped down upon the glandelinians. If Shoosamma had only realized he was drawing to a position where he could be shattered to pieces, he would have thought twice before making the move. Feverish excitement was everywhere. Shoosamma had first out lined the onslaught in a bloody but desultory manner, the great armies in gray looking so beautiful and strong in the setting sun with their clamping horses, and flaunting flags, and glinting guns, and booming guns, and g beating drums that it was a shame for the cruel Angelinians to do as they firmly did. Indeed it was a sight that staggered Gertrude Angeline from a safe place viewed it, a strength that made her weep, for she truthfully doubted whether the Christians could withstand them. Five glandelinian batteries now opened upon the Christian lines a most terrific firing upon one spot, and hundreds of thousands of brave Angelinians, staggered, fell, rolled, convulsed and died.

General Fred Ferdinand had a greater courage than General Wellington and despite the dreadful carnage rallied his men. The Glandelinians trained five more batteries upon his divisions alone, and fairly shattered his lines, as they stormed his own guns with a terrific curtain of artillery fire. Hundreds of his comrades fell beside him per minute the shells even burst around him. Yet he stood as calm and as quiet as though he had a charmed life, like a spirit that neither fire of balls and shells or canister and bullets could touch. All this while the Glandelinian infantry attacks were going on in a storm of fury and damnation, the whole three grand divisions of General Jack Evans right wing, being stormed with appalling fury, and when a portion of the line was compelled to fall back on account of the death of two of their generals, they left three hundred thousand upon the field. Then on God. Then General Meagher's saunders called upon his nine million men supported by a storming artillery fire. On they came under a murderous tempest of grape and canister. On they rushed furiously and wildly and leaped in heavy numbers over the outer works, the firing was exceedingly heavy, but on they rushed and stormed, they recoiled, and swept forward again once more and over the works in appalling numbers, and only to be swept back, and once more they struck forward with the fixed bayonet. They reached the works. They a and her heartbroken husband and three children were left sorrowing. Childish sobs came half smothered from another room and tore at the hearts of those who listened, and once the baby voice of little Jennie Melanias vivian came choking out loud from her little innocent heart. She was kneeling before a high chair in front of a picture of Our Lady, her little hands clasped passionately, while the big tears dropped like rain.

"Oh Mother of the Little Jesus, won't you be my mother now. Mama has gone to heaven, and I am so lonely now..." Every one wept and friends came and took the child and tried to cheer her, but although her tears were dried her little heart was broken. Motherless at four years old on account of the cruel savagery of the Glandelinians. Can we think of it without a tear.

And yet the wicked Glandelinians Glandelinians frenzied by the counter attack of the Christians and with the lust of blood did not forget this place. Hundreds rushed for this house and again slaying all the women and children and lastly came upon little Jennie Melanias vivian who was huddling in a dark corner in a subject terror at hearing the dying groans of her father and the shrieking of her brother and sisters who were being cut to pieces. The wicked Glandelinians were about to kill her also but their leader stopped them and said:

"Do not kill her. As soon as this conflict is over off to the Island Prison with her. Since her parents are killed now and we go and I kill her she will be only united with them in her heaven and we don't want that happy reunion to happen just now."

So the child was left unmolested though she was under strong guard. Well echoed yell and like a large troop of tigers the Angelinians rushed furiously to the assault. The Glandelinians were brought to bay and fought with the utmost fury of desperation, and with shells, cannon balls and musket volleys they mowed down thousands of their assailants within thirty seconds and wounded many thousands more. God is simply good to innocent children. What happens proves it. Though repulsed the Angelinians had captured many Glandelinian prisoners, and besides them the ones who had been carrying off little Jennie Melanias vivian and rescued her. She was free and for good. The Angelinians soon resumed the attack with utmost ferocity swarming at the foot of the palisades, and hacking at them with battle axes, and their pikes, until they had cut them through at many different points. For a long time there was a deadly fight at these breech breaches but at length the Angelinians broke in one of the stockades but met such resistance that despairing of capturing any prisoners alive they shot the Glandelinian soldiers down all of them massacring them all even the highest leader.

howled, they struck, bayoneted, shot and hacked. Then they wavered, staggered, broke and ran, but undaunted they gathered again and plunged into the fire and smoke but again they were beaten back. Six times they rallied and like a whirlwind of flame and flesh and steel they swept within a hundred yards of the heights almost as halted them. Over the dead bodies they came. Nine thousand nine million Infantry fire and less than five million men returned. Pandon, a tall, fat, stately bayonet but how could they hope to win what "Lager had lost. Oh who were the brutes who sent you to such slaughter? Oh we what a sacrifice for such a bright day and what a preparation for the coming of Christ! Christmas day, for peace on earth and good will to men. More than six million strew the hills and plains and among these like more than one million Angelinians.

Through all the battle, dim more piercing than the screaming shells "Gertrude could almost imagine to hear the orphans cry: the horrible under the one, the fathers curse and the mothers sigh, and the desolate young wives groan. Hear the dying sorrows of sin racked souls and shell racked bodies. Hear the groans of the curses, and blasphemies, and agonized despair, the cry for water and the cry of death.

"Jesus Mercy. Many even among the Glandelinians do shout in times of horror and mortal agony, as blood blinded and pain maddened they crawl about with arms or legs, or parts of arms and heads shot off, or with their very intestines protruding from their bodies. Others even Glandelinians appealing for Absolution from priests striding among them. Faces marked with blood and dirt lift from the earth spitting their confessions into the ears of priest and sinner and after Absolution cry:

"Thank God. And die."

All around lay more suits of gray than of purple. The shot at all healing heavily among them. Bleeding mangled bodies were everywhere. Oh what a sight for such a tender heart as Gertrude and this slaughter had lasted only two hours or even less. Even at the same time this horrible slaughter was of occurring a sally on General Hancock's right flank right who guarded over five thousand children saw a mighty swarm of Glandelinians sweeping on toward him. He gave the alarm and at the same moment a myriads of soldiers ran wildly out of the breaches of their breastworks and opened a rapid fire upon the Glandelinians. But it was too late. Through the breaches and over the ramparts the furious Glandelinian soldiers came pouring in. Sick and wounded men leaped from their beds while women and children blind with fright darted shrieking from the houses. The Glandelinians cut them all down. Angled with the wild uproar of a shro shrieks from the children was the savage shouts of the Glandelinian cut throats and the clash of weapons. The agonizing gestures of the small innocent and helpless children was heart rending but the Glandelinians were delighted in their awful work of butchery. Many more of the children tried to escape but the Glandelinians rushed at them, threw them down and strangled them to death and dragged their bodies to the brink of deep creek where the victims of the devilish massacre were already flung in heaps. The Glandelinians hacked the arms and limbs apart from many of the children while they were still alive. The Glandelinians like sheep in a wolf's like way wolves in a sheep's fold roiled in slaughter. With bloodshot eyes and weapon bared the Glandelinians closed around their victims to prevent the rest from escaping. When this massacre completed with his very Christian lines was finished the Glandelinians even doubly fortified the stockades they had captured. It took the Glandelinians all night to fortify the stockades however and it was morning the Glandelinians had just finished when a startling cry rang in their ears.

"THE ANGELINIANS ARE COMING! THE ANGELINIANS ARE COMING!" The Glandelinians were suddenly startled when they saw a large force of the Christians advancing in unbroken lines with heads lowered and bayonets fixed for the charge. The cannons of the stockades were discharged with the most destructive effect effects while the Infantry poured a pitiless at on of bullets. All the Glandelinian guns fired and fired with amazing rapidity, and indeed it had been a serious blow to the Christians to have a long line of stockades captured within their very lines and they were bound to retake it at all costs.

More and more of the Glandelinians rushed to the enclosures and opened fire upon the advancing Christians with all their firearms and increased their fire to a deadly on on all sides at that. Several houses of the stockades were still filled with thousands of children not as yet massacred and enraged over the attacks of the Christians many of the Glandelinians cut these helpless innocents down with their sabres killing them and mangle the corpses tearing out their eyes and entrails. In one of the stockade houses the inmates were moving noisily for there on a couch on a darkened room a still and pulseless form lay, white as marble and as cold. Lighted candles and gas and an Ivory crucifix told of the Faith Faith and a Rosary clasped in the fair hands marked our Lady's child. A shot hit by a fatal shot during the continuing battle had passed away into the great other world sweetly and calmly.

The Glandelinians at another part seized a stockade full of children and set these on fire, and the helpless children who were unable to get away were roasted in the burning buildings. They beat at the rest of the poor children they had taken out from the burning houses savagely with sticks and clubs, then strangled or smothered them to death. At all other points the Angelinians were attacking furiously the Glandelinians within the long line of palisades, being five hundred by count in number, and they rallied again and again fighting like demons, but could not keep back the assailants when they did repulse them. It was a desultory attack however which the Christians had kept up with great fury, but so brisk and steady was the fire from the loopholes that the Christians had been mowed down in horrible numbers, and were indeed mowed at their own losses. Thousands of them officers and men had been mowed down by that awful fire but most of the survivors had moved forward cautiously, leaping from behind tree to tree as they came on, but nevertheless the wicked Glandelinians were at their posts and hundreds of thousands of loop-holes darted their tongues of flame. The Glandelinians had found within the stockades besides cannon and grenades, heavy muskets of large calibre, which were continually thrown among the Angelinians, these scattering scraps of lead and or iron among the male multitudes of Angelinians and mowing hundreds of them at one discharge. However in spite of the brisk fire the survivors reached the stockades and palisades, and crouched low and beyond the range of shot, hewing furiously with their pikes and axes and hatchet blades as to cut their way through, the rest following close and seemingly like hundreds of thousands of angry purple hornets around the stockades, hacking and tearing to get in. At once scores of the Glandelinians crossed their muskets with powder and plugged up the muzzles and lighting the fuses fuses inserted in them, threw them over the barrier and these in exploding killed and wounded many, but nevertheless many of the Angelinians had gotten possession of a quarter of the number of loop-holes and thrusting in their guns fired upon the Glandelinians within bringing them down in appalling numbers. In a moment they had torn a wide breach in the palisade but the brave Glandelinians sprang forward to defend it. Another breach was made, then another. Seventeen of the Glandelinian leaders two of them generals were killed, but the fierce survivors kept up the fight, throwing themselves against the throng of Angelinians striking, and stabbi stabbing, and shooting with the fury of mad-men while those in the fortifications fired volley after volley, and again and again shot thousands of the Angelinians down, but the survivors still continued the attack and only after the fiercest fighting continued for hours without ceasing did the Angelinians at last receive a bloody repulse. General Calahans and Callahans Glandelinians set out to take other fortifications not in possession of the foe as yet sweeping on to slaughter the helpless children firing rattling volleys upon the fleeing fugitives shooting many of them down. Many of the Christian defenders retreated both sides firing destructive volleys at each other.

A huge force of Glandelinians had now appeared and the other Glandelinians increased the appalling slaughter with all their fury. Even gathling guns were fired upon the swarms of panic stricken children killing many scores at one discharge. As they rushed on after the fleeing children the Glandelinians met a priest who was baptizing several dying little girls. They knocked him down with a sheathed sword and one stabbed him dead with a bayonet before he had even a chance to bat baptize them. At another place two little girls and three boys who attempted to escape were caught and tied to trees. The Glandelinians incensed scourged them from head to foot, and then they cut away their lower lips, and then for revenge thrust a red hot iron down their throats. Then they set fire to one of the trees that had the held the smallest child and as the flames arose she threw her arms upward with an awful shriek of supplication to god. Next they hung around her little neck a collar made of iron beads heated red hot which added to the child's agony. Then they poured scalding hot tar on the heads of all five. Then they cut strips of loose flesh from their bodies and ate them before their very eyes. After a succession of other frightful tortures they scalped them like Indians do, and when they saw that the five children were nearly dead they cut open their bodies, and drank their blood. The leader then tore out their hearts and livers and handed these to the men who ate them raw. They did not do this because they were cannibals. They knew better than that.

THE THIRD DAY OF THE BATTLE.

The glandelinians at another part seized a stockade full of children and set these on fire, so that the helpless children who were unable to get away were burned to death in the burning buildings. They went on and drank their blood. The leader then tore out their hearts and liver and handed these to the men who ate them raw. They did not not do this because they were cannibals, they knew better than that, but they did this to humiliate. The rest of the children who were being persecuted, cried and screamed, without pausing, but it did them no good. The glandelinians now assailed one of the doors of the nearest house with axes and hatchets, and with their pikes the had soon down causing the terrified children to scream. Soon the crowd of the glandelinians burst in through the shattered doorways. They grabbed the children one by one, and strangled them to death. Then they butchered bute bared more of the children. Another of the houses had not been attacked so soon, and these inside had some time for preparation. The men inside were well supplied with gun powder and bullets and they found some material which they barricaded the windows and doors with. When the glandelinians tried to break in they drove them back with heavy losses. Enraged over this the murderous glandelinians gathered in greater numbers before the house, and showered bullets upon it and tried to set it on fire. The enemy had been repulsed a second time but at all the firing continued. The glandelinians soon got in at a back door seized Mary Angeline, a little girl of five years and despite her pleadings and screams strangled her to death, then dashed out her brains on a doorstep. When they murdered another little girl in cold blood whose name was Sarah Jones. Then a swarm of glandelinians burst in on all sides gave the defenders a close volley, seized the rest of the children and slew them. They now went on to assail the other houses which they soon carried and then the slaughter was awful. However this was the last act of the glandelinians and they retreated before the main line was aroused, an abaf abandoning all the stockade stockades they had captured after setting fire to all of them.

CHAPTER THREE. GO ON A SPRING.

THE THIRD DAY OF THE BATTLE

At seven thirty that morning over one million glandelinians appeared and advanced into the great labyrinth labyrinth of woods which shadowed the east borders of the battered fortifications. They recently assaulted by the christians the day before. The van passed the low ground where on either hand lay hidden by thick trees and underbrush half covered in snow lay two fatal ravines. Suddenly a scout far in advance saw a force of fierce abyssinians bounding forward through the forest and along the narrow track general Johnston Evans leading them on. He stopped, turned, and waved his sabre, and his red coat red coated veterans suddenly crowding across the roads opened a murderous fire upon the head of the glandelinian columns, while screeching, and yelling like fiends the abyssinian infantry thranged into the long ravines, and above on both flanks of the advancing glandelinians. The astonished glandelinians returned the fire with good effect, but the christian infantry in the ravines opened an annihilating fire on the right and left of the glandelinians this raking fire soon extending along the whole length of the veteran columns upon the enemy from front and rear. The whole woods seemed ablaze with incessant flashes, the bullets flew like a hail storm, and the unfortunate glandelinians went down in whole multitudes, per minute as it seemed. Five horse horses were shot under general Evans, and five times he mounted a fresh one. The fire of the christians moved the enemy down like grass, while the enemy in edging away delivered a withering fire and a sanguinary conflict ensued. The havoc among the enemy lines was terrific and the discharge of musketry on both sides more incessant. The glandelinians soon however were compelled to retreat and from the distance was heard sudden explosions and a rattling cannon fire followed deadened among the woods but growing louder and more incessant and the shells began to tear the trees. From the woods on the eastern side rose an appalling shout followed by a withering storm of vu bullets.

The ground was strewn with the dead and wounded. Landelinians sold soldiers and the enemy driven from the woods sprang themselves through other portions of the forest opposing a wide front to the Abyssinians fighting stubbornly as they retired to the main line and far and wide during the retreat through the forest rang shot and shriek, and terrific yells mingled with the booming of parks of guns, and the rattle of countless muskets. At every rattling volley the ground became strewn with dead and wounded and finally the foe retreated in utmost haste and again there was quiet and a lull.

While the lull was progressing the christian line was adjusting itself, but later on the enemy artillery opened fire heavily, and for a time the christians were somewhat confused by the crashing of the balls among the trees and branches, and the bursting shells which were singly killing and wounded wounding hundreds.

Multitudes of the glandelinians now rushed in a charge upon the christians striking many down with the butts of their muskets before they were aware of their coming. By fierce resistance however the charge was quickly repulsed. The fleeing multitudes of glandelinians were greeted by a storm of musketry from ambush and sent flying in a great panic. The attack of the Abyssinians in the ambush had been sudden and terrific, and many again lay dead and wounded, and the first three columns of the assailants were totally routed and dispersed. The roar of the Landelinians' artillery at this increased still more, and grape, round shot, and shells again swept the woods and tore the branches away. The christian artillery was brought up and opened fire upon the glandelinian batteries in a hammering manner, and soon the ground was strewn with broken branches and trunks caused by the flying shot and shell. Gathling guns were also brought up to meet their next charge that would come, then the signal for the glandelinians to make another charge was given.

In vain the hundreds of thousands of glandelinians, Landelinians, as meaning with rage and fury hewed with their sabres and broadswords and broadswords among the branches, struggling to get a chance at the Abyssinians. In vain the murderous hordes of glandelinians their lines and columns torn to shreds rushed on. A withering storm of musket balls extending for twenty mile miles in a general discharge discharge met them, and their christian guns fairly swept the whole line in gray with the most terrible carnage and destruction. The shells striking many thousands of trees on the ground in a few minutes. A few general officers and many hundred thousands did finally succeed in penetrating their shield. They through the branches of the felled trees thrown down by a tempest of shot and shell, passed a long line of ditches, and crossed the breastworks, and leaped among the christians, but they were bayoneted in thousands all along the line. The roar of bob bombs, grenades, cannon and musketry loaded to the throat was worse than ever and the effect was terrible on the crushing Landelinians.

But still the surviving glandelinians advanced with bloodcurdling yells. The blazing explosive dragons, hissed, and roared, spouted sheets of fire when they burst, veiled smoke in white pithy illumined clouds and wrought havoc among the gray lines ten fold. Scores of more trees were strewn on the ground the smoke being like a white sheet above the combatants. However covered by their own furious cannonade, the Landelinians survivors kept up their assault though thousands more went down mangled and bleeding. The whole christian line under general Baldwin and Kindermine opened fire also in a fury sweeping the gray soldiers now down in columns, but still the survivors of the glandelinians continued to rush onward and while the more of their columns were literally melting away the first line of Abyssinians rose behind the fiercely defending glandelinian wedge and yelling like demons poured upon the assailants a fire that tore their line to fit pieces.

However the Landelinians forces were powerful in numbers and division after division again and again were thrown out with the purpose of holding the desperate enemy in check but they were literally cut to pieces and were compelled to withdraw. The furious Landelinians had succeeded in carrying the first line of works along general Baldwin's front, when a murderous crash of musketry came from the second line which made a simultaneous blaze extending for many miles. Another awful volley followed with a frightful ear-splitting roar, and then a furious clattering fire which gradually turned into a serious firing that sounded like the simultaneous roaring of a legion of cannon. When the thick pall of smoke arose a miserable sight was revealed. The ground for the distance of twenty miles in length was enumbered with a hundred thousand dead and wounded, but still the advancing survivors utterly reckless reckless in their blinding rage kept moving forward with flood bygones. The slaughter seemed more and more merciless but still the brave Landelinians came on at a rush and were swarmed upon the Angelinians commanded by general Abysinkillians were pressed back out of their positions. One of the other generals Gohl wheeled his reserves to the rescue like lightning, but an indescribable pandemonium ensued and in the mass Gertrude Angelina who had been singing signalling with some flags to a boy scout in telling of the situation, got separated from the Angelinians and with five hundred desperate glandelinians in hot pursuit, she went cowering up a single road followed side by side by three of the Angelinians who were bound to protect her with their lives if need be. The general of the pursuing glandelinians whipped out a pistol and fired the shot carrying away her hat. All of a sudden she saw in another direction a number of mounted Landelinians riding frantically to intercept her and her six faithful guides. But fortunately the little girl and her companions were by before the glandelinians could cut her off from escape. A simultaneous fusillade of shots were discharged and the bullets flew dangerously about them. Suddenly as a swarm of glandelinians came up in front of them to cut off their retreat they turned swiftly to one side, darted their horses straight for the water and leaped into the stream. They urged tremendous splash-splash splash! Here they met a rallied regiment who opened fire upon Gertrude's pursuers, and then all wheeled and dashed for the christian lines who had in the meantime repulsed christian lines, but the pursuers ran into an ambush and met annihilation.

Though repulsed the enemy again again soon renewed the assault and as the christian guns again blazed forth in a general discharge a horrid burst of yells arose. Thousands of the Landelinians were again shot down but the brave survivors leaped the breastworks and drove back the Angelinians in confusion. The confusion even reached general Baldwin's lines and the whole recoiled together crushed to fragments. On pressed the glandelinians charging at a run. They were completely victorious along this point.

Along general Kindermine's front all was quiet for a time now but soon Gertrude Angelina herself had seen long lines of christians retreating within her view, but as these christians were slowly falling back she did not think it serious, but nevertheless she soon heard heavier firing elsewhere and she soon realized that the enemy had again captured general Baldwin's position and was pressing trying to gain the rear of the force flying before Gertrude's. But soon general Bob's men came forward before Gertrude's retreating lines at the rear, and as soon as the whole retreat ing column passed out the glandelinian flankers down in cruel numbers with their musketry fire and drove them back closing the woods, and recapturing Baldwin's position. Multitudes of these glandelinians lay dead dead and among them forty of their leaders, and general Henry Finhead. The roaring of musketry along the christian line had been appalling.

Sometimes later a terrific attack was made upon Kindermine's position the Angelinian troops retaining their former formation unbroken and dealing frightful havoc among the glandelinians. This deadly fire was incessant and masses of graycoats were mowed down at every stride. A line of assault the glandelinians suffered badly from the christian fire which levelled with a close and continuous din. But the survivors only came on and rushed upon Kindermine's position with the most furious impetuosity striving to break the line of troops, pressing them closer and closer, and then with infernal screams poured headlong over the works. The christians now struggled like a legion of lines when the aspect of affairs was suddenly changed. Two divisions of christians who had been the first to abandon their positions now made short detour through the woods without being seen by the enemy and came around upon the flank of the glandelinians and fired a series of close volleys into the midst of the long thick line of graycoats. Myriads were seen to fall, and yet though completely surprised the brave Landelinians faced about with the greatest intrepidity and returned a continuous withering fire, and the flank strikers with yells as wild as the glandelinians themselves fell on them with the bayonet. The shock was irresistible and the Landelinians were driven into a great confusion and fled before the charging line who poured poured upon them another series of destructive fire volleys as fierce as the first. This completed the rout. The three divisions of Gindernines, joined the flankers driving the enemy flying through the woods, giving them no time to rally or reload their empty weapons, killing hundreds per minute and scattering the rest in hopeless confusion.

While this took place with general Gindernines array the Landelinians under general Accountants attacked general Roswell's position, and during this attack the Landelinians set up such a storm of yelling that one could not have heard a thousand thunder claps, and all this while the firing was incessant on both sides, a troops of Landelinian flankers had been crushed, other forces had made a stand but the rest of the surge still came on. General Pare-not-Lie however had witnessed this situation and threw to general Gindernines a division of his own men with four batteries of artillery, which were quickly unlimbered and soon in action all these guns belching fire and smoke. Also more guns from another command were brought to bear on the advancing foe, the cannon fire increasing with vigor the guns hammering away with a deafening din. The ground in front of the advancing enemy and their very lo lines were ploughed and furrowed by cannon balls, and shells and canister. A solid shot struck one of the flag staffs of a Landelinian color bearer splitting the wood, and enveloping the carrier with the falling flag. Pare-not-Lie, main line of infantry now rapidly got into action steering the retreat of other Christian forces who were still falling back the many scores of shells again and again crashing among the trees and bursting as soon as they reached the ground, killing hundreds of the glandelinians. The shells also tore furrows in the ground. Still more and more cannons were brought to bear upon the immense Landelinian columns the cannonading line increasing with greater fury. Three or four of the guns suddenly burst killing scores of the Angelinians and tearing up the ground.

Graps and canister mingled with a storm of bullets and shells including cannon balls tore lanes in the advancing lines and even gaps and so thick was the smoke that trees fifty feet distant was almost hidden out of sight. Many grenades thrown among the foe burst and committed the same same havoc. General Grados glandelinians attempted to carry one of the batteries but a storm of grape shot was sent into their advancing lines which became mangled and shattered, the infantry opening a withering fire and driving them back with frightful loss. The terrible shot and shell did frightful execution as they ploughed through and through the lines of the foe and sent their retreating lines into flying fragments. Even one of the main columns retreated in amazing confusion but general Francis Galeans glandelinians not yet under fire massed themselves forward with great force. The struggle was fearful all along the line and Galeans went down mangled and bleeding. Through the fierce onset however general Gindernines left was crushed to fragments in supporting general Roswell's position and fell back under a galling fire across a part of the Sunbeam Creek the glandelinians pressing after them with a fury that was appalling. The glandelinians dashed up the rising ground under the deadly fire and struggled madly to reach the bleeding cannon sweeping forward in fearful numbers. The struggle grew fiercer and scores of Christian regiments recoiled from their positions in a panic, but heavier forces behind them compelled them to make a stand. With a yell the wicked glandelinians rushed among the cannon, and the remainder of the foe stuck to the position they had captured with the fury of hell and its legion using the guns they captured with very destructive effects until from some unexpected point reinforcements were hurled upon them. Every building in the whole region of the battle even Wiskay Viviania trembled from the quaking of the ground caused by the continuous thunder of the batteries, and the explosions of the shells and the uproar of a massacre. Hundreds of thousands of the Christians were killed and wounded, but the heavier losses were among the foe who still held the captured position.

Barriers were blown and cut away by the shells and now solid masses of infantry attacked the glandelinians furiously, the roar of the battle being redoubled. Scores of the Angelinian columns were mowed down in the furious and vehement attempt to retake the cannon, and general Pare-not-Lie saw on the side of the foe fell mangled and bleeding. The Angelinians did not cease their furious attacks. They were again mowed down in scores scores of thousands but the survivors came rushing on in solid lines with bristling bayonets. At last they struck and a panic ensued that would be too horrible to describe but after it lasted fifteen minutes the mighty onslaught of the Angelinians was repulsed with brave general Pare-not-Lie badly wounded.

Encouraged by the fact that generals Jennings, Hanson, Vivian, Joice, Yilist Vivian, and Redline Stormer were at last checking their assailants, general Pare-not-Lie men despite the fall of their leader went at it again and the fearful and bloody struggle went on without a pause. High above the crash and uproar could be heard the voices of the Christian generals encouraging their men to guns. Huge missiles were thrown against the grayed gray Christian troops had to retire on account of the hot artillery fire which swept them down like grass at every discharge. As reinforcements arrived being sent by general Hanson Vivian under general Redline whole columns were hurled upon the Landelinians in possession of the cannon with irresistible fury and crushing force and how the Landelinians Angelinians could not tell, though they had added to the fury of the conflict by making a fierce and incessant concentrated attack.

Brigade after brigade rushed forward again and again but not frightful destruction and a total rout. But fortunately general Jennings had also cleared his front and with a large force crashed upon the flank of these glandelinians though they suffered the worse loss than any ever experienced in the charges of all battles during the death struggle that ensued. However the Landelinians were now confused and length of ten miles on two sides at that they recoiled in the great confusion. Then with unrelenting fury general Redline's divisions and caused them to stampede utterly dismayed and routed. This ended the struggle of the third day. General Joice however was severely and probably mortally wounded. During the whole three days of the battle already over three hundred thousand Christians had been taken by the foe. Indeed it is a very small number compared to the 5,000,000 glandelinians captured by the Christians. As far as here the losses of the enemy was not known in killed and wounded, but the loss of the Christians in the three days battle along the whole of general Hanson Vivian's lines, his brothers, and general Beck Evans was considered as 76,777,330. At Granchina against the Christian army of 80,000,000 at Tataria or Lieghburg landing a force of 30,000,000. How they held out so long again against such an overwhelming Christian force is a mystery. The number of artillery in action on both sides during the third day of the battle was comparatively few compared to the gun shells of the other two days being 3,704. During the same time that at the third battle the day battle had come to its conclusion, the Angelinians who were recaptured by the Angelinians and the women and children slaughtered and fifty five thousand Landelinians who had been engaged in this bloody slaughter had escaped with the main body. Horrified at the sight of the massacre the Angelinians set fire to the stockades to consume the mangled corpses exposed to view. The number of murdered victims had been checked off and it was found that sixteen thousand women and children had been massacred. The same number of Landelinian prisoners were thus lined up in the field and shot down without mercy this being the reply for the butchery committed. The butchery was not mentioned to the higher officers however for they would have probably conveyed the news to general Hanson who in a fury would have surely turned the Abyssinians loose upon all the prisoners.

The struggle however had not been as sanguinary as the second day but had raged in a desultory storm of conflicts from seven in the morning after the slaughter of women and children, until at eight thirty in the night along the whole entire line except general Vivian's and Evans' armies, Baldwin's lines being included in the action at night conflict and it was reported that five million six hundred thousand wounded Glandelinians had been estimated who were mostly carried away by their own comrades.

The fiercest part of this conflict had raged along general pare-not's lines and Baldwin's near Gertrude and Sunbeam Creek and here was where the heaviest losses on both sides were inflicted. Only one desperate and general assault was made upon general Baldwin's lines, the Glandelinian assailants getting only as far as the second line of works where they were first stopped, and then driven back.....

"I bet that this settles the enemy for a while at least," said Gertrude that late evening when she went to visit her friends the little Vivian girls. "But so my how they attacked. And I thought you little girl friends of mine seen a the battle and yet you say you didn't but stayed far to the rear. I bet you were all scared."

"No we were not scared at all," said Violet. "Our uncle would not allow us to go near the firing lines, and so we obeyed orders."

"But I wonder if the enemy would attack again?"

"I shouldn't wonder," answered Gertrude. "We have taken possession of Gataria and Shoemannia may be planning to retake it at all costs. Manly is bound to break our siege of Evangelina Grania you know."

She and Violet and her sisters went back toward general Parsons' headquarters, and then suddenly yells and a number of shots attracted her attention. A score of the Angelinian soldiers nearest hearing the shots and the mingled yells dashed forward at full speed followed by hundreds of others. As they dashed around a sharp turn in the road they saw a number of five fierce Glandelinians, in the midst of whom were two pretty little girls and two pretty boys struggling to get free. They were advancing strangling the children when Violet who was behind a tree fired three shots in quick succession with her pistols a bullet carrying away one of the wigs of the Glandelinians and giving another a painful wound in the shoulder. One of her sisters also fired three rattling shots at the same moment doing more damage than Violet and creating some thing like a panic in the ranks of the small body of Glandelinians who were ahead of another small party and they fled the men carrying the children dropping the frightened children and fleeing a rapidly as they could Violet and her sisters daringly running out of their hiding places and leading the children within the Christian

Christian lines. Some of the Glandelinians angered at the merry Vivian girls beyond endurance called to their comrades and so pursued so closely that they overtook the Vivian girls. Gertrude Angeline then fired at the two of the nearest murderers and brought them down. A Glandelinian came up and grasped Jennie by the throat, but she beat him fiercely on the head with her pistol butt and fractured his skull. He fell. Another Glandelinian seized Violet but she ran him through the throat with her dagger, and bowed the ears of still another assailant who attacked her with her pistol butt, injuring him severely, and banged the big high hat of a third down about his ears. However such a number of the foe soldiers came upon the Vivian girls that the Angelinians had to rush to their rescue the Angelinians using their muskets with vigor, clubbing one after another of the Glandelinians about them, and not even sparing the leaders, giving one of these a blow that sent him sprawling from his horse, and beating others over the shoulders with such force that it broke their arms. Several of the Angelinian troopers even rode fearlessly into the midst of the Glandelinians and slashed about them with their sabres dealing out many a deadly blow. One got a crack over his shoulders, another one on his back, a third had his hat sent flying, a fourth got a heavy heavy blow that made him scream, and several more received cracks from sabre or musket butt that was fatal. Gertrude Angeline herself gave the main leader of the enemy a rough handling with her pistol butt, while many sabres on both sides clashed together.

The Glandelinians seeing that they were overwhelmed and that there was no hopes of regaining the four children, or capturing the desperate Vivian girls either, and terrified at the fury of Gertrude Angeline and with the dreadful carnage while trying to rally the remainder of his troopers one of the Glandelinian generals fell mortally wounded. On the Christian side general Baile was also mortally wounded.....

recoiled and then turned and fled. Thus the other children had been saved by Violet and her sisters and by the Angelinians. One was a pretty little girl whose name was Francis Otto but the other little girls and boys were too bashful to give their names especially in the presence of Violet and her sisters, and Gertrude Angelina within the Christian lines the main forces were still stationed in that vicinity and all preparations were made during the remainder of the night to force the enemy into another battle. It was general Hanson's intention first to deplete the Marley's army, then if he could not capture his army and Evangeline's army by force he would retain the siege and starve them into surrender.

THE FOUR.

THE FOURTH DAY OF THE BATTLE.

General Hanson had intended to attack the enemy the next morning but he did not have the chance. About seven o'clock in the morning the many Angelinian pickets along general Hanson's right wing noticed a large swarm of Glandelinian cavalry who were marching across the Cataract River in single file, and watching them for some moment they saw that more and more columns added to the first until the swarm had increased to a mighty surge of horsemen. They were the dreaded Marley-Hollistonian cavalry the fiercest fighters of the whole band of Glandelinians. They wore deep blue uniforms, red hats with black tops and had all kinds of colored standards. Though they were the wicked wicked enemies of God they made indeed an exceedingly pretty sight and was well worth the work of an artist. Knowing what was meant that general Hanson was hurling his Marley-Hollistonian cavalry columns against general Hanson's infantry, and knowing that it was impossible for the infantry to stand before the Glandelinian cavalry charge despite all the cannons supporting them the scouts riding up called general Hanson's attention to them. Before general Hanson could express himself concerning the signals among the cavalry of the foe it was nevertheless evident that a great onset was intended against the Christian infantry and if this was allowed a dreadful disaster to the whole Christian army would occur. Knowing what was coming general Hanson via Vivian was notified and he ordered general Linda to lead one of the main Christian generals to nor notify general Asa Evans of the threatening danger. General Evans however had not needed to be warned for he saw the demonstration, realized what was coming and sending signals to many commanders to get the artillery ready sent a large force of Angelinian and Abyssinian cavalry in overwhelming numbers to prevent the Glandelinian cavalry from attacking the Christian line. The Glandelinians were under general Jellio's callio and these suddenly charged irresistibly over the plains and toward general Wallace's purple lines stationed along the banks of the Imperial Graham's creek while a yell so fierce that no language could describe arose high into the air. Like an avalanche pushing a cloud of dust the Glandelinian cavalry columns came charging across the entire stretch of plains yelling like crazed maniacs but general Evans had worked his own plan in time and suddenly upon them from the woods rushed general Wallace and Glandelinian Archbishops' savage galloping Abyssinian and Angelinian horsemen and like wild dogs going on a stampeding rampage they recklessly rode right among the Glandelinian cavalry plying their sabres and carbines and revolvers with deadly effect and every volley or sabre thrust seemed to drop every victim. It was a duel to the death for hundreds of thousands of men at once and so crushing was the crash that in the panic that followed Glandelinian Archbishops' unexpected attack the Glandelinian horsemen fled in confusion back across the plains pressed closely by the Christian troopers but so closely were they harassed that the survivors became jammed into a solid mass and like a horde of savages trying to crush mobs packed in the plains. The scene of conflagration of confusion was dreadful and being literally cornered the Glandelinians killed of their own accord and gallantly tried to stem the rush of Christian troopers. The cavalry battle was dreadful nearly half of the number on both sides faced each other in savage death struggles and amid the dreadful carnage while trying to rally the remainder of his troops one of the Glandelinian generals fell mortally wounded. On the Christian side general Wallis was also mortally wounded.....

General Jenden fired eight shots from one of his revolvers and moved just as many red coats down. This kind of firing and hand to hand fighting showed how quickly the glandelinian cavarly men got into action even after being routed, and with what deadly effect. General Samuel Jenden a brother of the other general fired both his pistols at close range and when his revolvers were empty he drew his sabre, and elabed at the Angelinians right and left. The glandelinians cavarly however was heavily outnumbered and the glandelinians though they tried once more to rally could not stem the tide of ruin the Abyssinkilians opening a hellish attack with renewed fury and as the glandelinians halted and wavered at the slaughter caused by the christian attack one of the glandelinians whose shots hit every mark threw up his arms as if to ward off a slap in the face.

Almost simultaneously the mounted detachment of cavarly behind the wavering lines charged forward yelling like fiends and again a general rally was made and multitudes of the Angelinians caught in the rush tried with might and main to break through the firm gray and blue lines and get into the adjoining plains to have a free hand but the desperate glandelinians were so closely identified with their movements by that time, in front and rear, and all around that it became another hand to hand fight. The Abyssinkilians however were more notoriously hard fighters than the Angelinians, than ever the Me-pollastinians themselves, and for a time during the renewed hand to hand death struggle, the glandelinian cavarly were again getting the worse of it and a good trouncing at that. No man however in command was nearer the thick of the fight than general Jellio himself. However so closely packed was the combatants there was no room to lead a charge and the general got right up in the melee. He weaved in and out of the fray like a ferret fighting hand to hand and giving his commands alternately. General Samuel Jenden on the christian side also dashed into the bloody fray with his long sabre flashing in the light. He drew a perfect rain of bullets from the glandelinians and sabre thrusts also. General Jansen had marked him for his own and in the hand to hand fight shot him at close range through the arm and chest mortally wounding him. General Fredrick Jansen saw the shot and fired at Jansen the shot striking the glandelinian in the forehead and sinking into his brain. The glandelinians as badly shot as he was, was still conscious and tried to lift his weapon to fire another shot but found himself growing weak all at once and then plunged forward from his own and to the ground face downward dead. As Samuel Jansen wounded as he was continued to fight. He did well for a moment when he got the drop on one of the glandelinians for a last shot. The glandelinian threw up his pistol hand and exclaimed;

"I surrender."

But as Samuel moved aside and fired at a glandelinian beyond, the treacherous glandelinian who cried "I surrender" turned and shot Samuel in the back. When the ping of the bullet impressed it self upon him he felt a numbness. One of the Angelinians reached out and held him on his horse while another Angelinian who was a witness to the treachery of the glandelinian, shot and killed him. At the same time an Angelinian officer at the right side of general Fredrick Jansen was shot, and Fred reached out to grasp him, but the Angelinian general suffered from his wound, and pulled away, falling from his horse into the road and managed to drag himself to a neighboring spring still running despite the weather being so cold, where he washed the wound and stopped the flow of blood. The man who held Samuel on horseback succeeded in getting him into a near by house and placing him on a lounge after which he rushed off to fight the brave glandelinians some more. Fredrick Jansen fired at a glandelinian, and missed him which he seldom did. The glandelinian fired back and hit Fredrick with a forty five calibre slug, which struck his gun necessary which he had in his shirt pocket but nevertheless the general was severely if not mortally wounded. He fell from his horse before any one could come to his aid. Had it not been for the cover the slug would surely have entered his heart and caused his death, but the bullet though leaving an ugly gash almost like a hole had only penetrated into one of his ribs.

The glandelinians along this part after a loss of three hundred thousand were soon repulsed but the other columns still went at it until fully overwhelmed and trodden down the survivors arrived for the christians as the other confused divisions recoiled and they shot down at one discharge of musketry scores of columns of the glandelinians hammering away with their musketry in a lively fashion and the foe was staggered. Then a great sheet of flame of the whole column finally retreated having lost over two million men. It was the first most desperate cavalry battle in the war since General Gringo's about an hour after the cavalry engagement was hurried in strong columns against the christian infantry line but was soon driven back by a counter assault of the Angolians though the foe in their retreat nevertheless stubbornly fought every inch of ground.

CHAPTER FIVE.

THE BLOODY PURSUIT OF THE BATTLE ALONG THE
NO RIGHT AND CENTER, AND THE MAIN PURSUIT OF THE FOURTH DAY'S DURATION OF THE BATTLE AND THE RESULT.....

The Glandelinians soon however resumed the desperate assault, the first line of Glandelinian veterans three deep and nearly ten miles long rushed forward for about thirty yards, while another made a similar rush, and gained about half the distance to the front. Now the first line of Glandelinian veterans ceased firing and took their turn at the forward movement while the other line opened fire. Men fell in frightful numbers during those rushes for the christian line, whose fire was hot and effective, bullets sipping by their ears or over their heads, and many showers went with a spatter into the earth at their feet, but many met their mark. The two lines were soon deployed by large squads into lines of skirmishers, and the rest deployed into skirmishers, and back in the distance and the battalion and brigade reserves closed up. The support was with them then, now and they again rushed forward with more confidence this time by two new sections. The christian fire became more rapid and hundreds of Glandelinians dropped all along the line at each rush. But behind them the reserves were coming and the christians hammered volleys at the enemy until their rifle and musket barrels became so hot that they could not touch them. The enemy answered the fire furiously and the continued firing sounded like the rolling of a million deafening drums mingled by the incessant prolonged booming of hundreds of cannons. Another long rush was made, followed by the rapid fire again. After continuing the rapid firing for several minutes the Glandelinians were commanded to fix bayonets and charge. The Glandelinians sprang forward through the smoke but the plucky Angolians stood their post and again poured a murderous fire into the charging lines as they dashed on with yells that was quite bloodcurdling. But at last the foe reached the christian line and went over the intrenchments at a couple of bounds. An indescribable melee followed of individual fighting with bayonets, pikes, revolvers, daggers, pistols, sabres, and clubbed muskets. One hundred of the Angolians light artillery dashed up to some high ground and opened fire, but a large force of Glandelinians over three hundred thousand in number charged these guns, and took them though suffering the loss of one quarter of their number in that single onslaught. The Glandelinians had now advanced over the works facing the banks of the Imperial Granma river driving the poor Angolians before them in confusion and the enemy advancing with startling rapidity. The ninth corps of the Angolians did not know that the Glandelinians were pressing on, until their retreat was cut off. The smoke rolled into the air in dense volumes from the frequent discharge of musketry and cannon, and through it light flames flashes could be seen. The roar of the discharge was appalling and the smoke was like from some immense seething caldron. The surrounding Glandelinian Glandelinians kept pouring in their fire incessantly upon the christians and when their withering fire made a breach, the Glandelinians with the bayonet and clubbed musket, rushed through, stabbing and banging away right and left, causing the greatest confusion. Thousands of the Angolians were knocked down and many hundreds stabbed by the bayonet, and were trodden upon by the rushing foe and many were made prisoners. The air was still filled with the pall of smoke and the fight on both sides was getting hotter all the time. New forces now arrived for the christians as the other confused divisions recoiled and they whet down at one discharge of musketry scores of columns of the Glandelinians hammering away with their musketry in a lively fashion and the foe was staggered. Then a great sheet of flame three hundred thousand were soon repulsed but the other columns still went at it until fully overwhelmed and trodden down the survivors from their side of the line. There was nothing to do but fight it out all along the line to the finish. George saw Hanson's strong line was not making any better success and the enemy had gained headway it seemed that nothing could stop them. The enemy were not advancing slowly now but as their full trot the entire christian line being closed with the landelinsians closed and acquired like a snake, and as the enemy poured from the woods also it seemed evident that the christian line was placed between two fires, but nevertheless the christians stood their ground nobly their faces covered with burned powder but despite it all more and more of the christians fell back, and more fresh troops of the enemy appeared to be advancing through the woods on the opposite side and these had pushed the christians all the way back. Indeed the woods on both sides seemed filled with the landelinsians while now other plains and lanes were swarming with the foe. It was evident that general Hanley was pushing a general attack upon general Hanson's divisions whole center and concentrating his whole army upon that one point.

The other christian divisions under James and Lane were a swarming fresh troops to the rescue of those sadly depleted but later they also were forced to fall back for there was a deaf danger that the enemy would get to their rear without warning, and if they did, then the battle along this point would be lost, and general Hanson would have the duty of a time in preventing a great disaster which would insure a total victory for the whole landelinsian army.

But however their flank was protected by batteries and there was a little danger that could be seen just now. However the enemy had made a great advance and were coming on in all their fury toward general George Hanson's main left wing the christians here again going into the fight with a will. On the moment the air was filled with more dense smoke and even when it cleared away it was seen that the enemy still rushing forward and it was now a harder fight than ever many hundreds of the landelinsians dropping from sheer exhaustion every half hour. At times the advanced columns of the enemy seemed to be checked and thrown into confusion, but the main columns sprang forward wilder, more furious, more intent for the lust of victory. Not a trick of the enemy did the landelinsians allow to escape them, and with every trick they only maneuvered until the enemy were forced to give up for something else.

At all points the enemy attack still continued, at all points they still continued to rush on, the conquerors. It was heartrending. Steadily the christians backed away, and just as steadily did the enemy advance. The enemy indeed seemed to be winning the long and unusual struggle. Still more determined the christians continued their efforts nevertheless to fight back the enemy, but it seemed useless, for now the enemy was advancing in ever increasing numbers from the southern part of the woods, which were still swarming swarming with the foe. Indeed the enemy reinforcements had made it up behind them, while the christians were fighting the other landelinsians in front.

The enemy even attacked the crowd of divisions protecting the flanks. Surrounded by the enemy: The christians under George Hanson did not turn to see whence the crash of musket volleys came, did not turn to catch the enemy, and as they came dashing in their headlong charge upon their flank, but instead they stood to their work pouring their fire upon the advancing enemy in front, desperately hopelessly vainly trying to beat back the onward march. It seemed of no avail, but they manfully fought trusting wholly in God and their great generals.

Slowly the christians fell back toward the only opening that was left by the enemy, and yet still the christians were loath to leave the advancing foe of God. On three sides they could now see the enemy advancing with an irresistible force and feared indeed that this battle was lost. Nothing although it seemed could check the enemy. Even the brisk fire of general Hanson's divisions applied with incessant fury could check for an instant the steady advance of the enemy. The awful columns of survivors advanced in the face of the fire though moved down in thousands, and they seemed to act as if the christian fire did not harm them at all. The christians however were fighting the enemy with greater vigor now as reinforcements began to arrive and now the effects of the destructive christian fire began to show. General George Hanson, exultant, taking advantage of the moment, when the enemy before him began to show signs of wavering, had ordered his men forward, and there was more direct directness even now in the manner of the fight.

The divisions in the rear were also fighting the enemy back. On the instant the christian fire was poured into the wavering lines of the enemy. But ahead of them several large columns of the enemy were still gaining, behind them the forces of the landelinsians were still advancing against their flank at a fearful rate. Undaunted undaunted however by the yelling of the enemy behind or to the front the christians fought them. General George Hanson his arm now in a bandage watched the enemy advancing behind him, watched the advances which the enemy made were making toward his left and right. Fear and fiercer grew the without him as the enemy having rallied were again swarming up on all sides. But the christians again made their stand against the advancing foe and by their constantly fighting fiercely and bravely began once again to check their slight rise. The enemy had swept on over all the other fields and undaunted. General George Hanson's men seemed to be confronted by overwhelming numbers for again the enemy were advancing unchecked, advancing straight forward sweeping all before them already along the main left. The peculiar peculiar thing to George Hanson was that the enemy had advanced across the fields but not over the smooth lanes. Why the enemy had advanced past the lanes and across the fields as they came sweeping on in their irresistible attack. Many more divisions of the enemy were appearing far down on the left of the main plains from the rear and which showed that again the whole force of the enemy had rallied and was reaching their rear again. The christians were making little progress in checking the enemy, though at some points three large divisions of the enemy had not advanced any further; though of course the steady christian fire was not driving them back. Even more of the enemy were rushing on across all points of the plains and the landelinsians tried to hold the enemy back, from advancing too close for it would be fatal if they did, but now to hold them in check seemed really impossible. However at many points the enemy were not advancing now but holding their own stubbornly, many of their divisions finding places for further advance occasionally but still not moving forward, and they only advanced when there was no opposition to hold them in check. Steadily facing the enemy, weakened by the strain of the death struggle which had now along this point lasted two hours, and promising to last all day they stood at their post. The din and uproar was alarming indeed, the thunder of the heavy artillery, the screaming and shrieking shells, adding to the din, the clank of steel on steel, the noise of general firing for a long stretch of distance making a noise that was appalling. Then came the roar of fresh yells, a fresh crash of musketry, and General George Hanson saw general Kindersline with his men approaching and going into battle, while another battery of christian guns broke into action.

"General Hanson," Kindersline declares that we will have to abandon this position. "Said general Kindersline to George Hanson. "Of course we are training all our deadliest batteries upon the foe, but never nevertheless if we face these assailants such longer we will be exterminated. You know these blue coated landelinsians are no-H-ellians and they are the worse kind of all and the kind never to be liked."

General George Hanson seeing that the advice of his superior was good gave the order to fall back steadily and more faster.

"Fall back." Then came the words of the generals in command. "We are the last to leave but I guess we will have to go or be annihilated."

With no heavy reinforcements able to be obtained from general Hanson's divisions main command there was no use to continue the stand any longer. Kindersline decided to cover general George Hanson's retreat. All of his officers had soon called their veterans away from the sanguinary struggle, and staggering from sheer exhaustion of the fight, the brave christians slowly retreated, seeing how the enemy had swept the entire field, now advancing from the rear, while the captured artillery now broke loose with a hellish uproar. It had been a noble fight, but the christians had been forced to abandon their positions, the entire line of the enemy swarming over like a firm wall, every bayonet gleaming in the sunlight. Along this point the battle gradually ceased but was still heard at a other point of the christian line it being general Hanson's right wing which was still hidden in the smoke of musketry and cannon. The landelinsians here were still swarming in terrible numbers threatening here also to sweep everything before them.

The enemy for the space of five hours from the beginning of morning made fifteen assaults upon general Owell's position. At first the enemy made every time their lines were swept by most terrible artillery fire but during some of these desperate assaults the enemy did try to surround general Owell's position, but a hidden battery opened upon them from three directions and the foe columns were compelled to recoil a considerable distance, and many dropped flat to avoid the fire, the smoke being so dense that they could hardly see ahead. Many were fairly blinded by the smoke and strangled. A greater mass of the enemy were rushing on to make another attack, mauling the Christians furiously the glandelinians yelling in maddening glee as they tore onward in their mad charge. The wicked glandelinians were already close to the Christian line who were gathered together in great heavy numbers to meet the shock of the charge as the reckless glandelinians came on yelling like millions of demons. There was one greater burst of artillery and musketry then the clashing of swords, and the ripping and tearing of human bodies as the two foes came together in a hand to hand struggle. Part of the right grand division of general Owell's Benignus, line on the left of Owell's must Johnnie's line gave way before this terrific onslaught the enemy pressing on with the greatest force. And all the while all along the line, one of the Christian divisions under general Owell, became shattered and as they also were falling back a stalwart glandelinian rushed at one of the nearest officers but one of the glandelinians nearest drew his sabre and gave the glandelinian such a knock on his head that he laid him on his feet in a woeful condition, and if he had struck the fellow another blow he would have cut his head in two. Then another glandelinian rushed forward to seize the officer, but the same glandelinian struck him such a heavy blow on the head that without breaking his sabre he cut the glandelinian's head in two, then put to flight two more.

"The enemy is indeed attacking with frightful fury," said one of the generals riding up. "I believe they intend to carry our position despite our fierce resistance, and it seems as if nothing could stop them."

"We have got to retain these works at all costs," said another general earnestly. "And against any numbers we have got to hold our ground."

Indeed the enemy was attacking with awful fury despite the fact that fresh artillery was brought into action. Even general Owell's brought his main forces into action along the Christian center and was also supported by the Christian troops under general Jennings all these men displaying a bristling wall of bayonets that dealt awful havoc among the gray lines but the survivors continued the attack giving forth a pandemonium of yells, curses, and abusive language, and even blasphemies, and surged upon the Christian line like a tidal wave. The struggle was desperate and though the glandelinians along this point had lost over five hundred thousand thousand in killed and wounded since they started the attack the survivors only redoubled the violence of the attack. General Owell's division with his own divisions had rushed upon the right wing of Owell's position Johnnie's line, but yelling like the worse legion of demons themselves, the glandelinians poured an annihilating fire upon these assailants reducing Owell's divisions to fragments, and compelling the survivors to withdraw, their leader and twenty colonels besides other commissioned officers and every major being killed.

After this repulse other glandelinian columns charged, but again whole divisions were decimated, and though the glandelinians had tried to rally other portions of the column in gray had withdrawn in great confusion, thus causing the main column to fall back. Indeed these retreating glandelinians were cursing and swearing in a terrible manner as they fell back but it did not hurt the Christians any in that line as they were so tired over their success, though it did sting them in hearing their loved ones in heaven abused so freely and only poured in a fiercer fire to avenge it cutting down the glandelinians like flies. After this repulse the enemy only came on again in fresh numbers this time being under general Benignus these glandelinians attacking with yells that would have done credit to the very devils themselves. All the columns along the Christian line again let loose a fire of hell, sweeping the enemy's lines with a storm of death and destruction, while at the same time the Angolan batteries on the hills opened fire with a thunderous roar and eighty thousand glandelinians fell within twenty minutes.

Even the batteries under general Baldwin were the third to open fire, fairly mauling away at the advancing and attacking columns, added by the fire of Owell's whole division of troops. This a discharge of artillery was deafening and the shock so severe that it broke windows and caused plants or to fall inside the houses up in Indian ink as far away, even in the houses of scores of cities around which were affected by the din and commotion of by the cannonading. Even to make matters worse more batteries were rained upon the assailants and brought into action mowing down columns. On and on however swept the glandelinians and dashing nearer to the works every moment. Nearer and nearer came the glandelinians with the gleam of fixed bayonets, then the long lines of infantry which were silent up to this time let go their mighty incense tremendous general discharge. But still on pressed the surviving glandelinians in unbroken lines, but the Christians holding the breastworks defended them like Spartans, causing frightful slaughter among the enemy. Mangled thousands of the glandelinians with their bayonets and pikes. Then the survivors along the front line recoiled only a moment, then were rallied by the main body and came on in a new push and soon were again swarming over the line of breastworks, and it became a death struggle hand to hand the Christians however being forced out of the breastworks and hurled back in confusion. The glandelinians were again seeing their successes decided to push on and carry the second line of works, no matter what the risk and so they saved their sabres and ordered their men on.

"Forward men. We must carry the second line and raise the flag of glandelinia over their ramparts!"

On came the multitudes of glandelinians pressing upon the retreating Christians driving them to the second line of works, and attacking these with indestructible fury, many columns being mangled and dispersed, but the commanders yelled:

"Hold the works. Watch out for the bayonets if possible, and for their infernal cannon. We must capture the works at any risk."

Hundreds of thousands after hundreds of thousands charged but were mowed down but millions of the survivors soon began to swim over the works, and before the fierce assault the Christians could not hold the second line of works though they were all filled with courage and fought valiantly. General Tom'st's line on the Christian side fell, and soon the whole Christian force at this point was retreating in the utmost confusion. Gertrude Angelina the famous little girl Amazon and heroine had heard how the battle had raged along the center itself, and was surprised when she heard that the poor Christians had been partly surrounded, and still worked themselves out of the trap.

"It's by their faith in God that they did win," said Gertrude as the wounded were being brought in. "But I wish this old war was over. It's nothing but slaughter and butchery of whole armies all the time."

At the same time while this was raging greater and more disastrous struggles raged along other portions of the Christian line. Along the banks of a small creek or called Copacabana the great conflict had raged for over seven hours the glandelinians being all exterminated, and later reinforced by thousands of their forest kind made forty one desperate onslaughts, and though suffering from fearful losses in every assault had drove back the main Christian line at that section, and before the main line could have rallied to counter charge and recover the lost ground, the enemy had managed to surround general John's Christian army and annihilated his whole command because he had refused to surrender. By superhuman fighting against great odds, general Christian had succeeded in escaping the glandelinian savages, but later on was shot down in ambush.

All the Christian soldiers who had been captured including two hundred and fifty thousand children had been brutally treated, but the enemy had not been able to retain their prisoners long, for the main line surged forward in a fierce counter charge, cut to the glandelinian army to pieces, and routed the remainder with fearful losses and with the loss of twenty generals, and retaking the prisoners and children. The plan then there were no glandelinians taken prisoners on this occasion, but the for the glandelinians fought too furiously and none would surrender.

The Christians lost in this part of the battle nine hundred and eighty thousand in slain, and one million eighty nine thousand nine hundred and forty two. The Glandelinians lost nine hundred and eighty thousand five hundred and sixty four in dead and the loss of three million in fatally wounded. At another point of this battle line the enemy lost still greater numbers losing one million eight hundred thousand in killed and one million and two million five hundred thousand in wounded.

Early that same morning at another point of the battle line along general vivian's main line general shoemann and Bessiger had arrived and reinforced the glandelinians in possession of two lines of works along this portion of the christian line, and this had advanced moving forward until at two thirty in the afternoon they were heavily attacking the whole of general vivian's lines, and general janson, livian hearing of the startling news feared the enemy might capture his own position, so he then forced their way across the third line of works and break the whole line, so he had established the broken parts of his own line with fresh columns having fine plenty of reserves. It was also reported to him that the enemy were active in and around one of his wings having received large reinforcements.

While these reports were given out general Bessiger led the plaine and gunbeam greek and struck general janson's first line of troops such a terrific blow that the whole line was annihilated and the second line crushed to fragments and driven back, and all the fortified works were captured. At the same time two other fortified positions along the east bank of the gunbeam greek were captured by the enemy & after they made two severe and decisive charges. Hanson was in a rage when he discovered this, and led a million Abyssinkilians forward to retake these positions. The struggle was resumed with redoubled violence, and the fury of the battle was now more fearful than any other time before.

The enemy hurled them back with frightful loss, but general Hanson was wholly determined and led on fresh columns to make another assault. All the captured cannon blazed away at the onrushing Abyssinkilians tearing their line to fragments, but the survivors rushed on and made such a determined and incessant assault that the rear works were soon retaken and one part of the glandelinian surge defending the position was surrounded and forced to surrender. The christians lost two hundred and fourteen thousand in killed and wounded in this struggle, and the losses of the enemy was two million in killed wounded, and prisoners.

Then general janson decided to concentrate heavily upon the other position. General Bessiger Hanson was ordered to move forward to the advance and attack the left grand division of the glandelinian center, ordering Henry Mc-Kay, and Wenthro Worthworth Haller to assault the other two divisions. Now there was really a battle and no mistake this time. The charge was fearful, and Bessiger succeeded after a merciless fight to push the left wing from the main works the sanguinary struggle being general and raging all along the line. Simultaneously Kay was engaged with the central grand division which held the ground stubbornly and fought with the fury of desperation. Fearful losses occurred in this struggle. The cannonading was frightful and monstrous columns of Abyssinkilians pushed forward only to be mangled and crushed. Whole tens of thousands were swept down by the concentrated glandelinian artillery fire, but the main line threw itself upon the Mc-Hollistatnian line with crash and roar. The battle was wild in the extreme, and terrible was the million cannon like roar of musketry, and whole long chains of artillery. General Kindermine himself was suffering such heavy losses, and had been counter charged to hard, that he would have been obliged to retreat had not general Baldwin Watermann come up with his artillery and infantry. Thus the assault was renewed with tremendous fury and overwhelming violence. The appalling appalling was the slaughter, the assailants lying in ridges where they had fallen, and overwhelmed with their losses general Kindermine's troops became demoralized and panic stricken and began to fall back. Wenthro Worth Haller attacked the right grand division and the worse of the remainder of the battle was here. 10,000 cannon roared incessantly the angelians rushing on at a headlong charge driving the glandelinians out of the position, but the glandelinian forces though badly cut up and mangled rallied and being reinforced gathered in greater numbers and met Wenthro Worth's attack with such merciless fury that the conflict became more cruel and sanguinary all along the line.

The Glandelinian right wing was threatened with annihilation, the whole three of the glandelinian wings having been attacked simultaneously, and several of general Abner and Jemisonians best divisions of Abyssinkilians had shattered the enemy's whole line under general Bessiger, but in the conflict two of the Abyssinkilian generals their losses the Abyssinkilians captured two divisions of Mc-Hollistatnians but could not be restrained by their officers, and they brutally massacred their prisoners right within the very eyes of the main line of the foe. The glandelinians have also later on found it a dangerous thing to shoot down Abyssinkilian officers of any rank.

Even to make matters worse for the enemy all the christian cannon were in action now and the roar of christian artillery alone seemed to shake the heavens while the christian attack continued in endless fury, the slaughter being more horrible than ever. However the christian right wing was now pressing close upon the left of the glandelinian forces in possession of the works which was by being steadily pushed back by the savage Galverinians and Abyssinkilians, and soon the survivors fell back abandoning the positions, their main line being mangled and torn to tatters. Simultaneously a large force of retreating Glandelinians, and Mc-Hollistatnians with child prisoners in their possession, tried to cross the gunbeam greek on a series of pontoon bridges, but a heavy artillery fire was poured upon them despite the fact that the children were prisoners among them, and soon the bridges were a tangle and conglomeration of broken wreckage with struggle scenes of glandelinians and frightened but not injured children. At once a sea of heads of Abyssinkilians fell upon them on one side, and Galverinians on the other, and another massacre commenced, the children being wrested from the foe the Abyssinkilians shouting: "Not keep on the massacre of children, and we'll continue to commit the massacre of glandelinian soldiers."

The works along the left were rapidly in possession of the fierce Abyssinkilians their flags waving back and forth, and the Abyssinkilians screaming with their fierce eagle like yells, the very woods seemed filled with exploding shells. The whole left grand division was giving way before overwhelming numbers, despite the fact that their leaders ordered them furiously to stand firm but as they could not hold their formation the generals were at last compelled to order them to fall back. The attack was fearful along the central grand division which was steadily reinforced, and now the right was also reinforced - some more and soon the assailants were hurled back torn and bleeding. Then in a bitter rage Bessiger gathered his shattered armies and fell back. At the left general janson threw powerful columns upon the glandelinians throwing forward his whole force, thus increasing the carnage to redoubled fury. General janson himself had been so near the firing line the several times he had narrow escapes from being wounded and also had narrow escapes from being captured, and only escaped by his super human strength in his arms, felling his assailants by three scores with his plain flats despite the abuse that the enemy tried to do him with.

Twenty thousand had fallen near the works he stood by, thirty one thousand christians by an angle of works, sixty thousand at another, twenty nine thousand of Kindermine's, and thirty thousand nine hundred ninety nine at other points. Many of the Glandelinian generals had been shocked when they witnessed this desperate christian attack and though the enemy had failed to hold the captured positions they knew also that the entire line of positions were now in the possession of the christians. General janson however was determined at all hazards to break general Hanson or his brothers lines and so he ordered his own main forces on the march, some divisions to attack gallant forces and Kindermine's which had been crushed to fragments by the recent assault of the christian lines.

The glandelinian attack soon came and hell itself seemed to suddenly break loose along the whole christian line and in the frightful bedlam general Hanson, whom a christian commander received a wound that cut a blood vessel in his neck.

He was brought back under fire just as two other generals, Perseverance and Octavus fell mortally wounded. The first general janson was attended by a surgeon. Several generals were standing with uncovered heads while the blood gushed in torrents from the wounded generals' throat drenching the surgeon who was vainly striving to stop its flow. He soon died with the silent and uncovered men about him, the last sound he heard was the hoarse roar of the battle, the whistling of bullets, while showers of smoke blown back from the pathing guns now brought into action gave a sight that could not be had on any stage. The angelinians stalk to their position the enemy attacking in heavy numbers and yelling like mad - an mad - mad - mad. One attacking force was brought under a heavy flanking fire at two hundred yards range, and suffered horribly. As a frightful number of their officers had been shot down, and it seemed impossible for them to carry Jennings line, the glandelinians broke into some confusion. The men began to bunch up, and lie down, but their main commanders encouraged them on and with cries of down with the christian dogs rushed upon the whole of jennings lines. All was engaged, Evans also. So furious was this conflict that the earth seemed to have opened her mouth and roited in its sulphurous fumes, the cannon flashes seemed to be worse than lighting, the heavens seemed to split in pieces and fall down in a rain of flames, the earth seemed to whirl upwards in a haze, men and earth seemed to blaze and hurtle and then a crash, a maddening uproar of hell and its damned damnation, and the main gray line of assault reeled backwards, countless numbers going down, the wounded cringing close to get her see that their faces, their uniforms have red wet stains, and distantly recogniz as shards of flesh and entrails on the cloth, and among little Gertrude Angelines feet, something was lying that was not lying there before. It gleaming white, from the rocks and uncurled a d strange dismembered hand, fragments of flesh with the uniforms still adhering to them. Then poor Gertrude so saw to her horror a human being coming up. Coming up with a rush. He stumbled upright into the trenches, and at unbridled sobbing and howling among the dead beside the trenches. He struck out at her with hands and feet. O He cried and struggled like a child. Yet no man dared go to him for he was now rising on his knees, and then Gertrude saw that half of his face was torn away, one eye gone, the twitching muscle of the cheek hanging down, mingled with thickened gore. He was kneeling, and opening and closing his hands, and was howling to the angelinians for mercy. Gertrude gazed at this glandelinian in horror, shrieked, and seemed paralysed, then at length the yoken raised his the butt of his rifle and placed the muzzle against the sound temple - bang - and then the maimed wreckage fell over backwards, and lay still in his blood. Gertrude a moment later saw another sample of the horrors of the death of the battlefields. Some other man in a gray uniform came crawling toward her on all fours and dragging something behind him with his body, and all the time he was whimpering like a sick dog, and was howling shrilly in long drawn tones. He was still crawling along fast and when he had reached the works Gertrude saw what those things were, and her blood seemed to stand still in her heart. They were his entrails hanging out of his body, his belly had been ripped wide open from below, and he was crawling upon his entrails - he was coming - the entrails were coming - horror broke out from every pore, he hardly knew how to move from the little girl - she lied still, fliased mother earth, who had slain her children so cruelly. Thus for the first time in her life she realized how war mangles her victims. Two hours later general janson said ghastly for - a mari - and here he happened to be attacked by a force of eighteen million angelinians, and the conflict again raged furiously, the angelinians however being repulsed with frightful loss. While this was going on several boy scouts came in reporting that a new force of the line once more, and even reinforcing the troops still in possession of one of the christian positions, it already being nearly evening. "We must recover these works if we can," said general janson. "How fast are the enemy attacking?" "As fast as men can walk or run," answered the boy scout. "They seem to be in a terribly great hurry, and there is little time to be lost." General janson got his forces ready once more for a counter attack, and decided not to wait, but to make the attack before the reinforcements of the foe became too strong. He wanted to recover the works so that he could repel the assaults of the enemy with more success, and so he thought that the sooner he began the attack the better. General janson ordered general jennings to make the first assault.

Penrod was not worrying especially. He had utter a confidence in violet and her sisters who were his friends, and he enjoyed the excitement of the events in which he was taking part. So he went to his own chamber and crept into bed and fell asleep as easily as if he had been in his own bedroom at home, sort of grating, grinding and booming noises awakened him. The whole forest and the positions of the glandelinians seemed to tremble and sway as if there was an earthquake. Penrod therefore sat up in bed, rubbing his eyes to get the sleep out of them, and then found it was daylight. Penrod dressed himself and then went to see if the vivian girls were awake. As he proceeded to their chamber there was a terrific crash like the loudest thunder, and a series of crashes as if a severe thunderstorm was going on. As he entered the chamber he saw the little girls were just about dressed and they looked excited. "What is it?" asked Penrod. "I'm not sure," answered violet as a deafening crash almost deafened her ears with a terrible sound. "But it feels and sounds as if a terrible storm has struck us!" As soon as possible they finished dressing, while a ranking sound started in, and the smacking continued. When came a reverberating crash that seemed to be like bursting planets and the little girls hurried to the general's own room and found the general up and dressed and just buckling on his sword. "O not be alarmed," said violet, "we are under fire that is all. The noise proves the enemy is shelling our position, and that the bombardment is on only a prelude to cover an approaching infantry attack." "Just do you mean by an approaching infantry attack?" asked violet. "Is the battle raging already?" "Come here out to the entrance to the tent and see," was the reply. The general led them to the entrance of the tent to the outside, and they could actually see that the woods in possession of the enemy a mile away was covered with puffy balls of smoke and wreath clouds like mist and then a storm of deafening crashes roared in the sky. Bang, bang, bang, bang, bang. Went four great explosions in the company street and one shell struck a barracks and almost raised it. Though the haze could be seen a monstrous wave or line of glandelinians approaching slowly but surely, and though the smoke haze was rather thick they could nevertheless see through it and distinguish the further end of the woods. "The glandelinian assaults are not here yet," said the general. "They will come soon however, and I will have to report to my division and put them into battle line. If the rebels do force our lines they won't do so until a great number of them are shot down." "Won't the attack be postponed?" violet inquired anxiously. "No indeed." "Has your army ever in battle before?" "Oh yes on several occasions. We fought at Godefrine and Jennie vivian put our main general does not care much about that. I think our general feels the glandelinians will attack his whole line simultaneously and try to break his line at every point." "Well then if we are under fire the glandelinians will start to attack us sooner than we expect and we cannot repel them successfully here." asserted violet. "The glandelinians could also blow us from our positions," said Jole a gravely. "The glandelinians have ways to use artillery too, even though we are under fire now." Indeed general janson said: "I cannot tell you all our ways now as it would delay the, but our glandelinian allies have lots of surprise for the insurgents. Also our general's methods are astonishing." "Did he learn it like other generals did or did he steal them methods from the enemy when his secret service agents were spying upon?" "He secured the knowledge from the efforts of Godefrine Aramburg, but he uses his plans as general Godefrine Aramburg would never have done."

the last sound he heard was the booming roar of the battle, the whistling of bullets, and the clouds of smoke blown back from the path of the bullets. He saw a sight that could not be described in words. He saw the smoke of the battle, the smoke of the battle, the smoke of the battle. One of the soldiers was killed. One of the soldiers was killed. One of the soldiers was killed.

your safety laid in her quick action."
"I suppose your general will fight terrible Federal with all his might," observed Penrod.
"I do not see how the glandelinians under general Federal can get to this position and attack us with such ease," said general Anotone.
"They have lots of cannons, and big guns and I guess they mean to shell your positions to cover their attack, and break all your lines," suggested Angelina. But general Anotone shook his head with a smile.
"They cannot do that," he replied.
"Why not?"
"I dare not tell you why now, but if the glandelinians come and make an attack to-morrow morning, or later, you little girls will yourselves see the reason."
"I do not think the glandelinians will attempt to attack your position," said Jennie.
"I believe they will first attempt to destroy your positions. If they succeed in that, the conquest of your general's army would not be difficult. If your positions are too thickly protected by trees, and make it unavailable for enemy artillery," said general Anotone, "and our chief general who long expected to attack us and so could see how or what I was speaking about."
"General Anotone they say could take care of himself too, whatever happens," Catherine said. "I am sure he will. The general not knowing the extent of the glandelinians' strength—which was in fact not so great as Catherine imagined—could not take much of an effort in this promise."
It was evident there would be exciting times on the following morning, if the glandelinians really attacked the Calverinian army for the glandelinian army as the glandelinians realized in passing through it was only a mile away from the position of the Calverinians.
When night fell all of the interior of the vast Calverinian encampments, company streets and barracks, and the like was in utter darkness, but far in the distance toward the direction of the enemy's lines the woods seemed lighted as if with brilliant incandescent lamps, which seemed to render them as bright as day, and the lights flashed back and forth. Violet and her sisters who watched the lights thought that the scenery was indeed beautiful. There was a great silence within the Calverinian encampments, until a certain band far away some where was playing a march which could be plainly heard in general Anotone's headquarters, where Violet and her sisters and Penrod remained with the rest of the host. They were strongly guarded by sentries for protection, and treated with much consideration. The general himself saw to it that they received a nice and hearty supper, and when they all wished to go to sleep for the night, showed them the most comfortable beds and wished them a good night and to most pleasant dreams.
"Just do you think of all this, Violet?" Penrod himself anxiously inquired, when they were alone and before he retired to his own chamber.
"I am glad for one that we came," was the reply, "or although there may be mischief done to-morrow, and perhaps a terrible carnage, it seems easier to me that I and my sisters show these brave Calverinians that we are always their friends, and the task of the Angelinian governments that we are to liberate all the child slaves and have them returned to their respective parents if they have any, and the Angelinians can accomplish this in time."
"Just now though our whole nation is in a bad fix," asserted Penrod.
"Yes and if Federal conquers the Calverinian army, he won't be nice about it, and if he did capture us he would be terrible."
"Do not worry dear," said Jennie. "I do not think we ourselves are in any danger, or the Calverinians either, whatever happens, and the result of our adventure is sure to be good."

general Raymond Richardson which is going against glandetion."
"I don't blame him much for thinking and doing like that," remarked Angelina. "And the glandelinians were wicked for attempting to poison a whole Christian army in the effort to destroy us in so unfair a manner."
"Do you know the reason why?" asked the general.
"I don't suppose there was any reason," except just for a wicked intention," replied Angelina.
"Well, the reason please," said Jennie.
"Well, children—once—along time ago it was claimed that general Germania, a German, and a German, who though father and son, fight on opposite sides, had a great battle at Krahulo Creek. At that battle as you may well know many generals on both sides fell dead or wounded and one beautiful little girl was killed in attempting to save a general whom she knew from being shot down by a machine gun at Jennie's Bridge. Over the disaster Angelina Agathia had been in great danger and three Christian armies under general Adept and Johnston Hanson were sent to oppose the German army. General Germania, a German, at that time heard that you little girls had before famous spies, and spied on Manley often. He pretended to pay no attention to it, but it seemed all the time that he was furious over it, and secretly tried to discover some means to destroy you. In this he was almost more clever than any one would have suspected. He was invited by the three Manleys one day to make a junction with them, in an advance against Angelina Agathia which resulted in the battle of the girlhood, but being unsuccessful in this he planned to get revenge. He had heard that you girls always went into Manley's lines and took every thing the general had plans, maps and the like. Manley and his cronies has been warned that they would some day be punished for persecuting you little girls like he and they do, and he has been warned that even if one of the girl's had ever been destroyed, it would not help his cause at all, and now his armies many of them have become shriveled and helpless; many of his generals have resigned and it seems as if he is going into disaster. Manley is frightened by his frequent defeats and he is fighting and planning more harder than ever now. I myself one day witnessed the shocking battle of Gloriana though I was not in it, so did many of my Calverinian officers. The news of the terrible glandetion disaster was carried to Angelina Agathia, and all the armies there prepared for action in case the victorious rebel armies would hurl themselves upon her. General Gale whose Calverinian army assaulted Oona and Betty Bobbin in the month of November 1914 was annihilated in encountering the batteries protecting her. Gale, and three divisions of general Gordon's was destroyed and his whole army shattered in the battle of Gordon Junction. Manley now has it in purpose that if he can defeat both glandetion and Hanson simultaneously he will have a chance for an open way to again advance on Angelina Agathia, and these general Germanias seized still within sight of Angelina Agathia, and these general Germanias seized by surprising them on flank and rear but nevertheless Angelina Agathia has been in danger ever since."
This story filled Violet and her sisters with a feeling of sorrow, and Penrod felt indignation.
"I now understand," said Jennie, "by the rebels tried to poison the Christian army."
"Yes," said the general, "and now you know the story it is easy to understand. The glandelinian glandelinians came to general Hanson's army hoping to poison every one and thus by doing that cause the deaths of you little girls, believing it would cause such a panic among the Christian countries that it would be easy for glandelinians to conquer her and win her own independence. When they could easily conquer all the Christian world. So they had another reason for wanting to destroy you little girls—they feared that in some way you little girls might gain a reputation as being the greatest spies in the world, and that you little girls would some day get into Manley's lines and discover something that would cause the glandelinians know it bring ruin to the rebel cause. That is why general Germania, a German, tried to poison the Christian army by making some secret poison of his own at the time that Gertrude Angelina was spying on him, and having discovered the plot wounded him and frustrated him by destroying the poison. Of course this is attempt of the general frightened her, for the last sound he heard was the booming roar of the battle, the whistling of bullets, while clouds of smoke blown back from the battle gave a sight that could not be had in any other position. The enemy was in a position to see us. I know also your intentions to reach the Glandelinian army and I know other things besides.

manner betrayed him as a man who could be dreaded when angry, neither was he proud or haughty and he looked as if he had a high regard for everyone whom he knew so be his friends, and had also a look which showed to the little girls that "God help his enemies."

Violet and her sisters at once decided that he was ferocious, and if he was a Glandelinian they must look out for him. The general's hair was black, and his eyes were black too. He eyes as he calmly examined Violet and her sisters had a recognizing but friendly look in them and he said quietly: "I happen to know who you are, for I have had my scouts out all the time, and who came in and told me that at seven girls who called themselves the Vivian Girl Princesses of Angelina and I had by the nose of Penrod were coming here to see us. I know also your intentions to reach the Glandelinian army and I know other things besides."

"Why this is strange to me," cried Violet. "It is a part of our plan of course since you discovered it, whether you knew it or not."

"Oh indeed!" answered the general seriously. "I suppose you will claim next that these Vivian girls who are the land of Angelina or whose parents do, claim that general Jenson has not been informed already."

"Of course," returned Violet. "There is no doubt of it."

The general turned to the other girls.

"Do you make such a claim?" he asked.

By this time Violet and her sisters had made up their mind as to the character of this general whose pride no doubt had evidently led himself to believe he was superior in knowledge to all others.

"I did not come here to quarrel with your Excellency," said Violet, quietly. "What I and my sisters are well established, and as much as the authority we possess comes from our governments and our father who is ruler of Angelina. There are many countries of Abbeonnia and many different peoples in this broad nation who are at war with you Glandelinians each of which has its separate rulers and goven governors and the like. But all these render obedience to the law which our father sets down and someone knows acknowledge us as their rulers too."

"If that is the case it does not interest me in the least," replied the general. "Being in command of this army I alone am supreme. You must be impudent and mistaken to think that I do not know about you already."

"Let us not speak of this now, please," answered Jennie.

"Why is it that you wished to warn the Christian army of its danger?" demanded the general.

"Because his army is in danger, for a powerful foe army is preparing to attack it."

"Pah. The Manleys. He or I do not fear them."

"Your supreme general is shrewd."

"I'm more shrewd than he is. I'm a Calverinian and this is my army of Calverinians. I knew of this before you started out to warn the general. Let the Glandelinians go ahead and do as they please in Jenson's rear and if the Glandelinian army comes very few of them will ever return to their own homes. I will see to that."

Violet and her sisters were surprised at this attitude, for they realized that it meant that instead of a Glandelinian camp they had went unexpectedly into a camp of Calverinians who were as eager to fight the Glandelinians as the rebels were to fight the Angelinians, and the object of the Vivian girls had been to get to Jenson to prevent the enemy getting around to his rear, and warn the general in time. They were greatly surprised, because the strangeness of the situation led the Vivian girls to imagine there was no Christian army near to protect Jenson at all. Indeed, Violet and her sisters reflected that this was better luck than was expected, and that in any event it would be wise to give the general the deserved credit for his outwitting the rebels as he did.

"I did not expect an interrupting fact like this, your Excellency," said Violet. "Near Angelina Agatha and Dorothy Gale and her outposts there are thousands of Christian encampments. So when I learned there might be a surprise attack on Jenson's rear, I and my sisters came with the purpose to warn him."

"Well," said Penrod himself, gazing wistfully at the Glandelinian encampment before them. "We have actually entered the enemy's main line of encampments. I guess the Christian army is many miles further beyond and there is no means to get to them."

Violet and her sisters considered the situation very gravely, then decided to try to reach the enemy if possible, one of the Vivian girls picked up a branch of a tree lying on the ground, and after Penrod stripped it enough to make it look like a stick she tied her handkerchief to it, and standing at the edge of the woods in full view of the camp waved the handkerchief like a flag of truce as a signal for a time they could observe no response whatever and they were wholly surprised.

"I don't see what good that will do us," said Violet herself. "Even if the Glandelinians are still in possession of the encampments and see us, and think we are their friends, they would not trust any one to come and get us."

But the Glandelinians were not so unwary as that, as the girls and Penrod soon discovered. For on a sudden a sudden fire down along one of the company streets, a small column of cavalry appeared and came swiftly toward them. The girls and Penrod these Glandelinians looked like gnomes, for they wore the uniforms of the A. O. M. Cavalry. The cavalry force came toward them in the form of a small arch in each section of the line of horsemen stretching out until they soon became a long line, and then reaching the little girls and Penrod halted. When the little girls saw that the Glandelinians indeed were really O. M. Cavalry. The colonel of the troops however was not very large but the leader at once called:

"Come on!" and wheeled his horse while his men did the same, and then started back to the encampments. Violet and her sisters and Penrod summoned their courage and followed after. Before the little girls and Penrod had taken three or four steps however the cavalry halted, and so forced the little girls to halt also, then to their surprise seven of the Glandelinians got down from their horses and motioned to the little girls to mount.

"We need not walk after a line," said Violet. So they mounted the horses as directed, and then the cavalry went toward the other soldiers walking on foot. Indeed they went well into the encampment which covered such an extent of ground, and soon they found themselves halted in the middle of a long company street where two handsomely uniformed men came up on horseback to greet them or receive them. The little girls at once halted the horses and the two young officers bowed their heads profoundly to Violet and her sisters and one of them said:

"Our general bids you welcome, O strangers. His Excellency is waiting to receive you and your boy friend in his headquarters."

"Lead on," replied Violet with dignity.

So on they rode again and a few minutes later they found themselves within the main interior of the encampment. Some parts of the camp were divided into villages of real houses, streets and so on. The various houses were of colored designs, with a many stained glass windows, and the company streets seemed well cared for. A little beyond was a small park filled with brilliant flowers with a fine elaborate fountain, and facing this park stood a building much larger and more imposing than the others. Toward this big building the young officers escorted Violet and her sisters. On the company streets, or from tent openings, or from doorways and open windows of houses and barracks, and the like were all masses of soldiers dressed in dandy brownish gray uniforms but of all rich material. These men to Violet and her sisters seemed unusually unlike the Glandelinians are dressed, for they seemed merry and contented and did not wear the expressions of fury, eagerness, and solemnity or nervous irritation that Glandelinian soldiers assume.

They had more beautiful tents, splendid homes for an army indeed, splendid uniforms, and ample food, and Violet and her sisters also decided something was strange for no Glandelinians would have received them in this manner. They said nothing however but looked curiously at the soldiers. At the entrance of the main general headquarters Violet and her sisters were met by six officers in uniform and armed like Angelinians are. Their two commanders bowed and left them, and two of the other officers were in uniform led the girls into the building. In a beautiful room surrounded by a dozen or young officers and even generals, sat a general which made the little girls and Penrod so certainly stare. He was a man who looked a little younger than Jack Evans himself, and although he was elaborately dressed in a handsome brownish gray uniform he seemed to be too thin and plain to be even exactly handsome. And also as the little girls could see his air and the last sound he heard was the booming roar of the battle, the whistling of bullets, and the blowing of smoke blown back from the muzzles of guns. He had a right that could not be had by any other man. He was a soldier, and he was a man. One day he was a soldier, and one day he was a man.

However the fugitives kept on without relaxing their speed until they had reached a point of the woods where there was no more Glandelinian camp. When seeing the Glandelinians trailing them they ran to the right and turned a bend in the road just as the colonel and the remainder of his followers about a number of men forcing them rushed into view and looked around in an attempt to discover the fugitives who had hidden themselves behind trees just in time. Violet and her sisters knew that now they were safe as long as they kept themselves hidden so she Violet had told Penrod to stop and so all of them stood behind the trees until they could breathe more freely, and become rested from their mad flight. As for the Glandelinian colonel and his men he felt sure he was foiled and so separated his men with the purpose of securing the woods for the fugitives. He also was very angry—angry with Violet and his sisters and angry with himself—because now that he took time to think he remembered that he knew very well the art of the Glandelinian girls in handling guns, and if he only had thought of it before, he could have had the girls scoured and their weapons and ammunition cartridge belts taken away from them, and in this case they would not have been able to shoot down six of his men and he could have recaptured them easily. However it was now entirely too late for regrets and he determined to make preparations to have the woods secured and combed for them.

"What shall we do next?" asked Penrod when they were rested. "We will have to remain here until night fall or we'll never escape. Then we must resume our way toward the Christian lines we seek." Replied Violet. "From what that dreadful general Dicknell said—imagine the Christian army under Glandelinian is much nearer than we supposed, and if we get to the Christian army in time we can warn him and thus help him defeat the Glandelinians." "I suppose we can't stop the well planned attack of Manley now." Replied Penrod reflectively, as they moved from tree to tree.

"We have been delayed too long. I'm afraid, and as Manley is determined on his purpose all we can do is to find the nearest signal station in possession of Christian authorities and through its means warn general Hancock Vivian and Glandelinian of their danger, and help them as much as possible." "Of course you will punish general Dicknell if you have the chance." Said Penrod.

"Well I do not believe general Dicknell is as much to blame as the Manleys are themselves." Was the answer. "But if Manley and his other wicked generals are removed from power the Glandelinian rebellion will probably be overthrown in the shortest time possible, and the majority of the Glandelinian people will probably be more good and respect the laws of Angelina, and hereafter live at peace with all their neighbors in the future."

"I hope so indeed." Said Jennie Vivian with a sigh of doubt. The edge of the woods now did not seem to be far away from the big volcano or whatever it appeared to be, and after three hours efforts at going from tree to tree, and dog dodging Glandelinians here and there, they reached the edge of the woods. Here seemed to have been planted by nature so as to keep a people from passing them, but at one point it appeared that the Glandelinians themselves had cut a passage through the barrier, and Violet and her sisters found the path and led Penrod to the other side. Beyond the trees they discovered a most surprising scene. Bordering a green lawn was an immense Glandelinian encampment, extending on an immense plain as far as eye could observe and fully a mile wide, the tents of which had an exquisite blue. In the center of this big tent appeared a most lovely tent in the form of those used by the big spectators come to see the show, but of various colored stripes and with the national flag of Glandelinia above it, and a little beyond the tent stood a huge rounded building, with strong gray concrete walls, and high domes, which glittered brilliantly in the afternoon sunshine. Between the great building and the tents adjoining it was no grass or anything growing, but only an expanse of highly polished line of cannons and ammunition tents. At this moment it seemed that there were no guards on either section of the camp and no signs of life even could be seen anywhere in the whole vast encampment. However protecting the front of the camp was a long line of high breastworks, guarded by a towering line of cannon, and outside was a long line of abatis, also fronted by artillery of smaller guns.

by the Calverinians who would have hewn him no more y, the Glandelinians fought with a frenzied fury of men possessed and finally drove the Calverinians from their works and rescued their wounded general. As quickly as possible the Calverinians led by general Osania rushed forward to a counter charge and closed and grappled anew with the Glandelinians. The wily Glandelinians being overwhelmed at this point realized their danger of annihilation or capture and before the Calverinians could pour over the works, poured in a terrific fire that mowed down their ranks by the thousands and then recoiled taking their wounded general with them. At this one however general Osolia himself as the Glandelinians were so slowly recoiling tottered and fell headlong to the ground mortally wounded, while the Glandelinians under him were too bolstered by his order to stand their ground against the Calverinians after his fall, and all recoiled in panic.

"Poor ay." cried Penrod dancing up a up and down with glee. "The Glandelinians are repulsed at last. The Glandelinians thought they could carry the Calverinian positions and now they have found out they couldn't. Retreat back to your own works if you like, for your two general can do no more and with out them and your other leaders you are as powerless as the children you want to slaughter."

A moment later however there appeared at another point a new Glandelinian column advancing slowly to rescue those who were retreating, and the nearest of the remnants were of the fierce Whistlers and their first flag bearer carried indeed a beautiful flag. It was a flag of a beautiful yellow color with red and blue on its upper upper and lower edges. In the center was a picture or design of some beautiful swan of swan of large size, and very gracefully formed, and in the picture it there was scattered all over the swan feathers large diamonds and emeralds, so thickly placed that the swan looked like unbrilliant diamond. The head of the swan, had a red bill, and its eyes were unusually large. Whatever the design of the swan meant no one knew, but it was the wish of one of the Christian generals to capture that flag at all costs and so he ordered his division to counter charge. The counter charge was made upon the Whistlers and resulted in the almost destruction of the division within two hours fierce fighting and the severely wounding of the general.

"Those villains and scoundrels. They shall be punished for this in time." mourned the wounded general. Oh what a fool I was to lead my division against such overwhelming numbers. Why was I not warned?"

"A fool you were and a fool you are." said one of his superior generals. "You had no business to order a counter charge when you were not given advice to do so."

The poor wounded general stopped a short, and from where he was placed looked at the distant battle line where he had lost three quarters of his division.

"That's to be, to be." he exclaimed in a very sorrowful, sorrowful tone. "I have lost over three hundred thousand of my best men in that fatal charge, and neither can I ever lead lead another army because I will lose a leg."

"Never mind sir." said the doctor who now prepared to attend to him. "I'm glad to see the Glandelinians foiled in their attempts already. Their punishment is just beginning, for although the rebels are at all attacking other portions of our lines and have captured some of the works, we still have our main army still unengaged, and if Federal assaults in general his army will be destroyed in time, mark my words."

In the meantime Violet and her sisters and Penrod who had been at another scene of the struggle and hidden battle near from their rear a small group of Glandelinians approaching cautiously. Penrod himself stared at the Glandelinians in a moment just as the rebel leader shouted:

"About those girls. Shoot the fancy Glandelinian girls." "The Glandelinians fired a volley, but the little girls had dived behind one tree just in the nick of time and the bullets flew past them without doing any harm. When the Glandelinians were now retreating properly prepared to fire another volley, the little girls were far from them and had swiftly run across to the main section of the Christian camp where no rebels could reach them.

By this time the rebel artillery fire and the thunderstorm of explosives had slackened up considerably.
 "See," cried general Antonio, pointing to the plains. "The glandelinians are rushing to the assault."
 On toward the main Calverinian works immense lines of glandelinians were moving forward in line of battle.
 "Now let us see what we can do to oppose them when they come on to the attack," continued the general in a voice that betrayed his excitement. "I will have to go and take charge of my command but I'll send some officers to take charge and help you girls."

The immense columns of glandelinians were pushing their way over the plains in an endless line of troops had reached as it seemed the left wing or section of the Calverinian position just as the christian batteries in that location let go with a loud thundering roar and poured a stream of destruction upon the whole plain. The glandelinians however came on in ever increasing numbers like water flowing from a tower shore to shore, and the main line of the attack came toward the positions within sight of the little girls, and then the battle roared here also, and still the rebels could be seen but dimly through the sea of smoke wreaths.
 For over an hour Violet and her sisters and Penrod from their safe distance watched the scene of action. Twice the enemy came forward in terrible array, and crashed upon the positions, and twice they were beaten back with their lines shattered.

"Look out girls," suddenly exclaimed one of the Calverinian officers of the works. "If the glandelinians want to attack the Calverinians, why then there are enough Calverinians to check any onslaught of the enemy."

"Maybe the Calverinians will counter charge now while they have time and drive the rebels back to their own works again," said Joe.
 "Not yet," declared Angeline. "The glandelinians under general Federal are very very obstinate, more obstinate than any Angelinian general ever is, and has defied the world to lick them. I fear the Calverinians will not win this conflict when it gets general."

"Look out girls," suddenly exclaimed one of the Calverinian officers suddenly riding up. "Something's going to happen. A force of rebels is moving around to our rear. Keep under shelter or you will get killed."
 They rushed to a ledge of rocks and saw in another direction a big column of glandelinians extending for several miles moving forward with one accord of yells. Hells instantly tore gaps in the column from some unseen christian battery and the rebels began to halt and then away back, but the main part of the attacking column of flankers poured across the meadow without the slightest check, directly toward the rear of the Calverinian position. If this attack was successful the encampment would be overrun by the rebels.

"What are those glandelinians going to do who are coming there?" asked Violet suddenly pointing in another direction.
 "Why they are moving from the right," as the reply from Jennie. "I believe the glandelinian army is inclosing the Calverinian positions and is going to inflame it. There are several more columns coming on the rear also. I believe general Federal intends to surround the Calverinian army. If he does succeed we all will be in great peril."

In the meantime for a while the main Calverinian generals knew nothing of the fierce attack in front of them, but then a warning signal made them realize a glandelinian force was converging upon them, and so a portion of the Calverinian army fell back, and then opposed a part of the glandelinian column moving from the right and the battle was on once more. At the head of this column of attacking glandelinians was general Guosh, and at his word they rushed forward and stormed the whole christian right. The first of the shock drove back a portion of the Calverinian army but the glandelinian general was wounded by a musket shot and fell within a few feet of the works. As he was in danger of being captured expert men who operate signal stations of their own such as is always helpful to the glandelinian army, and should we girls be discovered at our work we would receive a eye lone of grape and shell that would sent us to heaven in a hurry."

 "Perchance we can accomplish it in some way without being observed by their men," suggested Angeline.

"Yes but with the knowledge the rebel signal men gained through their own studies it is doubtful if we can do it any way for the rebels have means quite unknown to us," added A Jennie. "It is unfortunate for us that the general keep his own secrets of this signal station a closely guarded, for no one but himself could use any of those strange things gathered in this room and he is reported to be mortally wounded."

"Couldn't we go to him and try to get some information or get him to tell his secrets to save his army from capture or destruction?" asked Penrod.
 "No even were we to go and try to find out he is unconscious and also no one would be permitted to see him in his condition, but untill we ourselves find some way to signal to christian we could not even save the general, and were we to get the information from him we would not be able to use it for the fact that the enemy would discover our motions and let us have all their guns they could bring to bear upon the high tower of this station. go you see the Calverinian army is fairly stampeded."

"That's a fact indeed," admitted Penrod. "But say, Violet—here is a good idea. Could we not capture a number of glandelinians bring them tied hand and foot to the signal tower and place them within sight, and then couldn't you with them protecting you signal to christian, and then could he not advance to our rescue?"

"You are not very practical Penrod dear—it would be as hard for us now to capture any glandelinians as it would for us to capture their main general from among all the other glandelinians in his whole army, and even to do as you suggested would be of no benefit for in order to prevent our signalling they would open fire even if we had one of their officers exposed on the signal tower. Those glandelinians are desperate enough to commit suicide to prevent anything going wrong."
 "But if we could capture Federal by surprise and expose him up on the signal tower it would be more help to us," persisted the little boy.

"That is true indeed," answered Violet smiling at the eagerness of her boy friend. "You find a way to catch general Federal and I'll promise when he is caught to force him to go up to the top and expose himself while we signal."

"I know you think I can't do it," replied Penrod riding off. "But I'm going to try." go he left the little girls to remain at the station and went to a certain portion of the beleaguered christian army where he could look through a clear space of the woods to view the glandelinian army. Immediately he became interested in the many queer sights he saw. The glandelinians it seemed were bringing up artillery of many kinds and sizes and placing them into position. The air now was so transparent transparent since the smoke of battle cleared away that the brave boy could see for a long distance and the artillery was being placed so close that he actually could have hit a gun with a large stone. Glandelinian battle flags were of brilliant colors and the whole rebel encampment in the distance resembled to Penrod a beautiful garden. It was among the distant encampments that Penrod hoped a chance to discover general Federal. He had an idea he may ride up close to the artillery to make an inspection, but such a multitude of glandelinians went constantly passed back and forth, the so one shifting every moment that he was not sure he would notice the general if he did appear in view. His eyes could not be able to look in all directions at once and the rebel general he sought, might be somewhere else in the camp or far away to the rear of the christian position itself.

"Perhaps he is so afraid to show himself for fear of being shot by a Calverinian sniper," he reflected. He watched the glandelinians for a long time, until several discovered him and began firing, and then he rode back to where Violet and her sisters were, but nevertheless was not discouraged.

the last sound he heard was the booming roar of the battle, the whistling of bullets, and the clouds of smoke blown back from the front of the Calverinian army. He gave a sigh that could not be heard by the enemy.

"All right," returned Violet, "but your time is dear; there is no hurry. Maybe general Ant once will signal to Ackmell or to Wensation by wireless and the latter will come to his aid and engage Federal good and hard. Now about getting something to eat girls!"

As they went back to their own tent which also was general Antoinette's, where Violet ordered one of the orderlies to prepare breakfast. All the boy and girl scouts were frightened and anxious over the sudden disaster that was occurring to the Calverinian army. General Federal was feared and hated, and they had depended on their own general to conquer the dreadful and they also hoped he was the only one who could break through the ring of Glandelinian armies. Before Violet and her sisters had finished their breakfast several of the leading boy and girl scouts of the general command came to Violet and her sisters to ask their advice, and to question them also, of whom they knew nothing except that they claimed to be the Princess's of Angelina, and were in charge of all the boy and girl scouts of Angelina, including themselves.

"If what you told our main general was or is the truth," they said to Violet pitiously, "you are our lawful leaders and our mistresses and we may depend on you girls to get us and the Calverinian army out of our difficulties."

"I and my sisters will try to do that," Violet graciously assured them, "but you must remember that we have not the powers of the Glandelinian generals themselves or of the Christian generals like our father and Uncle. On the contrary though we are Princess's our parents have the superior power over us only, and we can do nothing unless we can escape the rebels who have surrounded us and the Calverinians. However it can be accomplished if your generals have any signal stations within their lines and perhaps by these means we can telegraph to some one and have help sent to us."

"However it is sometimes necessary to consider the distance of Christian armies, where they are situated before we can signal as all signals are found out by the enemy too and we have to be careful other wise nothing would be able to save the army or even us. So you promise to say nothing to any one about it if we attempt to get you through this peril successfully."

They promised willingly.

"Then," continued Violet, "I will go to the nearest signal station office you direct me and my sisters too and we will take immediate possession of it. Perhaps what we find there may be of some use. In the meantime tell your boy and girl scout companies to fear nothing, but have patience. Let them return to their own camps and perform their tasks as usual. The fact that we are surrounded by Federal army may not prove to be a misfortune but a blessing. We know that general Wensation's Christian army is only a mile away and his is surely twice larger than Federal's and your Calverinian army combined and if we can notify him we will bring him to our help."

This speech cheered the boy and girl scouts amazingly. Really they had no one to depend upon now but Violet and her sisters for a report came in the main Calverinian general who had boasted of how his army could link Federal had been mortally wounded early in the fray and lay dying in his own headquarters so inspite of the dangerous position of the Calverinian army their hearts were lightened by the fact that they had for the first time the brave Vivian girls in their presence. The boy and girl scouts got out their own brass bands and a grand procession of girls and boys in full uniform escorted Violet and her sisters to the signal telegraph station where all of the other boy and girl scouts being there were eager to wait upon the Vivian girls. Violet invited the leaders of the boy and girl scouts to stay at the signal station also, for they knew all about the signal station and its instruments, so their advice and information were sure to prove valuable. However at first Violet and her sisters were somewhat disappointed in what they found in the signal station. One room of the station was of entirely devoted to only geographical, and other books, and also here were a countless instruments, and jars of ointment and bottles of potions labeled with many queer names and strange as small machines that any of the little girls though they could guess the use of feared to use for fear of thereby being able to detect them.

"I do not see," said Penrod to Violet who accompanied the little girls in their search.

"How we could signal to the enemy with out being discovered. Moreover from all reports the Glandelinians under Federal have thousands of "Good," exclaimed Violet, "I hate that old general Federal, and I'm glad his first Glandelinian divisions had been punished."

"This is a dreadful misfortune," cried one of the nearest girl scouts pressing her hands upon her heart.

"Yes," agreed Violet, nodding her head thoughtfully, "the repulse of the Glandelinian attack will prove a terrible blow to the Calverinians."

"What do you mean by that?" asked Penrod. "Seems to me the Calverinians are in good luck to have succeeded in repulsing the assault."

"If that were all you would be right," responded the girl scout, "but if the Calverinian army was not surrounded by Federal's it would not be so serious. But here we all are, surrounded by a vast Glandelinian army under the worst Glandelinian general of all, and fast prisoners in these woods."

"Annot the big Calverinian army fight its way through the circle of rebels?" inquired Violet.

"No, the Glandelinian army is too large to do that," as the answer.

"The Calverinian army could try," insisted Violet. "If we were able to repulse such a violent assault the enemy made, the Calverinians can break the besieging lines of Federal army. His main army is here I suppose!"

"Yes,"

"No Federal army is overwhelming us in numbers and artillery, and our main general if he knew what to do does not dare to be rash," said a boy scout.

The faces of Violet and her sisters grew grave, and they were thinking.

"The Calverinian army has lots of artillery and ammunition and it is large," said Alice.

"But not as big as Federal's," K. Jones replied.

"Can't we learn how by scouting on the rebels?"

"I'm afraid not my dear sister," Federal if more difficult to overcome them with witchcraft."

"Well," said Violet turning to Penrod, "you say that the Calverinians have large parts of small gathering guns. The generals could get the Calverinian gunners to mass these at close range, and tear the rebel lines to pieces and then by a big charge break through and drive back the besiegers. And then they could turn on the flank of Federal's main line and rescue the rest of the Calverinian army."

"It is impossible to work artillery in these thick woods," declared the boy scout.

"We not there any means to use machine guns?"

"No and if there were the enemy would bring up their own and we would only get it worse."

"The Glandelinians under Federal could not be frustrated by any efforts unless a new army comes to our relief," said Jones. "If the Calverinian army remained long like this it would face starvation and we would be very uncomfortable and unhappy. But we girls do not wish to share such a fate, or see so many men go through it at either."

"No I would rather die quickly," asserted Violet, "but there are strong masses of Calverini Calvary that are fully armed, and they could break the siege line, you know."

"Those Calverinian cavalry men would be opposed by Federal's Dragoons and they can vanquish a cavalry force easily," said Jennie Vivian.

"Dear me," cried Violet, "that dreadful general Federal up retails my plans to escape. I guess I'll give it all up, Penrod, and let you save us."

Penrod smiled but his smile was not so cheerful as usual. Indeed the Princess's of Angelina found themselves confronted with a serious problem, and although they had no thought of despairing, they realized that the whole Calverinian army in the Nicopolster Woods as well as themselves and Penrod, were in grave and serious trouble, and that unless they could find some means to save the army and themselves, they would be lost to Angelina for all future time.

"In such a dilemma," said Jones, "nothing is gained by haste. Careful thought may aid us, and so may the course of events. The unexpected is always likely to happen, and cheerful patience is better than reckless action, and we must recollect that Wensation's army is only a mile from us."

the last sound he heard was the booming roar of the battle, the swelling of bullets under his feet as he lay back from the front line. He had a right that could not be put into words. He was a man who had seen the enemy and he was a man who had seen the enemy.

In the mountain general Guadalupe's mainline army was in bad straits, having a full 12 miles to contest his retreat. He and thought what to do next to get out of the trap. He broke back into the mountains and a short distance away was a full division of calverinos, yet the Calverinos themselves under fire from Federal machine guns of the main Guadalupean assault so far had been completely repulsed, but the first shot of the battle felt a good many regiments of Calverinos for a momentary helplessness. Their own advanced batteries were put out of commission by a momentary helplessness, fire, and they did not know what to do in case the battle would become general again as their main batteries could not be used in account of the losses. As a matter of fact they had a brigade of Guadalupeans surrounded, admitting it out from behind, but there was a probability of the attack being resumed and a decided violence and a great force of Guadalupeans may come to the rescue of General Guadalupe. Guadalupeans: One of the officers said to the main Calverino general in command of the attacking division:

"Chetaki takes a run down rush and takes the glandelinians all by themselves general launches a main assault."
put the main general laughed and answered:
"Not so, the glandelinians are surrounded would fight like and not to retreat to be no yes we will have to stay where they are we are, for if we are in danger then the to be to an signal for help." He turned to him other officers and added:
"We have helped them so far, and made their attacking, defense an help a suitable. The Skener and the glandelinians also are retreating, and are away on their own work. I have ordered the glandelinians to be retreating, and are away of the battle, we may as well commence the help glandelinians and force them to surrender or to annihilated."

to this was being prepared for and should have been dropped into the retails. Then the glandelinians had retreated a short distance a back to their own lines except the glandelinian grinds which had been and were surrounded by the Angolians themselves. The Angolians who had remained in their own positions moved back to the stronger works behind and toilet and her sisters wishing to get to general persons army and away from this is some asked one of the officers superior.

11 "I can't find our way in general Hansen's lines."
12 "I don't know," replied the general in a careless tone being more absorbed in 13 the position of his own divisions than anything else."
14 "Or ought to know being a Calvinian," said Angeline.
15 "I should of course if you mention it," the officer answered, "but now since we got 16 here between Federal and denative we have forgotten the location of his army, you
17 are lovely girls anyway if it and it is better you should remain here before this 18 peril is greater, can't you think so?"
19 And the officer gracefully rode away without seeming to care whether they answered 20 or not as he felt too busy than to do anything else, whilst and her sisters were 21 in deep despair, they felt surely that all the Calvinian officers were too 22 busy to give them any direct informations.
23 "Angeline,"

"I really," said Violet, "in a gloomy voice," by the landmines have surrounded the zone of the main-entrance, despite the bomb of their main general." Her sisters and parents who had left their tent and gone as close to the firing line as they dared in order to see what was going on there, the boy and girl scouts who were within the region and had also crowded near the point of the bayonet guard's attack would happen next, although their vision to some extent was blurred by the thick smoke of battle they had nevertheless observed the main points of the drama. As they had observed the landmine column moving forward to the attack, from many points at once, they saw the resistance the Galicians gave to the assault; there, and a cry of amazement had went up from the child scouts who also watched the scene.

"Anything new, Violet?" He asked.

Not yet. And I'm under fire out there. Is nothing better for me to do than, as the old saying is, "stand still and let the bullets fly?" I guess I'll take another chance, and go back and watch the General W. Hamilton, one of General Robert Lytle's best generals in his service and, in his headquarters in the "padding" state, had many things listed to occupy him. Abraham Lincoln's assistant had been looking after his vast encampments and his big army to him to improve his help. He was a close student of the arts of war, and spent much time in his headquarters when not out on scouting tours and the like, and he made plans, studied the maps of geographies and striven to find a way to get around Lytle's army. He was of perfect his own skill to prevent any of the most important scouting tours, and he took at his great maps such day as he sent out his forces of scouting, invariably to see if any rebel army was near, or if any route of violet and her elements to other Union Lytle's army, or of the country. He was his spies and scouts, and operators of signal stations had told him that Federal army had arrived near the Missouri-Lytle's woods for the purpose of getting General Lytle's army but that a Confederate army had been sent for the purpose of that General Lytle's army had been notified also and had escaped him in time, danger threatened to him by Hanley and that Hancock army had gone on toward with the purpose to besiege and capture the town of Greaser Lytle's army and that a Confederate army unknown to them had been attacked by a Confederate army and had been almost entirely surrounded by the Lytle's army. He saw the statement that Federal army had made a three hours attack upon the Lytle's army and that Federal army between his Abraham Lincoln army and the Lytle's army and that had been almost suppress general of the Lytle's army had been north of Lytle's army and that the was without a head.

No other details could be obtained as to general Johnston believing that the Galvarinian army could take care of itself and not knowing the size of Federals that it was misapprehended by the rebels, and that none of the generals dared to attack day the day after the battle of Goosech late in the afternoon, there came a courier riding up to his tent notifying him that the Galvarinian army was in dire danger and that the civilian girls were with the Galvarinian army. This was so completely unusual that every officer who heard the report gave a start, and even general Johnston for a moment could not think what the courier meant, then he remembered that what he had learned from scouts the day before that danger was really threatened the Galvarinian army and the beloved civilian girls, and so mounting his horse he rode to his headquarters building to call his main number of generals and also to have some of his spies called and seek information as to what sort of danger the Galvarinian army was in and the civilian girls.

"The given girls who are the son seven Princess's of Angelina, we are in the army of California now under general Antonio arm, with the whole Californian army fast prisoners in the great Mis-Hollister Woods near Pasadena Inn, for the whole Californian army is surrounded by the Wh. Insia army 40,000,000 strong under general Raymond and his hard son Federal. There has been a four hours engagement raged at Quocetoh mentioned the rebels have been repulsed but the siege is begun nevertheless."

"Hunt general Antonio any power to fight and break through the Mandeliniian army besieging him?" Asked general Winstie

"That was the reply and we could not discover anything more, except that the son Christian general of the Californians who alone fully commanded the whole Californian army had been mortally wounded early in the last night."

When general Winstie consulted his advisers but could not learn anything. As he did not want to do anything rash, he made a scouting tour and after diligent work discovered that Federal army was extremely powerful but half his own size.
General Winstie reflected earnestly on this information he had gained, and decided not only to go to the assistance of the Californian army, but also to try and enclose Federal and capture him and his whole Mandeliniian army.

While he felt sure there was no need of any great haste, because the Californian army could withstand a siege a long time, it was evident that the Californian army however could not get out of the trap until some one was able to frustrate Federal or even capture him. General Winstie looked through all the reports and books, that he could use to quickly detect the Federal's position, but could find nothing that would give him any good information. When the general drew a little map, and placed Federal army around another in the map, and then made his own starting to enclose Federal, and then experimented several ways to find his own around but found it impossible to besiege Federal on account of the nature of the Mis-Hollister Woods. He made several other kinds of experiments but all were failures. It seemed a simple thing to surround Federal and capture him yet he saw through the map he made he could not do it. Nevertheless the wise general did not despair and though he realized Federal army could not be captured he could nevertheless find a easy way to liberate the Californian army and also save the given girls. Finally he concluded that the best thing to do was to move his own army forward in several columns, and after this to get on go on a scouting tour as near to Federal lines as possible and examine the surrounding rebel positions. While there he would be more likely to discover a solution to the problem that bothered him, and to work out a plan for the rescue of the Californian army, and the girl friends and the capture or defeat of Federal army. General Winstie summoned all his generals and ordered them to make an advance with their divisions, and also telling them what he was going to do rode off to make a final scouting tour. While his armies were making efforts therefore to get around and strike Federal a blow, Winstie rode on only to suddenly encounter another vast encampment only half a mile away and realizing from the colors of the tents and the flags that it was Federal army now discovered that general Winstie also had learned of the peril of the Californian army and was moving against Federal. General Winstie found general Hanson, Ivan and his brother general Robert Ivan looking over their own plans with Gertrude Angelina and the two other girl heroes three girl friends of the given girls who also were most famous girl scouts and spies and who mostly went from one Christian army to another and was when boy and girl scouts looked for guardians and protection and who were such great friends of the given girls that they were much beloved by all the Angelinians as well as the given girls.

"Something happened," cried Hanson, "where, as general Winstie rode up on his horse. General Winstie never comes here except according to wrong directions."

careful might be captured by the wicked rebels and possibly be destroyed, or taken off and hidden where not one of their friends could ever find them, they even be cut into pieces by the rebels and the fragments of their bodies be wholly scattered, or they might be buried deep under ground, or destroyed in many other ways by the evil Mandeliniians or made child slaves were they not properly protected. These facts Gertrude, Angelina or Angelina Aronburg was summarizing while she paced with six sisterly thread he tent floor. Finally Angelina Aronburg paused and drew a small slip of paper from her bosom, handing it to her.

"Use this sheet of paper until you return with the given girls. Give me and be careful of it." "What she said to the boy." "And if serious danger threatens you, secure a dove or pen in some way, put a message on its body and send him to our lines. That will warn me of your danger and I will at once with my whole force of boy and girl scouts come to your rescue. I do not use the message unless you are in danger of destruction. Will you remain with Violet and her sisters
I believe they will be able to protect you from all lesser evils."

"Thank you Gertrude," responded the boy gratefully, and placed the slip of paper into his pocket and placed the slip down so he would not lose it. "I'm going to your my best advantage, so I guess I'll be safe from anything the Mandeliniian scouting parties may do to me."

Violet and her sisters had many arrangements to make before they could leave so they bade good bye to Gertrude and her girl scouts, and with her sisters and returned a climbed upon their horses and so swiftly they did their horses run that the little girls were unable to talk or do anything but hold firmly to the reins all the way back to their own camp.

Residing in the tent of Violet and her sisters at this time was a girl named, a most remarkable and intelligent little girl who had once been a slave in the world with her parents for a brief space of time and was now much loved and respected by all the Angelinians. Once she had been a child slave but had fortunately escaped the child labor trade branding that they usually receive. He himself was a girl who had escaped from the rebels or her masters, was to stuff an old uniform with straw and cotton, and put back on the feet, and used a pair of stuffed cotton gloves for hands.

He head of the personage she made was a stuffed bag full of bran, fastened to the body, with eyes nose and mouth and ears painted on it. "Hattie" a hat had been put on the head it was a good imitation of a scarecrow and with herall her strength she had managed to get herself inside of it and while it lay on the ground a Mandeliniian soldier picked it up, carted it away on his wagon and threw it all into the river near by.

She however, used to be a good swimmer and though the thing remained on the bottom of the river she managed to get out before she was suffocated, and getting up to the surface of the river fortunately swam to the shore where she encountered a vast camp of Christian soldiers. He was then taken care of dressed up by the Angelinians red cross nurses and placed under the care of Violet and her sisters. Violet and her sisters considered little St. Clare one of their best little friends and most loyal girl scouts, so the moment they reached their own tent they asked her to go at once to General Aronburg to remain for protection while they were absent on a journey, and she at once consented to do so without asking any questions. Violet and her sisters had warned into, news of the Mandeliniian generals Munday or Federal until their return, and urged her to obey. He however longed to tell Angelina, John and his friends and feared to tell the other girl friends of the adventure they he and his friends were undertaking, but refrained from saying a word on the subject, although both these girl heroes lived at times with Violet and her sisters in their own tents. Indeed only Gertrude Angelina and a few knew they were going, and even Angelina Aronburg did not know what their errand would be. Violet and her sisters rode their own swift horses, although they were not sure there was any road for horses all the way to Winstie's encampment or, or that of the trunks.

the last sound he heard was the booming roar of the battle, the whistling of bullets, and the smoke blown back from the front. He had a slight idea that he could not be had.

"But can't you realize my dear sisters, that we must do our duty, now that we are aware of all this impending trouble?" asked Violet. "I am fully determined to go at once to Uncle's army or, I mean, to the army whom I can reach first and prevent their armies from being taken by surprise by the enemy. The only question to decide is with whether it is later for me and my sisters to go alone, or to assemble a party of my own scouts and loyal supporters to accompany me, and notify Angelina, Jibee and Jennie Turner."

"If you want to go, I want to go too," declared Penrod. "Whatever happens now it is going to be fun--a small excitement is fun--and I would not miss it now for all the world."

Neither Gertrude Angelina or Violet and her sisters paid any attention to this statement, for they were gravely considering the serious aspect, of this proposed adventure.

"There are plenty of friends and boy and girl scouts and the like, who would like to go with you dear girls," but none of them I'm a sure would afford you any perfect protection in case you were in any great danger. You are yourselves the most powerful of all children in the world," said Gertrude Angelina. "And although Jibee and Jennie Turner and Angelina Jibee have more varied arts of spying work at our command you fairly overdo us on many occasions. And I also you have no other art that no other in all the world could ever equal the air of winning hearts and making all Christian people and sometimes the bitterest enemies love to fairly bow to the gracious presence of you seven sweet angels. For that reason I believe you can accomplish more good alone of your trip than with a large number of soldiers or boy scouts in your train."

"I believe that also," agreed Violet. "I and my sisters shall be quite able to take care of ourselves, you know, but not might not be able to protect others as well. I do not look for opposition from the rebel scouting parties however as we mean to keep beyond them. We shall take the easiest way to the Christian armies--as we know their location by means of our maps--and tell the generals of the dangers to their armies whatever it may be--in a just and truthful manner."

"Are you not going to take me?" pleaded Penrod.

"You will need some boy companion at least, and Jennie Turner and Angelina Jibee too," Violet said.

Violet smiled upon Penrod her best boy friend. "I see no reason why you should not accompany me," as her reply. "Seven girls and one boy do not look very warlike and if we all disguise ourselves properly and be careful any scouting party we may run into accidentally may not suspect us of being on any other errand than to be going home or some thing else. But in order to prevent anything happening to ourselves, or to prevent our being captured or shot down in ambush we must go on the best routes possible. Let us return to our own camp immediately and prepare to start on our journey as soon as we get our disguise made up."

Gertrude Angelina was however not quite satisfied with this plan but however could not think of any better way to meet the problem confronting them. She knew that Violet and her sisters will all their gentleness and sweet disposition was accustomed to abide by any decision she had made, and could never be turned from their purpose. Moreover she could see as yet no great danger to the "vivan" girls in the undertaking, even through the regions they may travel through, may be dominated by Glandelinian scouts. But Penrod or her two friends Jennie Turner and Angelina Jibee were not like the "vivan" girls, they were two little girls and a boy who had come from Abbenania to take part in the experiences and thrilling excitement of the war for pleasure of it only. Jennie Turner and Angelina Jibee and also Penrod may encounter dangers that to Violet and her sisters would be as nothing whatever, but to the three other heroic heroes would be very serious. The fact that Penrod and the two girls were in the Christian armies as spies and scouts, and had been made companions of Violet and her sisters, prevented them from being killed or suffering any great bodily pains from the protection they usually received from the "vivan" girls. But they were mortals nevertheless and never had the ways of angels or fairies, and if they had never been so Gertrude and one of her scouts mounted their own horses and rode off, and Violet and her sisters waited patiently for her and her companion to return again. In about an hour and a half the two girls rode back, looking grave and thoughtful.

"Violet dear," she said to Violet her herself. "I managed to tap telegraph to some signal stations on the outskirts of the Christian lines and they managed to communicate with some of the scouts far to the rear of the Christian lines. The Glandelinians who are under general Raymond are in the rear of the Christian lines. The reason the generals have been warned by signals and scouts--because Manley's movements are suspicious and very secret, and I could learn a very little about it myself."

"Why I did not know that general Federal's army was so near to us," exclaimed Violet. "The map in the geography shows the river running through the state of Angelina, and therefore the positions are not so secure as I supposed."

"That is because the person who made the map never knew of the intentions of the rebels," explained Gertrude Angelina. "The Glandelinian army under Federal is surely nearer than we thought, and in his command are the fierce, Whiskies, Growleyoogs, Zimmarunians and guardians, and the advance guard of the army is under general skker skker Jensen."

"But direction are the Glandelinians coming from," inquired Angelina.

"My scouts who are out are not able yet to tell me that," confessed Gertrude. "For the cleverness of the Glandelinian scouts prevents anyone outside of their domain from knowing about their plans."

"General we know that we must know of the danger if he wishes to fight general Skker Jensen's army successfully and defeat it before Federal's main army comes."

"Perhaps so," Gertrude replied. "But I caught little information about Federal's main army either. The Glandelinian army under skker Jensen is 10,000,000 strong as my scouts informed me are situated near the region of Gale gun. They are strongly entrenched and have many scouting parties out so as to allow no one outside their lines who are not on their side to even get near their lines. I have learned that general Federal's main army numbers about ninety million men, while general Skker Jensen's army which is the advance guard is a part of his whole command."

"If Federal is really moving against the Glandelinians then what do you suppose is Manley's real intention?" was Violet's next question.

"I cannot tell you that either," said Gertrude.

"But see here," cried Angelina. "It is a serious thing to allow any of our generals or our own uncle or father to be surprised by any of Manley's secret intentions, so if the rebels are intending to do anything, Uncle and his generals ought to be warned."

"Gertrude smiled upon her best little friend. "Those who do not know of the enemy's intentions are not responsible for what may happen if an attack from an unexpected quarter comes. If we know nothing of the enemy's secret intentions, it is likely that neither do the generals."

"But our generals ought to know, Gertrude and we who know ought to do something pretty quick. He is going to tell the generals, to warn them, and how are we going to make it out?"

"But," returned Gertrude. "Is what I am now considering. What do you advise Violet dear?"

Jibee took a little time to consider this question, before she made any reply. "Then she said:

"Did you not learned of the near approach of the enemy or the intentions of Manley and Federal, you or we would never have worried about it or what is going to happen, so if we pay no attention to it, we may never hear of it again."

"But that would not be right," declared Violet. "I and you will be without sisters some day rulers over different sections of Angelina, which includes the Abyssinikian countries, the Galverinikan country, the Angelinian states, and Abbenania as well as Angelina Agatha, and being the seven Princess's of this the last sound he heard was the booming roar of the battle, the mistling of bullets, the staccato smoke blowing from the muzzles of the guns. He saw a light that could not be had from any other source, and he knew that the enemy was within reach.

nation it is our duty to make the glandelinian cause which is so wicked lose out at any cost---by whatever that may be-and to have the war settled. so while the yankees or federal may not know the real side of papas, Uncles or other armies, it is our duty nevertheless to do something to have the generals warned, so we would not be doing our duty if we kept away from doing it, and allowed our own armies to be surprised by flank attacks."

"That's a fast Violet dear," commented Catherine Vivian. "We have got to leave general Constantine Aronburg's army which camps we are not in, and make a long, perilous trip to either Wienstiens army or Uncle's and warn them of their peril. But how are we going to do it, and do it on time?"

"That is what is puzzling me also, little Indian girl," said Gertrude. "It may be extremely dangerous for you to make that trip into these strange regions, where we may meet Chandi Indians more fierce and warlike than even those in the araias under Manley and the other Chandi Indian generals."

"I'm not as afraid and neither are my sisters!" said Violet with a smile.
"It is not a question of being afraid," argued Jennie vividly. "Of course any one knows we are like fairies ingetting away from the rebel and leaving them as we do, and have never been killed yet, and only hurt once in a long while and we know we have millions of friends and even ways of our own to help; usout of all this trouble."
"But Catherine dear dispite of all this we have been in serious danger of our girls being in account of these wicked enemies, and it is not right for any one to put herself in danger of any kind unless we are asked to do so by some one whom we truly

"Perhaps if we are careful enough we shall be in no danger at all." "Returned violet with a smile. "You must not imagine danger dear sisters, for under any conditions one must only imagine nice things, and we don't know that the glandelinians under Menley, and Federal are as near or as far as it seems. Perhaps we could be good and careful, and by reasonable ways avoid all rebels who may happen to lie in the way."

"...and your other sister is right, Violet dear," asserted Gertrude mgeline." It is true we know nothing of the whereabouts of these two great Grandchildren armies, except that each one intends to surprise and attack two christian armies simultaneously, and on the same day and hour if p. possible. We have a large amount of men at their command. We know from many experience that such folks like to rebel, and not like to submit to have spies within their lines, and to be interfered with. Therefore we are more likely to swarm whole regions with scouting parties and spies of their own, to detain all persons who are likely to be going toward any christian army."

"If we had an army of boy Scouts or men to take with us," Added Angelina, "I think it would not be so bad, but there is not a boy or girl scout in all our armies that we could spare on any expedition you just now."

"Yes, but he is only one lad, and even if he were and is brave, he could not

What then my 4 sisters and Gertrude would you suggest? "Inquired violet

"I advise you to send a boy scout or one soldier to general Hanson's army, and let them inform the great general that it is probable that Manley intends to surprise his rear or something." Proposed Gertrude. "Let the scouts tell him or his generals, that his army is in danger, and if they are afraid to go on the mission to place them under punishment if they refused to obey the commands of the Princess's of Angelina."

"If they refuse to do it, what then?" he asked. "I should be obliged to carry out my threat, and punish the poor soldiers," and that would be an unpleasant unpleasant and difficult thing to do. I am sure it would be better for me to go peacefully, without an escort, and armed with only my weapons, and get to the generals' army some how. Then if we are persuaded or have trouble, I or my sisters could resort to some other means to outwit the enemy."

"It's a ticklish thing any way you look at it." sighed Daisy Vivian. "I'm sorry now that the man brought us the code message."

The glacial Galvindhia was a pretty big one, and partly in possession of the glaciallinian arides, which seemed to be impendible to wind just now, and the direction the two glaciallinian arides under Munley and Federal according to arides were far apart is was no swalljourney from there to either one of them. Around the location of Concoctinian glaciallinian arides the country was thickly settled with christian arides, but the further away you get from his great army army the fewer christian soldiers or camps there they are, until these parts a mass of miles north are free from any one. Also these far away sections were little known to Jolot and her sisters, except in the south and north or west, where the main christian arides had moved back and forth a often and where the vivilian girls had wandered away on many hundreds of tripeof spying, scouting and explorations.

The least known in its situation was the Gilikin State of Galveringa which now harbored many strange bands of riving Gargoylian and other kinds of landelinian arabs, and scouting parties, and millions of secret enemies of all kinds, men in and about its mountains, in valleys and forests, and streams, and cities and towns and violent and her cities were bound for the far distant part of that state where sometimes army was situated near the Mario Geborne Woods.

"I am really sorry," said Violet to her sister Alice, as they perched side on, "not to know more about the plans and intentions of the two gladiolusian generals, who are moving against our noble army and intentions. It is however our duty to be acquainted with every plan the rebel generals may intend to make, and to trace making every hidden part of the country, but we are kept so busy at other long journeys for our country's cause."

"Well," replied Joyce, "we will probably find out a lot for our selves on this trip, and we will learn all about the plans of the generals before then anyhow. Time does not make much difference to us now, cause we don't care how long we run into, so if we explore one place at a time we will by and by know every nook and corner of Calverini like our generals do."

and her sisters were around their uncles at their most powerful cartridge belts, and their best and most handy guns which they could use to protect themselves from harm, and stored the paper in his possession. Violet had merely slipped as an extra precaution a small derringer into the bosom of her dress. She a little but most deadly gun was violet one was one of violet weapons of offense and defense and by its use she could accomplish many things. They had left general concentration somewhere very just at the approach of evening, and their horses traveled very swiftly over the roads toward the northwest, but in a few hours they had to slow down their horses because the far, hazy and small villages had become far and few and far between and often there were no paths at all in the directions they wished to follow. If only they could have been able to get a railroad but no railroad railroads were running in this location. At such times however they crossed the fields, avoiding groups of trees and wide woods that seemed foreboding, and fording the streams and rivulets whenever they came to them but keeping their eyes peeled for the signs of the rebel scouting columns. At finally they reached a broad hillside covered closely with a mass of scrubby bush and brush, through which their horses could not force a passage.

"It's will be difficult wi for even us girls to get through without tearing our dresses," said Violet. "We must leave our horses hidden here somewhere or send that cat to the christian lines and proceed on our journey by foot."

"That's all right," her sisters replied. "We are tired riding anyhow." "do you suppose Violet dear we are anywhere near General Johnston's army?"

"I cannot tell sisters dear, but I know we surely have been going in the right direction, so we are sure to find it in time."

The scrubby brush, seemingly to be more than six miles long was almost like a grove of small trees for it reached as high as the heads of the girls, neither of whom were very tall. They were obliged to thread their way in and out in the most careful a manner, until finally Penrod was afraid they would get lost, and finally they were all halted by a curious barrier or curious thing that barred their further progress. It looked like a huge extensive network of heavy cords or ropes, as if woven by the most gigantic spiders--and the thick ropes string and twine and the like was fastened stoutly to all the branches of the bushes and continued all along down the line of the brush, now in the form of half circles and in other ways in a perfect tangled maze. The threads of the network of some were of purple color, red and other brilliant colors, and even seemed to be woven into a number of artistic patterns, but the roping all reached far to the ground to the branches above the heads of the little girls and the one boy, and formed a sort of fence that hedged them in from going on.

"It does not look very strong through for all that," said Catherine. "I wonder if we could breakthrough if we tried."

Her sister made the attempt but found the rope barrier stronger than it seemed. All their efforts could not break a single thread whatever.

"We must go back I think and try to get around this peculiar brush," Violet decided, beginning to think that it was some sort of an abatis or something.

As they turned to the right, and getting from the hedge followed it down the line as far as it seemed to go, but found that southward it spread in a regular angle. On and on they went until finally Violet declared that they had gone for two miles and it seemed that either had he they had returned to the exact spot from which they started or that the abatis was score of miles long. "Here Violet is your handkerchief you had dropped."

"In that case this must not be an ordinary low brushwood growing but a strangely fenced abatis and if we are not careful we will walk into a trap," exclaimed the little girl.

"No," said Fenrod, "I have encountered a strange abatis of some kind." "It surely must be one made by a glandelinian army who have probably abandoned this section of the country and they did it cleverly too," said Angelina. "I wonder what army it was."

"It must have been made by a christian engineering corps for it is not of glandelinian make, I'm quite sure," turned Violet. "But it seems to be the most enormous abatis we have ever come upon."

"Quite right you are indeed," cried a voice behind them, turning quickly around they beheld a huge purple coated soldier with a sword standing not two yards away, and regarding them with his keen black but fierce eyes. Then there appeared from somewhere unknown to them a dozen more great purplecoated soldiers which silenced the first one and said:

"They think we have abandoned the abatis and our army had retreated, sir and as their speech are suspicious they are our prisoners."

Violet and her sisters or Fenrod did not like the looks of these soldiers at all. Though they wore purple coats they wore gray pants instead of yellow as Angelinian soldiers do, they had evil looking faces, and were armed with long guns and other weapons.

"They look wicked," the violet whispered to Joice. "What shall we do?"

Joice gazed defiantly upon the strange soldiers with a serious face.

"What is your object in deciding to make us your prisoners?" she inquired.

"We happened to overhear your strange speech," answered the man who was a sergeant.

"There is no excuse for any one coming up to our abatis unless they have some designs in purpose so we decide that you strangers are suspicious characters, and you are our prisoners."

"We are the victim girls, and so no loyal Angelinian would arrest their own friends and their own little Princesses," said Violet with dignity.

"Well don't make the mistake of taking us for Angelinians," said the reply. "We are glandelinians and that makes us your masters. Come with us to our encampments, and we will have you before our own general in short order."

"We won't," said Violet indignantly. "We won't have anything to do with you insurgents. How dare you wear the uniform of Angelinians?"

"It is none of your business why we wear the uniform," returned the glandelinian in a severe tone and the next instant he made a quick thrust at Violet with his sword with a bayonet fixed with the intention to run her through. But Violet at that instant had her hand gripped on her wall gun in her bosom and she fired from behind her dress and the rebel pitched face down and was mortally wounded, while his bayonet had not even touched her. Another Glandelinian saw a dash at Joice but she and her sisters suddenly covered the rebels with their guns and the glandelinians recoiled as if they had been struck by something.

"You had better let us go on our way," Angelina. "Ivan advised him" "So see you vile snippers," you can't dare make further attempts to hurt us." "No dignifications better than ours," returned the glandelinians angrily. "You not dare go on, and if you can break through the abatis, you may go to escape. You will never escape, and if you go through the abatis, you may go into a trap you dogs now we know you are here."

With that the glandelinian leader uttered a peculiar whistle and all the rebels disappeared.

"There is more danger of encountering hidden enemies than I dreamed of," remarked Violet with a sigh of regret. "It seems that our ways are not safe no matter which way we go."

"Never mind that now," said Joice. "Let's see what we can do to get beyond this abatis."

They now continued on their way with guns still drawn, exceeding the abatis, and looking in every direction at the same time so as not to be surprised and soon were amazed at its length. Although taller at some points, and not so thick as at others it resisted all their efforts to find an end to it, or to work through against the ropes.

"I must find some way to get through the new network of the abatis," said Violet finally. "Let us first look around and see what we can find."

They entered among the brushwood like abatis, and finally came to a shallow pool outside of it, formed by some small bubbling spring. Violet stooped to get a drink and discovered in the water a large carving knife, a tin blade about as big as a bread knife and very sharp. Violet picked it up and went to her sisters.

"One sister," she called. "I have something to cut our way through. I just found it."

Her sisters at once came to her side and Joice demanded:

"What did you find?"

Violet showed it to them and she said:

"I could cut our way through with this easily enough, and we can get beyond the abatis. We can surely do that can't we?"

"I suppose so," replied Joice. "But we may run into a big rebel camp beyond."

"But should we do that?" Joice inquired.

"We might as well give ourselves up as prisoners then," said Angelina.

"Prisoners for the glandelinians are very common now a days, but child ones are rare besides us girls at least, and you can make us invisible so when we go through the abatis the rebels won't see us."

"No one could do that," said Violet. "And so we might as well go and see what we can do."

Violet then reached forward and started to cut strand after strand of the ropes, which she was able to sever with one clip.

When enough of the rebel abatis tangles had been cut to allow them to pass through they looked beyond and saw the way clear so they burst through on their other side and ran as fast as they could do. They were just in time to escape through the strange abatis, for several of the rebels now appeared, having discovered that the stringed tangles were severed, and had not the seven little girls rushed through the opening, the rebels would have easily seized them, and had their prisoners for sure. Violet and her sisters and Fenrod ran as fast as they could and although the angry glandelinians threw a number of lances after them hoping to lose them or entangle them in the coils of the ropes and so even fired shots, they managed to escape and ran to the top of the hill.

FROM the top of the hill Violet and her sisters and Fenrod looked down into the 11 large valley beyond, and were surprised to see it filled for its full width and length with a floating sea of clouds of all colors, that appeared to be dense smoke, nothing in the valley was ever visible except these rolling waves of dense smoke, but beyond on the other side rose what was supposed to be a hill, that appeared quite as beautiful in its scenery as a gigantic volcanic eruption.

"Will 'old Dadsy' 'livan' that are we to do s'aters. Walk down into that seething forest fire, and probably get roasted, or go some other way or wait untill the smoke clears away and see if there is a safe passage across the valley!"

"I'm sure the smoke will never clear away as it is a terrible forest fire raging, and if we wait here long enough it may catch us."

that soon the girls were astonished to find themselves soon standing upon another hill free from smoke and far from the far, before they realized they had fairly started.

"Thank you," said Violet gratefully, and the others also added their thanks for the service. The boys however made no answer but just saluted and smiled and with wave of their hats in good bye as again they remounted their horses and rode away from view.

"We, Hell," said Oz, "prized Vivien with a laugh." "That was an easier escape from the forest fire than we expected." "It is worth while sometimes to have so a boy escorts appear to our aid. to remain out all the time despite any perils, and be in danger of the foe all the time. "

They now climbed the banks and found before them a large and most delightful plain that spread for miles in all directions. Many large trees were scattered through the fields of grass, there were countless bushes and plants bearing lovely blossoms and lush lucious fruits, now and then a large group of stately trees added to the beauty of such a landscape in Calavernia. But there were no dwellings or a sign of any human habitation.

no dwellings or a sign of an enemy or christian encampment, at least a no sign of any kind of life. the farther side of the plain was bordered by a immense woods and just in front of the back of the forest rose a large and queerly shaped hill or mound that towered for hundreds of feet above the plain.

"If it is," replied Violet. "Wierwien's army must be only several miles further from here. Can we walk that far or should we rest for the remainder of the night and get some sleep girls?"

"Of course we would rather get there as quick as possible and sleep afterwards." was the prompt answer. "I'm sorry we had to leave our horses behind for they would come in handy right now, but with the climax of the first part of our journey in sight, a night's rest seems a small price to pay."

It was however a longer tramp than they expected, and high midnight overtook them before they could get even within half a mile of the extensive forest. A violet proposed they look for a halting place for the rest of the night.

Not a series of tents but a single tent of rounded form. The canopy was stained a deep blue color and the sides were the last sound he heard was the booming roar of the battle, the whistling of bullets, and the shouting of the soldiers as they gathered guns now.

They reached the tent and then, after calling and waiting a moment, no response from it. Violet looked in and saw a small table set for only five persons with brightly colored linen, bright silver and sparkling glassware, a vase of beautiful roses in the centre, and many dishes of strange but very delicious delicacies—food, some smoking and hot waiting to satisfy their hunger. Also to their surprise on either side of the tent were beds, with satin sheets, warm blankets, and pillows filled with down. There were strangely but beautifully formed chairs too and tall lamps that lighted the interior of the tent with a soft rosy glow.

Not knowing what it may belong to they nevertheless knowing that most things are easy in war possessed themselves of the tent and all ate the meal with unusual enjoyment, and thought of the wonders of the enemy armies and the ways of their wicked generals. And Violet thought to herself, if General Conscientiousness were the chief general next to general Robert Vivian and Hanson the war would be probably carried to a quicker end, for he was a expert a general that he even seemed to know the very secret ways of nature, knew how to trick his most shrewd enemies, command more vast armies than others do, and could produce instantly from a raging defeat into a tremendous sweeping victory, and could accomplish things that men work hard and anxiously for through weary years. And even now he wished in his kindly innocent heart, that all the Christian generals would be like Conscientiousness, and overcome the enemy without so much terrible fighting, and worry, and without so much loss, for the he imagined, they would all be able to conquer the enemy at one time. And Violet and her sisters looking in their boy friends face and almost reading his thoughts a violet said:

"No, no Penrod dear, that would not do at all for us. Instead of a quick ending of the war it would bring trouble among our own generals and so on. We know this war has already brought weariness to the whole world—there has been always eager striving of our generals to obtain the most difficult victories, and we know that victories have only been accomplished by hard work and careful thought. I fear if every general were alike for instance like Conscientiousness there would be nothing to do. I'm sure no interest in life or the war. Every general being different is what makes things worth while—and to also enable them to do good deeds and to help the armies and officers less fortunate than themselves. If every general did could be like Conscientiousness there would be little to be wished for."

"Well you little girls are all alike in your ways and manners. Are you not happy?" asked Penrod.

"Yes dear, because neither one of us are the same in our ways and you are mistaken in your words. Every one of us are braver than the other, more good than the other, and each of us have different ideas to make our friends and others as happy and a carefree as possible. Had we no work to do, no interest of anything, and no friends, or no subjects and the like to look after, or no parents and no homes we surely would be miserable. Also you must realize that while we are more powerful than any other girls or boys of Angelina Angolinia on account of our wit and standard and position, we are not as madcap as Gertrude Angelina or Angelina riches to the enemy, who have have studied everything about the nature of the enemy that we girls know nothing of. They are merciless to their pursuers. They shoot to kill without a feeling while we loathe to use a gun and do so only in case of self defense a self defense. Even Jennie Urner can do some things doing her scouting tours that I or my sisters are unable to accomplish, while I and my sisters can accomplish things unknown to them. This is to explain that we are not all powerful to the enemy by any means. Our ways are simply learned like theirs, and not sorcery, or wizardry or fairy magic or something like the enemy always think about us."

"All the same," said Penrod. "I'm mighty glad we found this tent, with the meals and beds all ready for us."

Violet smiled.

"Yes it is indeed wonderful," she agreed. "Not a/all children meet such good luck as this, but some other children have had experiences that fill me or my sisters with blank astonishment. I think that is what makes us modest and unassuming—the facts that our kinds of arts are equally divided by God among us, and vistas of beautifully varied hued fields, and immense groves of trees still bearing fruits or laden with sweet scented flowers and which had escaped so far the horrible ravages of the terrible war. At times as just now they had nothing else to do one of the girl scouts would start some music from a mouth organ, or sing a song with the others joining in the chorus, or some would rise and dance, gracefully swaying to the music of a mouth organ or a harp played by a companion. And then Gertrude Angelina would smile glad to see her comrades show some cheerfulness despite the harrowing work they had to do. Presently from among the far distant company streets some objects were seen to be moving, threading along the broad path of the company street that led toward Gertrude's tent. One of the girl scouts looked upon these approaching objects almost enviously, Gertrude merely gave them a glance or so and nodded her stately and beautiful head as if she was pleased, for it meant the coming of her friends and mistresses—the only ones in all of Angelina except general Hanson, Vivian or Robert Vivian that Gertrude Angelina would bow her head to. Then swiftly up the company street trotted a salivade of seven horses and riders, and as the horses finally halted, there descended from their backs seven young girls extremely beautiful, the Vivian girl Princeesses and Herones Heroines.

He seven little girls this time instead of wearing their usual purple uniform dresses were wearing simple yellow and white striped muslin gowns, and as they ran toward Gertrude Angelina and her girl scouts they laughed and chatted as gaily as if they were not heroines or the most important persons in the world. These war torn countrywomen Gertrude Angelina's girl scouts had already risen and had stood with bowed heads to greet the beautiful Vivian girls, while Gertrude Angelina came forward with outstretched hands or arms to greet her guests and friends.

"We have just come to visit you for some time you know," said Violet. "I and my sisters were all wondering how we should pass the day as we had no mission to perform just now, when we happened to think we had not been to you for over a week, so we took our own horses and rode over here from our own camps." "And we came so fast," added Jennie Vivian, "that our hair is all blown fuzzy for the horses we rode seemed to make a wind of their own. Usually it is in half a day's journey from general Hanson's camp to this plantation but I do it in half the time we were two hours or more on the way."

"You are most welcome," said Gertrude Angelina and led them into her magnificent tent. Violet took the arm of her hostess, but her sisters lagged behind making some of the girl scouts they knew best, talking with others, and making them all feel that they were their friends. When at last they joined their sister, and Gertrude Angelina in the big tent, they found the two talking earnestly about the condition of the people of the Calverinian countries, the progress the enemy was making, the progress of the war in general, and how to make as possible for the main generals to find means to bring the rebellion down to ruin as hastily as possible. This interested Violet and Gertrude however but it did not interest her sisters very much just now so the six little girls ran outside to have a more longer visit with the girl scouts, and no sooner had gone out when toward them came racing a swift messenger on horseback bearing a big slip of rolled up paper in his hands. This man or messenger was one of the greatest treasured servants of the Vivian girls, and the Vivian girls prized him more highly than any other of their messengers. That was the reason why even now he was galloping furiously over to the tent.

"I do not suppose there is any other messenger in Angelina's armies to compare with this one, for he is always out on long distant scouting tours, and constantly watching everything that occurs or occurs, and at exactly the moments it may happen. And he always makes reports that are always truthful, although sometimes he has no chance to give as long a detail as the Vivian girls could wish, but then during this war lots of things do happen, and as when even he discovers anything he has to be swift so as to warn them at the right time. This man came to the Vivian girls several times each day. I do not doubt that one of the most important things that the Vivian girls would have wished for if they could have got it, was the last sound he heard was the beautiful whistling of bullets.

Glandelinian great Book of records which we have read of in the Os stories when we were young children. Glandelin who was the Os at governor's office said the book very much because on its pages are printed every day through some supernatural means records of every event of a single day in any part of the world, and exactly the moments it happens. And we know that the records are always truthful, and so it is no doubt whatever that if the Glandelin girls had been in possession of that great book they could have used its means to know everything the enemy was doing, and what other events of the war was going on and so be prepared. But though they had read the Os stories they knew such a book was out of the question, for even if they did believe in it they did not dare try any means to obtain the book. However they trusted their best messenger and when he came up he handed them a roll of paper, and after saluting went off while Glandelin received the paper unrolled it and looked over the printed letters on the scraps.

"This is strange," she exclaimed. "Did you know Jennie that Manley's army is moving in a direction to swing on both sides and our uncle's army at the same time?"

"Yes," replied Jennie, coming to her side. "I know of that, and observed on the maps of my geography that there is a situation for our two generals that makes it impossible for Manley's plans to succeed so we do not need to be worried. He is actually running himself into a trap and does not know it. At whatever else he intends to do I do not know. No one yet has ever heard of any of the other plans of general Manley. His army is way up at the upper edge of the Glandelin Country of the state of Angola line, but general Manley has and has made the Glandelin impossible on one side by devastating whole forests, and has made preparations to advance against Manley's rear and drive him upon general Manley's stronger army, and crush the rebels. That however is the only plan of our own generals which we know very little."

Gertrude Angeline and Violet then came out and looked at the slip of paper.

"I guess no one else knows about this either, unless the Manleys themselves," remarked Violet. "At the bringing of that paper in such haste looks mighty suspicious and the paper says 'Manley is advancing big forces of Glandelinians and Zimmanianians, against general Manley's army from two directions, while he is moving the rest of his army under Federal and Glandelinian against Manley, and there is likely to be two fierce battles simultaneously, and much trouble and disasters as the result and that looks suspicious.'"

"Is that all the paper reads?" asked Gertrude Angeline.

"Every word," said Violet. "And all of the little girls, looked at the strange report the scout had brought and seemed surprised and very perplexed and also worried."

"Tell me Gertrude dear," said Violet. "What are Manley's real intentions? These records here seem a hidden something which our scout discovered which are terribly suspicious?"

"I cannot Violet dear," confessed Gertrude. "Until now I never even heard of the strange movements, nor have I ever heard of the near presence of the two armies of general Manley mentioned. In a or to all of us approaches to the enemy interested parts of Glandelin are hidden many Glandelinian guards, wait here, and scouting parties which are naturally unknown to all of us. However if you so desire, I can learn through seventeen of my girl scouts here, something of the intentions of Manley within three days."

"I wish you could accomplish this soon," answered Violet seriously.

"You see Gertrude if Manley succeeds in these intentions he will be able to sweep the two Christian armies before him like chaff before a gale, and we cannot allow any such troubles to arise now if I can possibly help it. We wish to see Glandelin captured so we have a way open for the advance on Glandelin key and cause her capture."

"Very well," Violet dear," said Gertrude. "I will try to get quicker information to guide you and your sisters. Please excuse me and my girl scouts for several hours, while we go to one of our secret telegraph stations."

"May I go with you?" asked Penrod who was there also.

"No my dear boy," was the reply. "Neither could the Glandelin girls just now, as it would spoil my efforts to have anyone present but myself and one of my scouts."

some being given to each of us. I'm glad I or even my sisters do not know everything, Penrod, and that there still are things in both nature and wit and enormous for the losses of both sides!"

Penrod could not quite understand this, so he said nothing more on the subject, and presently had a new reason to survive. When they had quite finished their meals Violet and her sisters told him a lot of their experiences so far in the war. For over an hour they told stories and talked with Penrod about various Christian generals and Glandelinian generals in whom they were interested about. And then they decided it was bedtime, and as Penrod decided to remain up and be on guard they all undressed, and except into the soft beds, and fell asleep almost as soon as their heads touched the pillows.

The strange mountain that appeared to be a volcano looked much nearer in the rising morning sun, but Violet and her sisters and Penrod, knew there was a long tramp before them, even yet, and even now they had to be careful. They finished dressing only to find a strangely formed but very delicious breakfast awaiting them, and having eaten they left the tent, and started off in the direction of the strange mountain, which they selected as their first goal. After going a little way Violet herself looked back and saw the tent still standing there but that a party of horsemen had arrived at it and were looking in the direction of her and her sisters. She was not surprised, for she knew an aid felt his would happen. Avoid pursuit by those Glandelinians. "Enquired Violet. "Couldn't we do something to you sisters looked back surprised and then Violet said: "O dear I'm sorry that such good luck is beyond our power. But there are some trees beyond which we can shelter ourselves behind and if they come at us we have them exposed."

"Perhaps they will change their minds and not pursue," said Jennie thoughtfully.

"Those Glandelinians," said Violet. "Are the fierce Gargoyles for I can tell by their garb. They have the swiftest horses known to man but even then the Gargoyles have also very swift horses and even can conjure up other modes of travel. Don't forget what I told you girls once about the Glandelinians called the Gargoyles, that no one is powerful enough to resist them successfully unless they keep cool and collected." collected."

"Well I suppose we ought to know that," Violet had some experiences with the Ku Klux Klan of the rebels," replied Angeline. "But I can't figure out why they left a tent abandoned in the middle of a plain unless it was some way belonged to us, and yet I cannot figure out why they don't pursue. They are not coming at all."

"Don't try to coax them," laughed Violet. "But we have at least one good art better than they have, and we know the trick of not only how to win hearts but how to defend our lives if need be at the same time. There are only five Gargoyles in that party and I think they know seven to five is an unfair advantage and so they don't attack when there is an extra one with us to boot."

"O I think that they knowing we are the Glandelin girls don't dare attack us," said Catherine earnestly. "If we really can do it, then we don't know how we do it."

"It took them a good three hours for walking on foot to reach the very foot of the very woods itself and yet the mountain seemed miles and miles and yet miles away, and then they found the woods so wide and extensive and so thick that the trees were in perfect perfect walls. However a number of good wide roads ran through the forest forest forest."

"Even my heart tell me it is not safe to attempt to go into those woods," remarked Daisy. "Glandelin, gazing upwards, and then at the woods."

"But there must be one way for us to get through," declared Violet. "Otherwise we could not make our way to Glandelin's army, or even get out of the danger zone we are in."

"You know we must warn the generals of the enemy's intention."

the last sound he heard was the whistling of bullets. The girls therefore went in a single file, and Jolan explained that they were now through or part way through the woods and could get around and probably past the mountain without being seen by enemies and fired on however they met no further obstructions.

"That is positively so, Violet. Let's walk around by the edge of the woods a little way, perhaps we will find a way through it or something without encountering hidden enemies." They walked quite a distance, for it was a big woods, and as they continued onward, and came to a point where there grew a line of pine trees, they suddenly discovered an enormous pathway going through the woods and terminating into a wide broad road. The trees at the beginning of the pathway were arched overhead and were not very thick, because it merely led through to a bigger road beyond.

"Oh we have found a way to get through the woods at last," announced Violet, and the seven girls, and Penrod turned and walked straight toward the pathway. Suddenly right before them they saw a cloud of smoke, heard a deafening crash and the copse of a sent them flying on the ground, Violet jumping her knee against a tree when they arose to their feet they did not dare to proceed any further.

"Dear me!" exclaimed Violet, rubbing her knee, which had struck the stump very hard, although she could not see how she did it; "this is not an easy at it looks. But has exploded girls. Was it a shell of some sort?" Jolan was looking around, with her eye glasses pressed against her eyes.

"See dear, it's a hidden masked battery that fired the shot," she replied. "The glandelinians who ever they are have a hide hidden position probably all the way through the woods, and also on that mountain there, and to prevent enemies from surprising them or finding out their place of concealment they have placed I believe at every roadside masked and concealed batteries, for I see one with my glasses which is protected by a low wall of solid stone being held in place by cement, and then the wall and guns are covered with foliage and growth of every kind so to us it would not be visible. It was from there the smoke and detonation came from. It was lucky the grapeshot missed us."

"I wonder why they did that when they know we are children," asked Penrod. "A concealed battery could not keep out a charging party of christian anyhow, whether it could be seen or not, so there is surely no use for them to make it hidden. Seems to me it would have been better to have left it visible, for then no one would have seen it anyway at the place it is in position. And anyhow we can see it as we did. And probably any one that tries to go through the woods at day time or up the sides of the mountain, gets a shot fired at us as we already did."

Violet or her sisters made no reply at once. Their faces were grave and thoughtful.

"I think I know the reason for making the concealed battery," she said after a while. "The glandelinians here are in the rear of their main positions, and they use the concealed batteries to prevent a surprise attack on their rear. If they did not be as shrewd as this and a big wall of christian soldiers were approaching the woods nothing could prevent them from swarming across the plain, and the glandelinians would be driven out of the woods in a most disgraceful defeat. So they had to make a number of concealed batteries to prevent surprise, and if the batteries are hidden or were not hidden I mean all christian soldiers moving for the woods, would see them, and be on their guard, and would find other places to get around the enemy right or left, and then the position of the enemy would be uselessly held. So the glandelinians cunningly made the concealed battery at every road of approach into the woods, and probably elsewhere, believing that the everyone who saw the woods and the entrance to the woods would walk straight toward it, without suspicions as we did, and yet find it impossible to go any further. I suppose the concealed batteries are really more stronger than they appear to be, and so no attacking force could break through the woods at this point, and so it seems as if we ourselves will be obliged to go away again or receive a volley that may be fatal to us."

"Well," said Angelina, "if there is a way around the woods where is it?" "We must find it," returned Violet, and she began investigating their way about and along the steep base of the woods. Penrod followed and began to get discouraged when one of the seven girls, Hettie, had walked nearly a quarter of a mile away from the direction of the concealed battery.

But now the woods slightly curved in toward the plain, and suddenly ended by a very wide stream, and here by the stream was another pathway, pathway pathway through the woods to allow a single person to pass through at one time. The girls therefore went in a single file, and Jolan explained that they were now through or part way through the woods and could get around and probably past the mountain without being seen by enemies and fired on however they met no further obstructions.

"Most people," Violet would not have figured this thing out, "the way we did," remarked Penrod. "If I had ten alone the woods and its concealed battery, the better interior of the woods now they began to go forward down a roadway of larger width. Violet, her sisters followed in the road, and then went up a slight rising way, and then downward, following a passage way.

The road was just wide enough for the girls to walk in the, abreast and in continued onward for nearly ten paces, only to find the road made a sharp curve to the left, then again the roadway or passage turned abruptly, it is time to the way through the forest was quite dark, for they were in the heart of the woods, and all the sunlight had been shut out by the peculiar turns of the roads, however once in a while the embankment broke through giving out a lustreous light which lighted the roadway enough for them to see their way plainly. They walked on for another long distance, and then they came to other turns of the road, what was the program and violet and her sisters figured that they were not getting very far.

"These glandelinians must have made this road way and certainly must be funny people," said Penrod to violet. "They did not seem to do anything in a bold straightforward manner. In making this passageway with planks they may have forced any one to walk many miles elsewhere further than necessary. And of course this trip could be just a distraction to the rebels as it is to us." "That is true," answered violet. "Yet it must have been a very clever arrangement to prevent their being surprised by intruders while they have their secret base camp here. And every time we make a turn the presence of our being here is being being the more perilous."

"How do you know that?" demanded Penrod, astonished indeed. "I have heard queer sounds ever since we started," violet told him. "You could not hear it, I know but nevertheless or my sisters can hear sounds a great distance off."

"Do you hear anything else that seems to come from the distant hills?" inquired Jemima.

"Yes," the glandelinians are firing shells into our part of the woods, and I believe many glandelinians are following on our trail and we will have to watch out that we do not be surprised."

This made the other girls and Penrod feel somewhat anxious.

"I thought we were going to go through just a common woods," remarked Hettie. "I put the glandelinians are pretty clever it seems, and they know some kind of shrewdness too. These glandelinians may be dangerous girls. Perhaps we had better stayed at home in Constantinian Armaburgs army."

Finally the pathway or road seemed to be coming to an end. They only took about ten steps forward when they all stopped behind trees just in time for coming toward them a such a fierce throng of glandelinians that for a time the little girls and the boy halted speechless, and started into the faces of the rebels that confronted them. Violet and her sisters knew at once why these kind of glandelinians were called Amerindian Amerindians. They were fiercer looking than the usual kind of glandelinians, fiercer and warlike as savages. Their eyes were perhaps their best feature, being large and brilliant, and in regular color. They wore the usual uniforms of the guerillas. However aside from their fierce war like expression these glandelinians the majority of them were not really bad looking. The men were armed with long guns and rifles and had pistols stuck in their belts. They wore hats like little girls but were colored in stripes and checks of various various sorts so that their hats were quite good gorgeous.

It was lucky however the little girls and Penrod stepped behind the trees when they did and so were not discovered.

the last sound he heard was the booming of the cannon, the whistling of bullets, and the shouting of the soldiers.

SEE PAGE SIXTY EIGHT.

It was not long after however when some of the other Glandelinians coming up from there discovered the little girls behind the trees and at once pounced upon them and dragged them into the presence of the other rebel soldiers. When the Glandelinians saw that the strange intruders of their secret wood camp were only seven beautiful little girls and one handsome boy, the Glandelinians granted with evident satisfaction and some of them drew back, and bowed humbly to the little girls, and others did not touch them as was expected but permitted the little girls to see what the forest encampments looked like. The encampments were extensive as probably the woods were thick and the tents and huts were shaped like those seen in a circus, and also there were some buildings also, all made of wood or rocks, and there were some high redan and positions which could not be seen over the edge by any one standing in the edge of the plains, but now a big Glandelinian officer who was a Glandelinian came and stood before the little girls and in a gruff voice demanded: "What are you seven girls doing here with that boy? Have the dirty Federal soldiers or their generals sent you to spy upon us?"

"We are the Glandelinian girls, rulers in person of all the lands of Angelina and Abbeandina," was the answer.

"Well I have heard of you Glandelinian girls, so you may be what you claim," returned the Glandelinian. "Don't you know there is a big price offered for your capture dead or alive?"

"That is what we did hear, and this is a part of it also anyway," exclaimed Angelina defiantly. "We did not know you Glandelinians were a near here anyhow, and I guess we have as much right to go through these woods as well as any other people."

The officer laughed, and all the other Glandelinians who stood around laughed too. Some in the crowd called:

"He or her sisters better not tell our supreme general that. He'll find out!"

"No indeed," they all answered in positive tones.

"Who is your supreme general?" asked Violet.

"I think for one thing I'll let his tell you girl that himself," answered the Glandelinian officer who had first spoken. "You have broken our woods laws by coming here, and who ever you are, the supreme general will have to fix your punishment. You are lucky you have nothing with you but your weapons. Come along with me."

He started down a small pathway and Violet and her sisters and Penrod followed him, without protest for they wanted to see the general of this encampment and find out who he was. The tents of the encampment they passed seemed very pleasant enough. Walls of breastworks separated one camp from the other, and all the paths in the encampment were paved with smooth slabs of rocks. This seemed to be the only building material for the Glandelinians and they seemed to utilize it cleverly for every purpose of defense. Directly for a mile off in the center of one of the big camp camps stood a much larger tent, which the rebel officer who led them informed the girls was the headquarters tent of the general. He led them through an archway of the woods, and then into the first room of the big tent where the little girls and the boy sat upon two wooden benches, and awaited the coming of the supreme general. Pretty soon he entered from another room of the tent—a rather fat and old looking general, dressed much like the Glandelinians themselves but only distinguished from them by the sly and cunning expression on his face. He seemed to always have the habit of squinting one of his eyes, (the left) and looked at the Glandelinian girls with one eye open as they rose to receive him.

"Are you the supreme general of the these army of soldiers?" inquired Violet.

"Yes indeed that is me," he said, rubbing his hands slowly together and looking at her with one eye. "My word in supposed to be law and is." "I'm the head general of this army."

"Well we are the Glandelinian girls, and we had gone through the woods to get to our own friends who are—"

"Stop a minute," interrupted the general, and turned to the officer who had brought the little girls to his tent. "Go away Colonel Pelliss. He commanded. Return to the outskirts of the camp and have the sentries at every place to guard all approaches to our lines. I will look after these strangers."

The officer bowed and departed, and to prevent suspicion Violet asked wonderingly:

"Is he a colonel?"

"Of course he is," was the answer. "We got to have many officers to command regiments and companies, and brigades and divisions and something or other. I have over 10,000 officers of all ranks. That is what keeps our army contented. But I'm the supreme general of all. This is a part of general term of a Glandelinian army, you know."

"What is your name?" asked Penrod.

"I'm called general Corwin," he said. "I sent that colonel gladder away because the moment you mentioned, 'The Glandelinian girls' I know who you are. I suppose I'm the only Glandelinian of this whole army that has ever heard of you or your work, but that is because I have more secrets than the others have. You know you are prisoners for good now."

Violet and her sisters were staring hard at the old Glandelinian general. Violet remarked: "Because I'm sure if we wanted to you, or your whole army, or all the lost souls could not keep us prisoners here."

"I don't blame you for thinking that," he said coolly. "I know your natures well and you could kill me right here if you wanted to. Once general Federal had lost some of the most important papers and plans, because as you say you can spy on us poor fools and get away with everything. I have also heard that long ago, a band of girls as pretty looking as fairies rode fairly through all of Manley's lines in one day and night, and made such a scene of confusion and havoc as left a raiding party, and when the Glandelinians under Manley came after them they made the general realize that it was to send upsurvers after them. Using that time those bands of girls were sorry for some wounded Glandelinian officers they saw lying on the ground on their way of retreat from Manley's camp. So as they had been lying out there, what should those girls do but by extra efforts bring the wounded officers to a place of safety, and gave each of the three wounded officers as much care as possible, and that made the three officers very grateful despite the fact that they were enemies of Angelina. Well I can prove that I myself was one of the wounded officers at the time. See?" he continued. "Here is one of the hair ribbons, those human fairies lost and which I found." He took from his pocket a bright violet colored ribbon still tied into a beautiful bow on which it was gravely engraved:

"A PRESENT TO VIOLET ANGELINA VIVIAN, FROM HER FATHER.
ROBERT VIVIAN."

"What that is my own ribbon I lost six months ago. Where did you get it?" asked Violet.

"Why I found it beside the bed in the floor in that house that little girls took us to. All of those girls however were alike. Here is another ribbon." From another pocket he produced a second ribbon of red color. It was Catherine's.

"In those fairies give th you those ribbons that belonged to us?" inquired Violet.

"No but two of those girls dropped those ribbons from their hair as they all helped us into that hut, and tried hard to get us onto a bed. One of my supreme generals scolded me severely for holding onto those ribbons, so I hid them where he would never know of their presence. Then I made a law that if any one of my Glandelinians would find a trace of the girls who owned those ribbons to bring them in to me, and they would receive a reward, and if they failed to do so they would forfeit their own commissions as soldiers or officers. So every one of my Glandelinians especially those of the cavalry have been constantly on the look out for these girls and now I and my colonel are the only ones in this encampment who have at last found those little girls and their companions. I have your seven fairies back with me at last, and that makes me very glad—so glad that I'm going to reward you handsomely even though I be a wicked Glandelinian, if I do say so myself. I have four ribbons in my possession however and I thought many times the worse and most-wickedest of your enemies would have transformed you back into dust long ago. And now you are my prisoners."

the last sound he heard was the wild shouting of William as he leapt from the battlements.

"Good gracious these are our ribbons," said Violet. "And are we really your prisoners?"
"You are. But I have declared my own will on my own doing and no glandelinian soldier is going to have you in their power. You have done so much however in your spying work, that if you had not done that service to me and my two companions when we were lying wounded and helpless on the ground we would have had revenge and hunted you girls down. I had intended even to have your own parents assassinated, and and to ruin all your happiness, and cause your capture and make you my slaves, but your deed to us made me change my mind."

The general looked very angry now, his eyes flashed, and his face took on a wicked and very fierce expression, but Violet said to him, in a very sweet and friendly voice.

"I'm sorry to hear this. Of course it is our duty to do the work of spying as it is the duty of your men to spy on us, and that is the reason both sides have so much trouble about spies and scouts, but ain't it all fair in war. At what can we do about it? We never spied on you did we?"

He was only a little girl, but there was dignity in her pose and speech, which impressed the terrible glandelinian general.

"If you are really the German girl Princeesses of Abbeismun, the general said in a softer tone. "You are one of that band who under that spy girl or with that spy girl Angeline Turbine riches, made us three generals comfortable when we were so helpless and lying on that lonely road. I have heard that Angeline Turbine chose left her sister all night with you girls to care for me and my comrades, and did all that while Manley was looking everywhere for you."

"If you knew we did this to you, why do you wish to hold us prisoners then, when we being your rightful rulers you should tender me and my sisters, your loyalty and obedience?" asked Jessie, bravely.

"Well I only learned the fact just now that you are the girls, and I have been too surprised to think of what to do right away," he explained looking at her steadily. "he knew he was telling the truth and said: "But why do you wish to hold us prisoners when we were not spying on your camp, but tried to get through the woods to the other side?"

"It is for this reason," began the general. "We glandelinians have to do our duty, and as we have no evidence against you, and as most of us feel sorry to have made you prisoners, we would nevertheless have to hold you for an exchange of christian officers held by the Angelinians. What is fair enough and like using hate to catch fish. His may make the Angelinians angry, but they do know that you rightly belong to them, and as you are the Princesses of Angelina they would be right glad to give us back some of our officers to replace you again. But as long as you are here you may remain under our protection. It seems very unkind and unfriendly to do this for the favor you have done us, as you may admit, but you know we have to pay as much attention to our duty as you do yours, or other spies we ourselves would suffer the consequences. The rebel leaders knowing you are now within our lines have set guards at every our outlet of the woods, and if I was to be precious enough to let you free, the men would not agree to it, and report me to Manley. They have made all preparations now to prevent your escaping. Now my assistant general Germania is also in this camp, and is a wonderfully wise and general being your own brother. He has vowed to destroy you little girls as soon as he can lay hands on you, unless general Robert gives him father gives in and allows the de glandelinia to win the entire war. Of course you know your father, and uncle and many other Federal generals, and also is preparing a kind of poison to destroy a whole christian army in effort to get you. It is a clever idea, quite worthy of a man like him, for he even intended to dump the potent poison in all the water ways the christian armies may use for their drinking purposes as to poison them and you. But through the cleverness of one girl friends of your Gertrude Angeline his intention was frustrated. He happened to have heard of his dastardly plot and hid in his headquarters, and taking him unaware, shot and seriously wounded him and secured all his poison having frustrated him in this way even took away all his recipe and showed it to general Robert Vivian, so that Germania is watched now like a hawk watches for a little chicken. I'll keep you hidden from his eyes."

THE DARK NIGHT.

When said Jennie, Vivian thoughtfully. "Our wicked brother must be hopeless of repentance."

"Yes," said Germania, "he is. We are very wicked ourselves as you know, but we have more chance than he has of escaping perdition, but he does not know much about the Manleys or the others, nor half as powerful as I am now, as any of the christian armies will discover when we fight again our great battle with each other."

"But I do not believe Gertrude Angeline ever entered Germania's lines any more did she?" observed Angeline, Vivian.

"No, even had she done so afterwards the glandelinians would have easily captured her and made short work of her in a hurry. But she is clever and shrewd."

"It seems a sad story no matter which way it goes," as Violet commented. "And all the trouble arose mostly because we have a wayward brother."

"For that," said the general, again angry, "I made a law that any people who could find you girls should bring you in my presence when ever they had you. As you see you have been found at last, and I hope you girls don't think you would defy me as you did the other glandelinian generals."

"You can only make laws to govern your own soldiers and not us," asserted Violet sternly. "I and my sisters alone are empowered to make escapades of any kind when ever we want to."

"Pooh!" cried the general scornfully. "You can't make me believe such things, I assure you. I know the extent of your powers little girls and I know that I or my glandelinians are more powerful than you are. To prove it I shall keep you and your boy companion prisoners in this camp, until after we have been able to exchange you for our own officers who are prisoners in General Vivian's lines. Then if you promise to be good, and you happen to be taken by my men again I'll promise you I'll send you home without detaining you."

Violet and her sisters were amazed by this affront and defiance of the man whom all now except the glandelinians had obeyed and loved with out question. But Violet still unruffled and dignified, looked at the glandelinian general and said:

"You surely do not mean that after all we did for you when you were wounded, you are so angry over the troubles we made for Manley and his wicked generals, and speak unreasonably without reflection. I and my sisters came here with this boy friend of ours in an effort to find our way to our own father's army, for what reason we cannot say I'll not say as it is a secret between I and my sisters. I do not approve of your actions after what we did for you at that time, nor do I approve of general Germania's cruel attempt to poison us and the whole christian army we were with at that time. No one has the right anyhow to hold little children as accessories of war without their consent, so you and any other rebel generals have broken both our and God's laws in the meanest ways-- which must be obeyed."

"If you want to make peace and gain your freedom," said the general. "Make those three dangerous girl spies stop their work of depredations, and give me back what they had taken from me. Also make them agree to leave me and my men alone hereafter."

"Go!" returned Violet. "I or my sisters will not and cannot do that, for it would be unjust to our cause. I will have an interview with Gertrude Angeline with over her trouble with Germania, Vivian, and give her a talking too about her ruthlessly shooting him in cold blood as you say she did, but the other two girls must be left alone as they are doing their duty. Whether may you detain us as prisoners for exchange for we do not belong to you and never will. This arrangement is just and honorable, and you must agree to it and let us go, or we'll go ourselves."

"Never on earth!" cried the general furiously. Just then an officer came into his tent. He was tall and haughty but has been seeming to have one eye.

"There said the general with an angry look at her. "Here on the evil work of your christian dog soldiers and say if you can ever prevent us from winning our own cause come what may. What one eyed man was once the best of my orderlies but he is going home soon because he cannot serve any longer."

Now look at him."
"Right the christian dogs, fight the christian dogs, fight the christian dogs to a finish finish." Growled the man.
"I will fight the Angelinians." Exclaimed the glandelinian chief. "And if a dozen ivians and concentinians Aronburge want against me with all their arms, I will fight and defeat them just the same."
"Not if god can prevent it," asserted Violet.
"Who can prevent it not even god, but since you threaten me, I'll have you as I said before confined in my internment camp as prisoners for exchange until I get you can get back my friends who are prisoners in your camp." Said the general. He whistled and six glandelinians armed with long rifles with bayonets attached entered the tent and saluted him. Turning to the man he said:
"Take these seven girls, and the boy, and place them under guard in the internment camp. They are to be held as an exchanging batch of prisoners."
The six soldiers bowed low and one of them asked:
"Where are the seven girls and one boy, your Excellency?"
The general turned to where the ivian girls, and the boy had stood, but they had vanished.

Violet and her sisters seeing it was useless to argue with the fierce glandelinian general, had been considering how best to escape from his wicked power for they realized he was ungrateful for despite all they had done for him when he had been wounded in the battle of the Red Cal. Gailan gun. Violet and her sisters realized also that his glandelinians might be difficult to overcome, by any great christian army, and when he threatened to have them and Penrod placed into an internment camp (from which there would never be any escape) they slipped their right hand on their pistols which the glandelinians fortunately had forgotten to take away from them, and grasped them firmly. Violet with her other hand, grasped the hand of Penrod, but these motions were so natural that the vic had glandelinian general did not notice them. When however he turned to meet his six soldiers, the seven girls and Penrod managed to slip, unseen around the soldier to the rear entrance of the big tent, and getting outside of it, swiftly went around it, and by dodging between tents, and from tree to tree as carefully as possible got around the main group of tents and almost out of the camp before their escape was discovered. As they reached the outskirts of the woods, Violet whispered to her sisters:
"Let us run as fast as we can dear. We are good shots, so no one will be able to overtake us."
Her sisters and Penrod understood and they all were good runners. Violet and her sisters had observed a good and secret path that led to the rear of the woods, so no they made directly for it. One of the glandelinians were in the path, but the little girls quickly stepped behind trees, trees and then by going slowly and carefully from one tree to another and watching all directions at the same time managed to dodge the glandelinians. One or two of the glandelinians who had good hearing managed to hear the pattering of children's footsteps in the direction the little girls had gone and stopped with bewildered looks to gaze around them, but seeing no one the glandelinians did not pursue or interfere.

The glandelinian general had however lost no time in sending a large number of men after the escaping fugitives. He did not go himself but sent the colonel with about thirty men. He and his thirty men ran so fast in the direction they had gone that they might have easily have overtaken the little girls before they reached the main shelter of the trees, had not the little girls suddenly opened fire and dropped six of them without a miss. The survivors unable to stop tripped and sprawled over the fallen men, some falling flat, some doing acrobatic stunts and others staggering in an effort to keep their feet, the others tumbling in a heap. Before they could scramble up and continue the pursuit, it was too late to stop times a score of shots in a quick succession, and came to the aid of the fallen comrades, but the trees intervened and the fugitives were not hit. Here were guards on each side of the pathway to which the little girls had now taken, but of course they did not see the approaching fugitives quick enough to stop them as they sped past and went into the deeper recesses of the woods. They also fired several shots but missed on account of the trees.

The general after his speech went out of the tent within ten minutes he reappeared, and to their astonishment about one at least the boy ran it was general John Penrod himself, for his head was covered with blood and his hair. The boy all the time had thought himself was dead. So he had passed through a terrible trial, not her was he as tall or as broad or Federal. In fact he was of a dark brown and short, and his eyes however were really like a black.

"Where is general Federal, or is this your natural form general Federal?" asked the boy.
"Yes this is my natural form but general Federal is not killed to save the world but before," he replied. But I believe you (it because it is not necessary, but just now Federal is far away from his own headquarters. I make a good representation of Federal. It is I, I am dead.
"Believe you?" said the boy breathing easier. "I see now why so many christians believe you are dead." Dared he tell the like, he wanted the boy.
"It is an account of your own doing. He cleverly impersonated another person as evidence," he explained smiling. "I do not care to look like general Federal himself, and I therefore thought I would get rid of the disguise."
"It is a beautiful trick you played on me and the little girls," sorted the boy, and then remembering the little girls present he added "But of course I thought the little girls were too young to be tricked like that. They don't look like little girls who are so easily fooled."
"He smiles that the one later changed between the girls and the general filled the boy with embarrassment as he fell silent and attempted to collect his wits, leaving the others to do the talking. A little girl finally told the boy, who was really very kind, how they just did this to give him a trial as to his cleverness and a memory and how they planned secretly to find some boy and pretend him to be it or not, they admitted to him in just to as if the boy had enough spirit to do it or not, they admitted that they feared he would show the yellow streak, that then in case he had been a coward and they needed his help he may have fled at the first sign of real danger.

"You were quite right, most boys would," returned the boy. "I make it my rule to never perform any acts of a cowardice no matter what comes or what I have gone through for if I did I would always be disgraced. As your trick succeeded you know what kind of a boy I am."
"However now that you are aware of the fact I do not regret my action," said violet. "We are still within the glandelinian encampment and not near Federal at all for we could not get out, but now you must promise me and my sisters that after you go back to your own camp which is not far from here that you will come to us when we call. I put to not tell any one what we have done for you."
The boy thanked the ivian girls for their clever act and promised to remember their wish, that he should come as soon as called for and so with a good bye to the general and then, he took his departure, but with much regret as the children to go away from such beautiful girls but he had duties of his own to perform.

Gertrude Angelina and her two girl companions, having decided to try their skill upon the stranded boat asked the three boys to go and tell the glandelinian general and soldiers where to look for them and to have them get their own course from the shore of the river. They kept with them only little "Wild" Maxwell who was their new child pupil and knew how to adapt them in their efforts. When the four girls were alone, while the stranded boat, Gertrude said to Jennie, Mary:
"I will try to make the boat go by rowing a oar in that long piece of wood and make some saw you for best results. I'll row!"
"I'll be your oar," said Mary. "I'll carry an extra one hidden with me."

the last sound he heard was the whistling of the boat as it sped away over the water.

She showed to Gertrude her two best pistols and Gertrude nodded with witherful satisfaction. Gertrude had also brought her own boat gun. Jennie had now brought a large piece of wood which he intended to use as a paddle.

"This ought to do this the business all right," she said on confidently.

"Let's make a trial and see," replied Gertrude.

So the three girls entered the boat and at two of them seated themselves while Jennie tried the stick as a paddle. Twice the boat backed off the sandy beach, and on guiding it right Jennie made the boat turn its prow and then moved swiftly over the water.

"Very good, very good indeed," cried Angelina, "when the boat slowed up for a few minutes on or near the shore opposite from that whence they had departed. However Gertrude soon said:

"This paddle a little faster and have the boat carry us back to the opposite side of the shore, the shore from which we just emerged when you started to paddle. I see glandelinians approaching on this side. They must have seen us."

Jennie obeyed. As the boat shot through the water the girls were able to see on the side they were leaving the distant tree tops away from side to side mysteriously and the tree tops that joined their branches together over the main branches appeared to be full of men. The atmosphere that day was perfectly clear and the little girls could see the Angelinians on their own side of the shore. Moving through the water with much more slower than before the boat gradually approached the other side from which it had left before, and halted where the Christian soldiers were grouped. From the fact of the men in the tree tops it was evident that the three girls and the boat had been spotted by rebels and it was also a mystery why the glandelinian soldiers had not opened fire. It was also evident to the four girls that it would be impossible to even so scout up and down the river unless the region was cleared of glandelinian soldiers. How far extended was the stream into the enemy's lines? Neither of them knew.

"I'm afraid," said Angelina, "I wish regretfully that we can't dare scout down the river after all. We might be shot at from ambush and be killed in cold blood. The only way we could do it is at night, and neither can the Calverinian army be saved unless our generals can discover a way to find to surround or drive out the rebel army."

"There is only one way into the main recesses of these woods known to Federal," replied Gertrude. "General Hanson may be sooner or later able to discover what it is, but that will require time. Let us go back to our companions."

"But it seems a shame after we have been able to control the boat to be balked just by a swarm of glandelinians among the tree tops," grumbled Angelina, "I see. As Jennie continued to paddle the boat sped on until it was very close to the shore of safety. Many strange faces could still be seen from the tree tops in the distance across the stream, eagerly watching the boatload of children, and in one place several soldiers were aiming their rifles, for no doubt they quickly recognized the girls as spies. Gertrude saw them aiming at her and her friends and seeing it was the only way to prevent themselves from being shot, quickly dived from the boat into the river. At this the glandelinians shouted and yelled and those who fired shots missed and did only strike the sides of the boat.

The voices of the glandelinians however could not be made out distinctly on account of the distance. Some of the Angelinian soldiers came to the rescue of the girls and Gertrude and her companions understood from this that the Angelinians had seen the commotion and had appeared. The four girls smiling despite their excitement reached the banks while the Angelinians were covering them with shots at the enemy hidden in the tree tops and knowing they were in safety now the little girls felt they could take a little time they waited in order to effect their final plans.

Nothing more could be done just then, and on the glandelinians were firing at once ran to them, to ask if they had been hit or injured, and how many glandelinians had they seen on the opposite shore. The little girls all dripping wet told the soldiers and the generals also who now appeared of the obstacle they had met in the way of glandelinians firing on them from ambush, and how they would have to undertake another way to conquer the rebels.

Realizing it would require several days to succeed in scouting on the enemy as successfully as possible and liberating the civilian girls and the Calverinian army general Hanson sent a messenger to the main army to move immediately to the attack, and prepared a camp half way between the river shore, and the trees where the swipers had been seen. A number of the soldiers or mostly all of them had carried camp provisions and tents with them and all the tents when erected occupied had the banner belonging to the centerpoles, and one big tent, not now Gertrude Angelina and her girl friends had a tent to themselves. The generals were carefully hidden and guarded by twenty fully armed men. General Hanson, while the boy scouts had one of their own. Whenever it was real time, they ate a while standing up or sitting on the ground and as much complete arrangements as a possible made the scouting party just as a comfortable as they would have been in the first camp tents at the main camp. Far into the first night general Hanson and his brother and some of the other generals, sat in the tent studying a roll of scrolls and maps, and geographies in search of a way and a around about way into the open. He and they also made some experiments hoping to discover something that would enable a large attacking party to get Federal out into the open. Yet the morning found the powerful general still unsuccessful and although scouts came and told them the main army were close by awaiting further orders, if his generals could have been able to force any strong enemy out of an ordinary position no matter how it was guarded, but you must realize that Federal army was really ambush the largest army that may attack it through the main sections of the woods and that if an attack could have been made it would have no effect. The strong hidden positions that guarded Federal's main besieging army had probably been secured by Federal, for he was in possession of all hills, ravines, and everywhere else. The only way then it seemed to get Federal out, was to take possession of all high hills on one side of the woods, and place big batteries of cannon and shell the woods. If this could be done then no attack would be required to force Federal out into the open and free the Calverinian army. The next day the general and a greater number of men again went out on a long scouting tour, and they tried in various ways to find out Federal's positions, but had encounters with glandelinian dragoons nearly fifty times that day and lost over a thousand men and general Hanson himself was slightly wounded. After the last fierce attack had been made and repulsed by the Angelinian scouting party general Hanson said:

"We shall have to abandon this attempt I think. The easiest way to get Federal out of the woods is to take possession of the hills above it and to gain possession of other points and then place strong batteries and shell the rebels. It naturally occurred to me that the easiest way also to gain the rear of Federal's army is by sending half of my own army into the north end of the woods from which we received the attacks of various glandelinian scouting parties. But also there must also be also other ways to get at Federal's army and out him in two and such ways we must find by map study, and the proper kind of scouting parties. To-morrow I'll take out a greater number of men yet and resume the scouting."

"It won't be any easy," declared general Anderson, "for we must not forget, that general Darger understands considerable scouting work, and has doubtless tried to discover some way to find out how to enable the Calverinian army to escape and has failed."

"That is true," said general Hanson, "but general Darger is a clever scout, and also a great spy, while you also are a good scout and my other generals too. In this way all of us have a great deal of scouting experience to work with, and if we all should fail in our work it will be because general Federal has too many scouting parties out to none with and rebels' troops of those power and the none of us are acquainted with. We then therefore take week-by-week power as we guard so possession to accomplish our object in another way no matter how dangerous it may be."

"I can my dear friends, and will right gladly." Answered Gertrude. "Follow me please. Jennie, my nurse and your other friends are here also."

Gertrude gertrude indeed was puzzled indeed as to how the vivian girl got not wish to be questioned just now, and she made no remarks as she led the way to general Hanson's tent. With a courtly bow Gertrude ushered the vivian girls into His Excellency General Hanson's Avian.

General Hanson looked up from the work he was doing as his beautiful little wife entered, and something in their sudden appearance and manner led the General to rise and bow to them in his most dignified manner. "Islet and her sisters stand before him and waited for him to speak first."

"How ever you escaped from the bested Calvinian army I would like to know," said the general looking at them in the greatest surprise.

"It is a long story to tell," answered violet.

Then Hanson said:

Then Hanson asked:

"Not exactly," replied Violet.

"Not exactly," replied Solet modestly, "but it does seem as if we could place our skill to something like that the way we escaped from the besieged Galerian camp and then from the Gladiolians who pursued us..."

"I suppose you are aware that our monstrous armies are trying to do something to save them."

"We were not aware of that," was Jennie's reply. "We have heard of the approach of General Wiestler's army, but we did not know your army has reached this region yet."

General Hanson studied the little girl thoughtfully and then he said to the boy:
"The Galvarinian army is still imprisoned in the woods by Federal army for the whole of my generals are besieged by the whole of Federal and Galvarinian army. I and many Galvarinian army from capture or destruction. Can you little girls help me do this?"

"We do not know, for we have just had a trying time to escape, but we will try to assist you, Uncle Dear."

1141 "I'm scared," declared the general, "that General Federal derived most of his secret 1142 power from knowing apian lies was working for him. If I could only acquire any of 1143 those apian -- their might know what General Federal is planning to do, or give us
1144 information as to the nature of his campaign, I was about to plan another daring 1145 scouting expedition when you little girls arrived. I was about to plan another daring 1146 trip and find the rebel scouting parties and capture one of them and get them to tell 1147 what they know."
1148 "It might not be necessary," said one of the generals. "At least such a 1149 trip would be impossible."

possible. Violet and her sisters exchanged smiles now and then. "Air there isn't much a thing as can't," Violet said to the general.

"We are daring enough to do anything." "Admitted violet" even to commit suicide. It is not a sin."

"But who saved you little girls and how did you escape from the Galveston army and the glandelinians who looted the 1911?"

"I am sure certain young Jewish it is a long and interesting story on parchment to tell any one not even our own father," answered Jennie, "but this young boy accompanied us with General and was largely responsible for our safe release, and so General John Evans for him and the boys were brave and clever and we owe them our best gratitude."

General Hanson looked at the boy scout brigade who stood modestly behind the civilian girls, hat in hand.

"General Hanson declared, "For his helping you little folks he has helped us all and perhaps saved his Calverinian friends from being imprisoned so long as to be compelled to surrender to that wicked General Federal and his bandit army!"

The general now asked the sixteen girls who were bridesmaids to seat themselves, and very long talk followed, in which Penrod and the other boy shared.

"We are quite confident," said Angelina Ivanova, "that if we could get a secret force inside the woods at a hidden spot we could discover general Fedorov's weakest positions, for in all his work after we were imprisoned he used all his available batteries, and got strong positions which are hidden and form antiaircraft or any coming, but at attack him. He may have added other positions since he began the siege of the Galvintin Army, but the first were the foundations of all his military works."*****

"What means do you little girls suggest for our getting into the strangest recesses of the woods and discover Federal's weakest positions?" Inquired general Hanson

Woliet and her sisters hesitated to reply for they had not considered what could be done to reach the most safe and secret recesses of the woods and discover the exact point in the rebel lines. Therefore while Woliet and her sisters were in deep thought, and General Hanson and his other friends were quietly awaiting their suggestions into the tent crouched Gertrude Angeline and her girl friends, dragging a funny looking gaxdelindian soldier of small height who did not agree with them.

"Your Excellency," cried Gertrude, "Angelina and myself and Jennie had thought a way to find Free Federalists naps in the rear and while we were out on a scouting this fool attacked us. He looks f funnier than a c love."

re they were amused by the queer dress of the captured, Lindelminian soldier, wondered if even the main general and they themselves were un- warlike as yet solve the important problem of the besieged Calverlinian army, there was little hope for the other girl heroines to succeed.

the last sound he heard was the booming roar of the battle, the whistling of bullets, which he felt as they blew his head off.

General Russell Hunter Johnston followed General Henson and the rest across the stream, and when they were all across with him, he would have them wait until the rescue, then General Henson would lead the African girls to follow them and go to places of safety for it was possible the enemy may come across the river to follow up the populace. Finally after Violet and her sisters had told of their adventures in the camp of the besieged Galveston army, and Gertrude Angelle and her friends had told all about the rescue expeditions a serious consultation was held as to how the army under Federal could be made to go from the woods about waiting the time to go and attack Manley at Cramer Andrea.

"I've tried to think of many plans in my own power." Said General "Robert" Butgenor. Federal had used many different kind of plans which I do not understand and has made unusual positions which are hidden closely in the thick woods. He seems to have prepared his positions in such a way that the biggest surrounding alone of the woods and his positions is not easy to accomplish our own designs, and these would only bring dreadful attack on our own lines."

"That is a method that General Stanley taught him," declared Gertrude Angeline.

Gertrude Angeline, "I can do no more than follow out the latter plan." Continued general Robert
"I wish you my brother would try that your will power can accomplish lines of batteries on all the hills overlooking the woods, and to form strong lines of batteries and give Federal general battle."

"First then" said General Patton "let us generals near the hills, which the whole party of generals accompanied by some of the officers on horseback made at that time. On the summit of the best hills stood a few fortifications with abatis and other works in front of them. Interloped and found a most strong position, and batteries of great strength was placed. It was evident that someone had thought of this kind of a plan first and had already occupied that some of the hills.

"This I suppose is the only manner by which Federal can be forced to abandon the ridge of the Calaverasian army," said General Haines, "given," but the quickest move is needed by us and it must be unknown to the enemy or we will be fiercely attacked before all the work is fully accomplished."

The generals were carefully examining Wiener's positions, and soon general Oswald Buxton Johnston said:

[illegible]

"But how could he expect general Federal would dare attack such a well formed position?" Asked general Robert "Avian".
"Why the landmines?" said Avian.
"I see," said Robert "Avian". "It is a clever & contrivance, but won't work unless we take strong positions on the other hills besides."
"Another portion of his work," explained general Hannon "Avian". "In used to repel the assault of Federal's main army which may come in an extended line, a strong line has placed would be able to stop any strong force. The galling gun would a army his own force then with their fire, and the position could by a single command order army to places and probably drive his force from any position. Of course it does not mean that it could readily be accomplished however unless we take up our own positions as we planned."

short a time, without any knowledge" required general Robert Ayden. This the other generals could not yet explain. As nothing more could be learned from the night they observed they left the hills to go back to their own zone and General Hanson Ayden then also heard his generals how they could make quick movements and have strong positions on the rest of the hills and thus place Federal under a danger.

"I now raise the question," returned General "Well, mustn't mention" "that one of the arts positions and force impregnable such cascades of rifle pits and caissons and works, and I think that that explains how his position is so impregnable to be forced from the wood and would notice that on Federal right a big tearing line of gathering guns, one or facing all sections of his woods, and the guns are covered by sage brush so as to be hidden as much as possible and the centre of the line in that very passes through the main woods and extend into the plain itself. Perhaps the end of it may be concealed right near us and we don't see it. If Federal army is so firmly established in these woods General Federal if he saw us was about to be attacked could utter sing he earned to his artillery men by signals that would make the whole woods war with our artillery and bomb fire, and so tear that would make the whole woods pieces in no time and drive it out."

"I have yesterday found one specimen of his secret battery. It's just to the left of the main building like a long row of sawgrass brush, banana plants pointing to the right, wet by hands of humans than by nature. It had a form about like an enclosed battery, but not like a battery at all."

"I was looking in the direction of the general point of view, and I saw a man about like an enclosed photograph, said: "I'm quite sure indeed that in the upper end section of one of his hidden positions and that we are in it as it did not seem unusual when I first came here but did not pay my attention to anything like an alarm has been put in strength and out, you see, and the general point of view yesterday to go over near as they dared, and try to get them away from the brown men but so fierce was the fire they got that they could not approach it for a hundred feet."

the last sound he heard was the booming roar of the battle whistling of bullets, and the general was sure that he was going to be killed.

"It seems to be," said general Richard Kindermine, "that we have discovered in one way the answer in which general Hanson has forced his secret and hidden position. He has placed all kinds of batteries in every portion of the forest limits of the woods, and in the rear of his encircling army and he has even longed out his position to prove that his army is stronger than we would think it is."

"Just this!" said general Jack Evans, who had been ahead of the others of the scouting party with Hanson and had been searching and looking carefully around, and now noticed a slight hollow in the red position, near to where the heart of the rebel batteries stood. As he spoke general Evans rode forward several paces, and instantly a cannon was fired and a ball unheeded hit the horse being killed instantly. Instantly there was a confusion, and the rest of the soldiers sprang forward and assisted Evans to another horse. When the others retreated just as a number of guns boomed forth and a score of gladiolusians started in pursuit followed by hundreds of others. Some the woods seemed half filled with pursuing gladiolusian soldiers wearing green uniforms.

"They are the fierce guardians," said general Kindermine. "Go! Roelind, go with your gun, and then they are more dangerous than our own and they are those we know as Hobbesites. I wonder how they discovered we were spying on them, and where they obtained the gun they so suddenly fired upon us from that open position."

"There is no doubt," said general Hanson as he and the rest started taking away after exchanging some fierce volleys with the pursuers, "but this is in the main a concealed position of the enemy. If we only could think of some trick to play we could get Federal out of those woods in a hurry, and then we could all fall upon him with our armies."

"How can we discover a way to trick him?" asked general Robert Vivian, turning to general Hanson as he spoke.

"But we must now seriously consider as soon as we get back to our lines," answered general Hanson, Vivian.

All of them however though vigorously attacked by the pursuers managed to escape after a regular repulse, and within two hours were they were back in their own lines and all the generals were together with Violet and her sisters and the three girls holding another meeting. It however was a still, because the generals were thinking mostly and not speaking; that after a while one of the Vivian girls grew nervous. The little girl when excited could never keep still for very long and at the risk of displeasing her father and friends, and starting a quarrel with Naughty general Roswell Gustor Johnson Violet suddenly said:

"Well there is only one way I know of. General Federal a line his positions separated into three divisions, one at the north end of the woods, one in the middle, and one at the south portion. Three positions and they are separated by three small streams which run through the woods. Federal positions are made up of three positions, and each separated by streams. These alone are partially unprotected."

General Roswell Gustor Johnson frowned, Roswell Gustor Johnson, scowled at Violet and her sisters but general Hanson at first fiery angry looked wondering at the young girl, and general Johnston suddenly cried out:

"A good thought Violet dear even though you did interrupt our work. You may have solved our problem. We will see what we can do."

"I believe it is worth a trial," agreed Hanson Vivian. "It would be quite natural for Federal to be compelled to separate his positions on account of those three one hundred foot wide streams that his positions would be divided into three sections, and the suggestion of Violet seems like an inspiration."

"The others also approved the trial but general Roswell Gustor Johnson said: 'We must be careful not to use the wrong scouting parties or send them into unnecessary danger. The main thing, you know, if Violet's idea is correct, is to hit upon the right position she mentioned and find a way to move and attack him without our armies being infatuated.'"

"Let us experiment," suggested general Richard Kindermine.

General Hanson then summoned his best Gladiolusian spies and mounting his horse, asked several of his generals to follow and they again rode out and after three hours riding once to one of the streams the little girl mentioned. They remained out there even until late at night and were not out to go back when they were attracted by a certain light in the distant woods which instantly glowed fiery red, and tumbled about the woods with astonishing energy.

while the light still glowed red general Hanson Vivian noticed that it was from a section of the swampy position across the stream and then was surprised to hear a distinct and distant voice call out:

"Go!"

The generals waited motionless to see what would happen. There was a strange grating noise, something like the whir of machinery, then there was a terrific "bang" right above them and the generals and their small party was showered by a perfect rain of falling leaves and branches of trees. General Hanson rushed to the rear followed by the others.

"The gladiolusians are firing on us," he exclaimed. "The gladiolusians also are firing after us on horseback. Be careful men and do not expose yourselves!"

"We have made a mistake," said general Robert Vivian gloomily. "The gladiolusian artillery men saw us."

"But this incident shows that we are on the right track," declared Richard Kindermine. "We know now that on each of the rivers divide Federal positions in the rear sections."

"At what did that strange word 'Go!' mean?" asked Evans.

"Go was a signal signal to fire I suppose because the shell exploded right after that, and it is probable that the gladiolusians then rushed at us," suggested Hanson. "So the 'go' the last part of our important work is finished. The main thing now is to get off without a fatal encounter with our pursuers."

"Let us try that as hard as possible then," proposed general Robert Vivian. "They now rode at breakneck speed soon arriving from the edge of the woods, then instantly the ground trembled as if there was an earthquake, and there was a weird booming noise, followed by an ear-splitting crash, and a number of shells exploded exploded all about the fugitives. It reminded a wonderful escape for no one was injured though they were drenched by the noise."

"We are close to our own positions," now, exclaimed general Robert Vivian.

"That is because we ran our horses like the wind," explained his brother general Hanson Vivian.

They could hear the Angelolusians cheering in lustily in the engagements and they realized that the pursuers had given up.

"Come," said general Jack Evans eagerly. "Let us gather our armies and attack the rebels."

"Not just yet," returned general Hanson a happy smile upon his lovely handsome face for he was so overjoyed at the success at discovering Federal's most important weak points. "First let us take possession of the hills with our own batteries and come and then we will use them as our covering fire."

"It did not take many more days to do this work and soon from all the hills towering above the woods and Federal positions batteries extended from north to south, and west to east."

"Now," said general Hanson Vivian. "We can get our armies to the hill tops, and also have our positions on the foot of the hills and after we have recovered the congratulation of our friends and the one of our reconnoitering we can go on and make the decisive attack upon general Federal's Federal army."

Across from his headquarters, general Hanson Vivian saw Gertrude Angelolus her two friends and the Vivian girls waving him a welcome.

Of course of course all those who had joined general Hanson's grand scouting parties at once crossed the camps grounds to the main interior where they warmly welcomed the general himself and his followers. Before all the concourse of soldiers who were able to hear general Hanson Vivian made a speech from the top of a high stump and demanded that in all they do to fight hard, and promise to obey all the advice and orders of their commanders. In return he agreed to lead them as he always wanted to do and that his purpose was to ruin Federal's plans and save the besieged Gladiolusian army.

He planned the vast assemblage of Angelolusian soldiers and officers greatly, and when general Hanson told them they might select general Jack Evans to be commander of the centre of his own line of battle they cheered as soldiers as soldiers had never cheered before. For the main commander of his right general Hanson selected general Baldwin, for other generals had told of his good judgment, faithfulness and cleverness, and all the Angelolusians approved the appointment.

"I'm glad we came when we did," said Hanson. "For I not only prevented the Mandelins from capturing the Calvinian army, but we have forced Federal's army out of the woods without any bloodshed. Which proves that it is always wise to do ones duty, however unpleasant that duty may be."

Accordingly dangerous, different sort of person was General Posner. He was a son of general nobility, his oldest friends and his companion on the war was an adventure and a fierce fighter also, his nature however was unusually severe, he was not at all naturally kind to the vryian pliers, because he was jealous of them and of their position and would therefore have nothing to do with them unless he had to, and had not allowed them to go within his own encampments unless they had proper permission to do so, he knew they were evidently his superiors however because they were the daughters of general vryian but he did not let that bother him, and once or twice they threatened to see that he was removed from his command and did not do so out of pity and remorse. General Walter starring was another head of the pillar of general vryian's council. He was a native born, landless but he devoted the Angulian cause and had been made a vryian on account of his bravery, honest, honest and good nature and was also a friend of the vryian pliers. He was a good friend of all the little children he knew or did not know, and he would only fight the landless like a fiend, but he was a good toy, a marker and a famous famous spy and scout. General Helyvryian was another member of the vryian council. He was the most splendidly uniformed Angulian general of the war, besides those who not only a desperate fighter, and almost then, but also noted for his big nose.

the last sound he heard was the booming roar of the battle. He was watching the battle from a hillside of smoke blown by the wind. He was watching the battle from a hillside of smoke blown by the wind. He was watching the battle from a hillside of smoke blown by the wind.

His long tailed uniform coat was of purple velvet, his vest of purple satin, and his yellow trousers of finest silk. He carried a golden billed sabre, and a high silk purple soldier hat. All of the magnificence of his uniform were represented in his rich attire so it usually fired ones eyes to look at him for long, until one became used to his splendour. He however was not haughty, or so proud, was a good and loving friend of the Calverinian army, and knew them long. There were many others generals at his council too many to mention mention here but general Charles Brown himself was the most important man in the Calverinian army. He was a very tall man, and not only vast, but big in power, and intelligence and second only to the Calverinian in all the military art, and intelligence. These three generals were the only ones outside of some others like Calverinian Calverinian, which the enemy dreaded the most. General Charles Brown was not exactly handsome, but he was pleasant to look at though he was gruff. There was always a merry twinkle in his eyes and he was a spy as a school boy. Many others which here are too many to be mentioned were assembled, with the Calverinian and Charles Brown a general Robert Calverinian headquarters room right after dinner that afternoon, and general Calverinian who acted as spokesman first told all he knew of the plight of the Calverinian army, and of the Calverinian and their friends.

"Of course we must smash general Federal and rescue the Calverinian army and the Calverinian girls," he continued. "At the moment the rebels are routed and the Calverinian army rescued the better pleased they will be but what we all must now determine is how they can be saved. That is why I wished to have you all meet together in council."

"The easiest way," remarked general Walter Clarring "is to raise again with federal army at every quarter and to capture his whole army."

"Tell me how," said general Robert Calverinian.

"I don't know any other way than to move our armies in different directions at once against Federal, for I see no other way."

"We might get around Federal's rear and crush his lines," suggested general Calverinian.

"I cannot crush his lines when it is impossible to surprise his rear," asked general Calverinian.

"I couldn't make a force forced march during the night with one quarter of the army around his rear and pull the other armies forward from three different directions!" declared general Jack Evans.

"Why not mass all our artillery upon Federal's whole line and pump a perfect storm of shells fire and grape and canister upon the rebel army," suggested general Brown Baldwin with a laugh.

"I can be so sensible," pleaded general Robert Calverinian. "This is a very serious matter and we must give it very serious thought."

"How big is the general Federal's army, and how big is his position, and what is the size of the Calverinian army," was general Charles Brown next next question.

"One of us can't really tell, for we have not yet seen it fully, or been there."

"In that case said general Jack Evans "It appears to me grow loudly that we ought to make a general scouting tour or a reconnaissance and examine the rebel positions carefully before we make our plans of attack."

"Quite right," agreed general Oswald Calverinian.

"If we want to defeat Federal's plan we will have to go against his almost immediately for he is a man who won't wait but will make a general attack upon the Calverinian and destroy its army," remarked general Calverinian.

"The question is which of us shall go on the scouting tour in general, and how many of us generals, and how many men will we need?" asked general Hammon Calverinian.

"I shall go of course," declared general Ambrose Evans.

"And I," said general Surpase.

"It is my duty to general Robert Calverinian and as a country to go also," asserted general Oswald Calverinian.

"I could not stay away or back out knowing our friends are in danger," said general Hammon Calverinian.

"I all feel like that," general Calverinian said.

Finally one and all the generals present decided to go to the region of Federal's Calverinian army, with general Hammon and his brother to lead them. They must at first make a great scouting tour in thousands of numbers in order to find out how to conquer Federal's army and all these skillful generals were very busy to insure the success of the expedition. They were all ready to start at a moments notice for none had any affairs of importance to attend to. General Jack Evans was wearing a newly made snake hat and looked quite happy.

"It is probably quite a dangerous and long journey to make the so outing tour in general, and while we might travel quickly to the dwellings of general Federal's army by some of our horses we could be not upon by rebel spies and scouting parties and the skirmishes ensuing, warn the main body of the enemy. So we must keep together, and we will plan to move this very night."

Angelina with her sister Gertrude Angelina and Jennie Turner when they heard of the planned rescue expedition begged the main generals to permit them to join in a scouting party and after a while general Calverinian consented. The little girl friends of Joel and her sisters known as Eva St. Clare also wanted to go and to this none of the generals made any objections. This little girl was a curious one and though not the same child resembled each to the Calverinian girls the little Eva mentioned in the book of Uncle Tom's Cabin. Other additions to the party of scouting troopers were made the following hour, just as they were setting out upon their journey. The first was a little girl called Angelina Jennings. She was a fine little girl, well mannered and good humored but who had only one fault. She was constantly getting reckless and was like a lion in bravery though a small child to be sure she would escape all perils without a scratch, but when she did her reckless deeds her friends could not help being anxious about her.

"One day," related Gertrude Angelina "she went full through her reckless stunts and that will be the last of her."

But that did not worry Angelina Jennings, who was so careless that she did not seem to break the habit or be able to break the habit of recklessness. The second addition to the party was a little girl called Mildred Mildred Maxwell about Angelina's richness and height. She was often called "Maxwell the girl" because despite all the perils she went through good fortune always followed her wherever she went. She and the Calverinian girls and others were close friends although of such different natures, and Gertrude Angelina and Angelina Jennings, and also Jennie Turner were fond of both. The third and last to join the expedition was Francis Gillian one of general Jack Evans' best friends. He always seemed to be afraid of the enemy for everytime she saw rebels approaching her little heart would thump wildly against her ribs, but all who knew her however knew that her fears even which she really had were coupled with bravery and that however much she might be afraid of the Calverinian she possessed courage to meet every danger she happened to encounter. Often she had saved many child slaves from the enemy and once or twice had saved the Calverinian girls in time of peril, but afterwards she cried and wept and shook like a leaf because she had been scared nevertheless.

"If Joel and her sisters needs help, I'm going to help her too then too," said the child. "Also I suspect the rest of you may need me for company on the journey—for you all may pass through a dangerous part of the country. I know general Federal's gladiators pretty well. And the forests of Min-go-lesters is known to harbor many ferocious Calverinian animals hidden in security or ambush."

They were all glad to have the little girl join them and so in good spirits the entire party of generals followed by 10,000 soldiers all mounted and well armed, formed a procession and marched out of their camps, amid the shout of the numerous soldiers cheering the company's streets, who wished their general success, and a safe return of the Calverinian girls. They followed a different route from that taken by similar scouting parties and spies, for they went through the region where they could pass between the Winkle Calverinian know known here and the army under Federal and heard general Ogochoo Calverinian army. But before they got there they were forced to turn left, and entered the great Min-go-lesters woods, the nearest thing to a wilderness in Calverinian or Calverinian too, and one of the most beautiful woods in the world. The generals had to admit that certain parts of this forest were unknown to them, although they had often wandered among the trees. The main section of the forest was only reached after a tedious ride on horseback and each of the scouts had to look in every direction for fear hidden animals might rush out and cause a skirmish.

the last sound he heard was the booming roar of the cannon whirlwind of battle was a smoke blown by the cannon fire and the smoke was a sight to see when they entered the forest, several rebels who had been the leaders there were no anymore here for the horses and so they all had to dismount and hiding their horses proceeded cautiously on foot and Hanson Vivian who was practiced in wood craft preceded on ahead of the others the whole party going in a swarm and whispering their way in and out, the others following in silence. There were all kinds of dangers in a forest infested by unseen rebel armies but as the generals and the men handed the party and protected the girls they managed by their cautious caution to keep rebels from molesting them. Once to be sure two rebel men saw the scouting party but instead of firing on any one vanished out of sight among the trees, when one glandelinians fired a shot at one of the men.

"Are you hurt?" Angeline asked anxiously.
"Oh silly indeed," exclaimed the soldier in a sort of irritated voice. "It not even touched but just the same I'm annoyed at that rebel's impudence. He has no respect for beautiful children or intelligence."
"Hush!" said Gertrude Angeline. "I'm sure he won't do it again."

They were almost in the centre of the forest when Angeline suddenly said:
"Why there are lots of rebels over yonder. Be careful."
The whole party halted and looked around them. To their surprise and alarm Angeline Jennings was not with the big party. "Dear me!" remarked Jennie Turner. "I expect she went a far ahead and got captured by the enemy or is lost!"

"When did you last see her, Jennie?" Enquired general Kinsbourne.
"It was some time ago," replied Turner. "He was trailing along far in the rear, looking in every direction for the enemy. Then I went forward to talk a little to Angeline and Gertrude and just now I noticed she was gone."
"This is too bad," declared general Hanson Vivian. "For it is sure now to delay us on our work. We must find Angeline Jennings before we can go any further, for this forest is full of glandelinian scouting parties that would not hesitate to make short work of little girls and boys and cut them to pieces."

"But what shall we do?" asked general Sorpes. "If any one of us is sure to leave the party to search for Angeline Jennings he or she, might fall a victim to glandelinian scouting parties, and if too many men leaves our column we will be too weak to protect ourselves."

"Angeline picked up Gertrude Angeline could go," suggested general. "owell master Johnston. The two girls are so spry and so quick that no glandelinians as are ever able to do that any harm as we have always seen."

General Hanson Vivian turned to his brother.
"Cannot we discover where Angeline Jennings is?" He asked.

"I think so," He replied.

In the meantime Gertrude Angeline and her two companions Jennie Turner and Angeline picked up had discovered where Angeline Jennings was. For there beneath a number of trees or behind one of them she stood. On several sides crouched a large number of rebels about thirty and all were firing in an effort to shoot her down.

"Goodness me," cried Gertrude, looking over Jennie's shoulder. "Those glandelinians will catch and kill her sure."
"Every one now crowded around for a glimpse and many of the soldiers came running up, prepared for action."

"Pretty bad, pretty bad," said Gertrude sorrowfully.

"Dames of getting too reckless," said Jennie Turner fighting.

"And I guess she is a gunner," said Angeline picked up, wiping her eyes on her white handkerchief.

"But how many glandelinians are besieging her? Can't our soldiers save her?" asked Maxwell.

"If we knew how to get to her without the rebels seeing us we could probably save her," replied Gertrude. "At the tree she is hiding behind or between looks no much like the other trees, that we cannot tell how far away it is or how near. Maybe our pistols will reach the range and maybe not."

"Look at Angeline picked up," exclaimed Jennie Turner.

Angeline picked up had stepped forward about sixteen paces and having drawn Angeline Jennings' attention to her by making strange a pass with her outstretched arms, began to shoot from her own place of concealment at the astonished glandelinians. Most of the soldiers and the others who watched Angeline picked up anxious eyes, despair giving way to the hope that she might yet be able to save their friend. No now what they saw was more stranger than Angeline picked up's action.
First of the glandelinians started to spring forward but picked up fired six times in quick succession and the six glandelinians lay dead on the ground. Some more glandelinians moved forward but fell, and one of them having been caught by something seemed unable to lift his feet from the ground and Angeline picked up looked him too. The rebel had pulled first with his hands and Angeline picked up then another with his hands and finding himself confined by some natural trap and he fell. They could not hear the sound of the cursing and swearing, but they could hear the shots of the other rebels, and of Jennings' cries for help, and they could see the glandelinians moving forward. Many of the soldiers now started forward to go to the assistance of Angeline picked up and now Angeline Jennings seeing she was about to be rescued and seeing some of her nearest enemies hot soon began to struggle her enemies. Suddenly, with a mischievous smile upon her face, then she deliberately shot one of the glandelinians in the head and then seeing she was out of ammunition retreated until a lonely pursued.

Then she took up a fallen branch of a tree and gave some of the rebels who gained upon her a good whacking in their faces. The glandelinians were furious at such treatment received from a little girl but as the soldiers came swarming forward to her rescue they had to retreat but that they fired a volley in effort to shoot her down but failed. When seeing she was saved the little girl threw down the stick and with her hands in her pockets went with the soldiers or followed them to where the others were waiting for her.

"Said Gertrude. Angeline picked up go and tell the soldiers to make haste and bring her here."

Angeline picked up obeyed and darted away being quickly lost out of sight.
Those who cared to do so to rest sat down to await her coming. It was not long before she and Angeline picked up appeared with her rescuing soldiers through the trees and as she rejoined her friends she said in almost a peevish tone:

"I don't ever send Angeline picked up after me again. He was certainly impudent and if she was not a friend of mine, I'd say she isn't intimidated."

Gertrude Angeline turned upon her severely.

"You have caused us all much worry and anxiety and annoyance," said she.
"Angeline picked up had a good reason for scolding you. Only her clever shots saved you from destruction by the glandelinians. I forbid you to leave our company again. If you do so you will never be allowed to accompany us on a journey or scouting tour again.
Now remember."

"Of course I remember," he answered. "If it was not my fault that the glandelinians attacked me. I got lost."

"Tell you remain close to us and you won't become lost," said Angeline picked up.
"You for one are altogether too reckless. I'll tell Violet and her sisters about this as soon as we rescue them."

He thought again of some one walking toward him and quickly picking up a stick to brandish. He was about to strike when up to his full view in the moonlight a beautiful child herself toward him and had a drawn pistol in her hand pointed directly at him. Another little girl then followed and a moment later five more appeared on benches the other and while the first one covered him the others looked at him curiously and almost reproachfully. Indeed all of the little girls standing in a row looked very whistling bullet, and the next moment he was dead.

so Brigande took the paper which the girl handed to him and taking it to the edge of the stream he soaked it well and then he went to the shore where the girls were and laid it down flat—the five comrades of Brigande was at were still asleep and knew nothing of the presence of the three girls or what strange happenings were taking place about the river. He had dipped the paper into the river holding it fast until it was completely soaked with water. When as the little girls looked it over and nodded with approval he said to them:

"I'll take this paper along with us," remarked the smallest girl. "We'll all take one thousand a step to the north, along the edge of the stream, and then we will find a large path leading through the woods, up hill and down down vale, but where an enemy encampment is in plain view. We will all follow the path until we come to a cottage which is painted a red yellow color with green trimmings. When we stop at the gate of this isolated place we will tell you what we wish to do next. We all must be careful above all things not to stumble into view of rebel scouting parties, or we would meet a fire from them that would destroy all of us, and all we are trying or going to do will be in vain." The little girls in issued these commands and the boy himself promised to be careful and started to follow them. He left his sleeping comrades in the woods, and followed the girls who walked cautiously northward. When they all looked for the hidden path and its strong moonlight was so bright, that they easily discovered it, although it happened to be hidden from view by the wide wedge of tall tall trees and woods until one came fully upon it. The path was very broad but did not seem to be much used by infantry mostly by cavalry for countless hoof prints were distinct and they had no difficulty in following following it through the woods. Then the woods for nearly a mile ended and there was a stretch of large meadows, but which were covered with encampments, but their advance was hidden by tall grass and woods and the rebels did not see them, as the party of girls and one boy proceeded up and down hill and then up another hill and down again. It seemed to the boy they all had walked miles and miles and yet the distant enemy did not molest them. Indeed the moon itself sank low, and day was now beginning to dawn, when finally they discovered by the roadside, in the woods a little way a large and pretty cott cottage, but half in ruins, and painted just exactly as the girl girls had described. It however seemed to be a very lonely place—no other buildings were anywhere not even a sign of a camp of either side, and not even was the ground free from tall grass and woods, and trees. Who indeed would care to dwell in such an isolated place.

But the boy did not care to bother his head long with such questions. As he and the girls went up to the gate that led to the large cottage in the woods, he asked us the girls halted for a moment:

"What shall we do next my girl friends?"

Then general Hanson and his large scouting party, with Gertrude Angeline and her girl friends and other followers in this daring expedition came in sight of one section of general Federal's monstrous armies, the foremost camps were army to the right of them, for the route they had taken through the great Mc-Holleston woods was some distance from that in which the vivian girls had taken when they came upon the Calvinian army. They halted a little while to decide whether they should inspect this portion of the Calvinian camp Glandelinian camp first, or go on to the other section and see if they could get a view of the Calvinian army itself.

"If we try to get too near the main section of the dreaded rebel line our whole force may get into trouble with the wicked Glandelinians, and then if we met disaster half of our force was slaughtered we would be delayed in our purpose and fail to rescue the Calvinian armies and not be able to rescue the Vivian girls," said general Undermine. "So I think our best plan will be to go to another section of the rebel line which seems the smallest and set, discover how they are doing there have our armies attack that part and save the Calvinian and the imprisoned vivian girls. Afterwards we can attend to general Federal's army in general and punish the cruel Glandelinians."

"That seems sensible," said general Jacob Baldwin. "I quite agree with you." Then general Undermine himself descended it, as on the whole plan unthebest, and general fifty general launched with the children between them going to the thickest wood and trees that had other sections of the Glandelinian army from view. Pretty soon they came to a ending of the woods and approached what seemed to be a large plain plain. The parts of the woods were trees were grown closely together, the branches, which even the like were so tightly interlaced that even a small little kitten could scarcely find a place to squeeze through. He path which they had intended to use was some strict paths made by the sheep.

"There is a job for a hundred of the soldiers," said general Undermine. "The soldiers are then who had axes, and who no doubt were glad to be of use, and in a surprisingly short time had chopped away enough branches and other twigs to permit the whole column to pass easily through the trees. As the distant main hidden behind trees and twigs and bushes they could see far away beyond the rebel lines the outlines of the Calvinian positions, and further off their camps, far as doubt beyond the Glandelinian encampments, and directly as it seemed in the front of the surrounding Glandelinian army. Of course every eye was at first fixed upon these two vast encampments, where no doubt they knew that first or last they were still fast prisoners. But soon their attention was caught by a more brilliant sight, for here was a column of Glandelinian cavalry coming toward them but they halted before the hiding place and did not dismount.

"These Glandelinian cavalry men," said general Undermine, "are Gargoylians but should as they are not wearing their strange garb. But I can tell those men by their horses."

"They wear wonderfully beautiful uniforms now," remarked one of the girls. "It does not seem like they were Gargoylians."

"Those Glandelinians," said Gertrude. "Those Glandelinians ought to be heads."

"I'm sure, those Glandelinians are scents," said general Hanson to one of his generals, "or they are great in numbers and they may be splendid or something for we approached us you know."

Let some of our men go as close to them as possible and hear what those Gargoylians may be saying. Proposed general Undermine.

General Hanson looked to one of his privates who were nearest him, and he they came told them what he wished and they therefore did so. As soon as a soldier got as near as they dared they heard one of the Gargoylian captains always harsh and unpleasant—and said with such pride:

"Who would admire those vivian girls? Admire the vivian girls just because they are the handsomest little girls in the world. Admire them. After they have proved our cause to be the worse of enemies never!"

"Vivian girls really as dangerous as many say!" replied the other aptian captain. "Are dangerous? But do they not do but go spy on our armies and give information?"

"Are you forgotten though that they are Princesses of Angelina, and though we are enemies, they have as much right to do to us as we have to them. Have you not got on that most of us rebels fight and destroy children and more than that thing else to gain our end?"

"Inquired a lieutenant. "Child slaughter—destruction of childhood. Behave, who cares about such silly things?"

"Retorted the captain. "For my part this war and rebellion only seems as an unpleasant thing. And I would not give it up if I could. If you love me no crazy and want to admire the beauty of those dratted dungeoned girls why don't you go and capture them?"

the last sound he heard was the booming roar of the battle, the whistling of bullets, the hiss of smoke blown by the wind. He gave a sigh that could have been heard by the angels. He was in a position to be killed.

"Tell us Captain Aronburger," said the other captain earnestly. "If you can recall through wise plans to enable any of us to capture the vivian girls who are in the surrounded Calverinian army encampments. Tell us that, (get your hat) and I will give you a bag of paper money and another bag full of gold coins as a reward." "Nothing can enter the Calverinian army, and it is the most dangerous thing in the world to do so."

"But how can we trick the vivian girls and lead them into an ambush?" "I don't know! I don't care! If I ever know how I have forgotten, and I'm glad of it as I for one do not wish to do anything rash." As the response, "Just watch out for prying Christian scouting parties and we are doing enough." "It's no use," said Hanson himself when he saw the Gargoyls in a caverly riding army. "The old Gargoyls are too crafty to enable us to get any my nearer the escape of the glandelinian armies."

"That's a fact," agreed general kindermine with a sigh. "But we have got to get the Calverinian army free, somehow or other and if possible capture Federal army leaders."

"I'd we must do it in our own way," added general Roosevelt just as Johnston. "We will have to surround the rebel army and keep an adroit attack upon it until it is a depleted it will have to surrender."

"But how indeed?" asked general Robert Vivian in a very grave voice; for he could not bear to thin of his daughters in danger of sharing the fate of the Calverinian army. "How shall we do it?" "If we surround the rebels they will signal to Manley to come to their rescue and then we too will be besieged."

"Leave that to general Hanson, Vivian," advised general Jack Evans realizing he himself was helpless to make any wise plans himself.

"If this region was an ordinary country side and not so full of dense woods and high-foot hills," said general Hanson Vivian, "there would be several ways by which I might bring general Raymond Richardson Federal to speedy terms. But this is a thickly wooded region, and by some curious trick of his own unknown to any one but general himself he has secured positions in these woods that no army no matter how great can even get at him to make an attack. I do not despair in the least but it will require some deep study to solve this difficult problem. If we only had some of our best spies with us we could have something done but that luck we have not with us. To get Federal out of here so we can attack him we will have to do some trick to outwit him."

"It seems to me," said general Evans after some thought and after some brief silence had followed general Hanson's speech. "That there are among us three famous girls, and spies in the world. If we could induce those girls to go into the rebel lines and try to trick the rebel generals we could doubtless find some means to get at Federal and save the Calverinian army from a disgraceful end."

"I have thought of those three girls," replied Hanson. "But among so many boy and girls scouts as we have how are we going to get them to go, they are independent and will do nothing unless asked by Violet and her sisters themselves."

"You will understand of course, that had general Hanson been watching more closely he would have known that the vivian girls had by some move of their own during the night before managed to get out of the Calverinian army, and through the rebel lines unseen and had met a boy scout and had led him to a little cottage and where they were making up something to trick Federal themselves. But that act had not been noticed and so it was all unknown to him."

"I think I see a strange boat floating near us on that river," said one of the girls maybe Angeline, pointing to a place near the shore of the river. "If we three girls could get that boat and row up and down the stream, we might be able to locate Violet and her sisters..."

"Let us go to the boat," said Jennie Turner. As Gertrude and Mildred Maxwell also consented they went for the craft. They walked along the shore of the river to where they had seen the boat stranded on the beach of the river, but found it empty, even without a single oar. It was a mere shell of painted woodwork, with a collapsible looking roof, that made it appear as if the boat had been some kind of a submarine. The roof at present resting strangely in slots on either side of the strange craft. Looking inside they saw it was operated by a gasoline engine and was armed with small guns on both bows. There were neither oars or sails only the a machinery to make the boat go. And although the little girls promptly realized the boat was meant to be operated by a gasoline engine, they tried it and found the machine unbroken and the gasoline gone.

"However," said Gertrude, "this boat is merely an armed gasoline launch and I believe if we get some stout flat sticks for oars we can make the boat work nearly as well as it did before its machine machinery was tampered with. After I have given a little thought to the matter, we can make the boat take us wherever we desire to go. The soldiers will follow along the shore to come to our aid in case we run into unseen perils."

"Only three girls can get in however as the boat won't hold four," returned Mildred Maxwell anxiously. "But Gertrude, provided you can operate the boat, of what use will it be to us?"

"We'll use it to row up and down the river, and have the troop of soldiers follow along the shore to protect us!" asked Jennie Turner.

"It will not be necessary to use the boat for any such purpose," replied Gertrude. "However hidden glandelinian may be on the other shore, they all not fire on us if we keep ourselves out of their reach. What I am discovering or trying to discover is how this strange boat came to be here on the shore, while it being a glandelinian craft, was ruined by the destruction of its engine. Did some one come on this side with this boat and then destroy the engine to prevent any one else from using it?"

"We could answer that question, but while they pondered the three young boy scouts in gray uniforms advanced from a small line of trees, and then rather timidly bowed to the Angeline girls.

"So are you three boys and where did you come from?" demanded Angeline, sharply.

"We are Calverinian boy scouts in disguise and here are the papers to prove it," answered one of them producing a slip of paper which he handed to Angeline. "And our tent and camp among the surrounded Calverinian army. We got away from the rebels last night though the glandelinian pursuers killed two of our comrades in the pursuit. We ran away when we saw you coming, thinking you were rebel scouts and hid behind the trees, but when we saw you are girls and as you girls seem to be very friendly we decided to meet you, for we boys are in great trouble and need assistance."

"If you three boys belong in the Calverinian army why are you here, and how did you get here?" required Gertrude.

They told her and the three other girls all the story; how they had been lost in the woods, and how they had kept in the night and how all day before they had been pursued by rebels and trailed by them but escaped, how when glandelinians came to the shore of the river, the five boys went in the boat with the disabled engine to escape and how the boat had been shot out into the river. Then followed the account of how the boat got under shell fire, how the engine had been damaged by the fragment of a shell, after which the boys had to abandon the boat and seek haven in the denser woods. The young boys told how in the night when they were kept their comrades Brigando had in some strange mysterious manner disappeared, how the boat which had been beached had been floated to the opposite shore and stranded where the girls found it. They told how when they crossed the stream by wading one of the glandelinians on the other side fired several shots and killed two of their comrades. That was all they knew. They had searched in vain for their comrades Bri Brigando. They were far from the big Calverinian army and they could not get back to it, the three boy scouts had no place to go and so had waited patiently beside their boat for something to happen. Being questioned by the three girls, they told all they knew about the situation of the Calverinian army, and of Violet and her sisters and declared that as far as they knew the seven vivian girls were still in the Calverinian camps. They were quite safe and would be and are being well cared for by the brave Calverinians Calverinians. Then they had gleaned all the information they could from the three boys, Gertrude said to Jennie Turner;

"If we can find a way to operate this boat we could have it return to the opposite shore, and we would be able to enter the woods on that side and investigate the Calverinian positions much easier. But I don't see that our going into such peril as that that would enable our girl friends to escape. We would only join them as

whistling of bullets, and the crash of bombs blown by the explosion of a mine. He had a faint idea that the Calverinians were still in the house, but he was too tired to think of anything else.

non-prisoners even share a much more worse fate."
"Not so," Gertrude said. "I replied Jennie Turner. "If we would go across in the boat we could also get away by our own crafty means and we could bring Violet and her sisters safely back with us."
"I leave the whole Calverinian army still imprisoned," asked one of the boys who spoke reproachfully.
"We are thinking of the Vivian girls first of all things and not the army, which is most cases is well able to take care of itself," said Jennie Turner.
"By making a quick trip through the woods and keep hidden at the same time we could probably get into the Calverinian army and find the Vivian girls," replied Angelina Lohse.
"At what could we do then?" Inquired the second boy scout. "You girls would find it utterly impossible to get out of the rebel positions and if you did you would be pursued so relentlessly that all of you would have to separate to get away and then maybe they would get you for you would be at the mercy of the enemy who would trail you with a thousand hundred bloodhounds."
"I believe true indeed," said Gertrude Angelina. "And as the Calverinians are also their friends Violet and her sisters I think would refuse to escape with us and leave the Calverinians behind, or abandon the encampments for they would feel they are deserters. I believe the best plan is what the generals are thinking of, and that will be to attack Federal immediately and force him out of the woods with his whole army and save the Calverinians."
Gertrude was right but the other girls looked around and noticing the nature of the woods and the hidden away positions seemed to think that her statement was rather a forlorn hope.
"How will the Christian armies get at Federal positions?" Angelina Lohse asked. "And how can the troops advance to the attack successfully, when every part of the woods may be a deadly ambush of artillery, musketry and bombs, and rifle fire?"
"That is something we must consider carefully," responded Angelina Lohse's friend Gertrude with a serene smile. "I think if you leave it to him general Hanson can find a way."
The other girls applauded this statement for they knew well the power of general Hanson Vivian.
"Very well," agreed Jennie Turner. "Let's see what we can do with the boat and you children go and tell the general of our plans so that he and his elders will know where we are and what we are doing and won't be anxious as to our safety."
"Must now return to the Calverinian boyscout Brigando, who when he and the Vivian girls had reached the gates of the strange cottage had asked of Violet;
"What next?"
Violet first looked carefully at the house, and then pointing toward the door said in her sweet voice;
"You see that door latch latch there? Well you are to lift it, open the door, and walk boldly into the door. Do not be afraid of any one or anything you may happen to see, for however you may be threatened, or what dangers you may face we ourselves will see to it that nothing or no one will harm you. This cottage is in possession of general Raymond, who is a Federal himself, who when alone wears all sorts of different uniforms, sometimes changing his uniform several times in one day, according to his fancy. What his best and even his real main uniform is us girls do not know. This general is so stern that he cannot be bribed with any treasures, or even coaxed through friendship, or won by pity as he is probably one of the wisest and bravest Calverinian generals ever living. He has never assailed anyone that he knows is his enemy, he has done a lot of wrong to us girls, and cause us fearful times as far as we know of. And all his powers are used for his own selfish ambitions instead for the benefit of his big Calverinian army. He may at first suspect you and order you out of the house, but you must show these papers I will give you and telling him you are sent by Manley will refuse to go. Remain and watch general Federal closely, and try to see what he is using to make his plans concerning the besieged army of Calverinians. If you can discover his plans, do not take it from him, for he will really miss it and cause a hue and cry which will cause your capture and our destruction. Just take this pencil which I also give you and a piece of paper you may find and copy what he had drawn. When you have done this whisper to me who will be hiding near by and we will then tell you what you should do to us he will be hiding near by and then we will tell you what you should do for us next."
"That sounds easy," returned Eric, and Brigando who had listened listened most carefully. "But are you sure he will not discover my true identification, or read my disguise, and try to shoot me down?"
"It is probable he may discover who you are and maybe not," replied Violet. "But do not worry if that happens, for we will be watching everything that is going on from our hiding place and we can break his attempts easily. You may be sure that nothing will harm you while we are here to protect you, so you must not be frightened at anything that you may see or hear."
Now Eric Brigando was as brave as any ordinary boy so out or open man, and he knew that the little girls who spoke to him were truthful and also to be relied upon nevertheless he experienced a sinking of the heart when he took the papers she offered him and the lead pencil and approached the door of the strange cottage. He was surprised to see no guard to watch the house, but nevertheless his hand trembled as he raised the latch, but he was resolved to obey his instructions, not wishing to show the yellow streak in front of seven lovely little girls. He pushed the door open, took three strides into the middle of the first room he came to and then stood still and looked carefully around him. The sights that met his gaze were enough to frighten any brave man or boy who had not been properly warned. Gazing by a doorway leading probably to another room was a tall Calverinian soldier his eyes gleaming wickedly, armed with a long gun with a sharp bayonet. Around a large table sat a large group of Calverinian generals, fiercer looking men than the ugliest looking pirates. But the most startling thing was a huge and very tall looking man who sat in the middle at one side of the big table drawing a large plan on a big slip of paper. He wore a large round black hat such a girls wear, and a uniform fit to kill a king. It was of a blue gray color and the coat was covered in front with a swarm of brass and gold medals. His eyes were bright, and looked as if coals of fire were burning in them. He had a long dark beard, and his hair as black, and so were his eyes. He moved and spoke, and acted as an ordinary private would have and on Brigando's entrance he and all the generals raised their heads to look at him.
"Get out of here kid," cried a sharp voice, coming from the ugly looking man who was guarding the door.
Brigando saw not far away from the table a small bench, just beyond him which was apparently empty, so he stepped over to it, sat down upon the bench, and then carefully looked outside of the wide window which was little above the bench to see if the Vivian girls were within sight.
"Get out of here kid do you hear," again cried the guard at the door.
"No," said the boy. "I have a mission from general Manley and I am going to stay, until I can see his Excellency general Raymond who is a Federal."
At this some of the officers got up from the table and walked toward the boy, and demanded him to show his papers to prove it. Brigando did so. He showed it and the general looked it over he grunted, and examined it and then looked closely at the boy but he did not vince. Another officer coming from the end of the table, approached Brigando and ordered him to allow himself to be searched for any thing they might make him a suspicious character, and the boy merely stared at the rebel generals as he obeyed. The examination being over the boy then resumed his seat on the bench. "All the generals after this, went back to the table and remained motionless though some of them talked to low tones to Federal, and the others looked as if they were awaiting orders.
The fierce black haired and whiskered general kept on drawing on his map or plan, not looking toward the boy now, and the young Calverinian boyscout steadily kept his seat. He expected something else to happen, but nothing did. Full hour passed, as one general after another got up and left the place, and Brigando was beginning to grow nervous.

the last sound he heard was the booming roar of the cannon. The whirl of battle, the smoke, the blood, the noise, the confusion, the chaos, the horror, the tragedy, the death, the destruction, the annihilation, the end of all things.

END PAGE SIXTY EIGHT.

"What do you want boy?" General Federal asked at last.

"Nothing," said the boy.

"You surely may have that," retorted the general and at that in the remaining generals and the guard in the room broke into a chorus of roaring laughter.

There was another long wait.

"Do you know who I am my lad?" questioned the general at last.

"You must be his Excellency General Raymond," said the boy.

"Glandelinian general of Manley's staff," Brigando answered politely.

"Knowing so much, you must also know that I do not like it when a strange boy enters my place without being ushered. Even your presence here now annoys me greatly when I'm so busy. So you not fear my anger at all?"

"No," said the boy.

"Do you intend to obey me now and leave this place?"

"No," replied the boy. "I have a message for you sent by General Manley." And he spoke just as quietly as the fierce general had spoken.

The general continued to draw a long time before resuming the conversation.

"Curiously," he said, "I made it to say a boy or a man, or a child. I suppose in some way you may be a disguised christian dog of a boy scout and have heard or learned that I am the worse glandelinian general of all, and do tricks of all kinds unknown to christian generals, and so through their own efforts or through curiosity you have come here. You may have been told that I do not injure any one unless my suspicions are correct, so you having no evidences against you are bold enough to disobey my commands to go away from here while the going is good. You also may imagine that you may witness some movements on my part that you may report to the christian generals or men may wish to steal some information from me, or that something I do may cause a you. Have I spoken truly?"

"Well," remarked Brigando who had been pondering on the strange circumstances of his coming here. "You are surely right in some ways, but perfectly wrong in others. I am not a spy, and neither am I a christian dog. I am told that you are a wonderful general, and that at you do all you can accomplish for your own amusement. That seems to me indeed very selfish. Few people understand generals and other officers of any army as I do. I'm told that you are the only general of all glandelinia who can fight and win the most treacherous battles. Why don't you assume a much better command than you have?"

"Just right have you boy to a question my actions?"

"None at all sir."

"And you say you are not here as a spy, or to demand any favors or informations of me but just to show to me a message sent by Manley?"

"For myself I want nothing from you. I have the message."

"You are wise in that my boy. I never grant favors nor do I allow myself to be tricked in case you are a spy."

"That does not worry me in the least," declared Brigando.

"But nevertheless you are very curious. You hope to witness something which I may do just the same?"

"If you wish to continue your drawing go ahead," said Brigando. "It may interest me and I am it may not, and I have plenty of time and can wait till you get done before I deliver the message to you. But if you would rather go on with your drawing until it is finished it is all the same to me. I'm in no hurry at all."

This may have puzzled General Federal, but his face so thickly covered with a black beard, hardly showed any expression. Perhaps in all his career, General Raymond, Glandelinian Federal, the most terrible glandelinian general of the lot, had never been visited by any one, who like this young Calvinian boy scout, asked for nothing, expected nothing, and seemed to have no reason for coming but to deliver a message.

This attitude practically disarmed the glandelinian general, and he began to regard the boy in a more friendly way. He continued drawing for some time, seemingly in deep thought, and then he arose and walked to a big cupboard that stood against the wall in the room. When the cupboard door was opened the Calvinian boy scout could indeed see a lot of small drawers inside--and into one of these drawers which he drew, he opened the third from the top--the general thrust in his hand and drew out some color crayons. Then the form of the general straightened up.

"Do you like to see a map drawn plainly or in colors?" the general inquired with a smile.

"I like better," replied the lad calmly. "But I'm not sure I could like it any better."

The fierce, looking glandelinian general then laughed loudly saying: "During the calm before the battle I like to make my plans in drawings as it is more interesting. But sometimes when I have nothing to do I like to color it as I'm fond of crayon and paint work."

Brigando noticed that in his right hand he had a collection of eight colored wax crayons. He went to the cupboard door and then going to the table sat down and proceeded to color his work.

"Here," the general cried. "Now the plan will present a more beautiful appearance. I love to color pictures and maps and the like, just like little child drawings do, but just the same I would like of them if I continued painting is too long."

"You are a clever and good artist," said Brigando pretending to praise him. "I did not think you could do such good color work. All you did was to rub the crayons like any child does."

"Oh do you think so indeed?" he replied. "Well try to color the map yourself, if you like and see if you can color as good as I can."

"No," said the boy. "I don't understand crayon color work, and if I did, I would not try to imitate your skill, and besides I'm likely to spoil your work. You are not only a wonderful general, but also a wonderful artist and map maker, while I'm only a Calvinian boy scout messenger."

His confession seemed to please the general, who though not at all haughty, or proud, yet nevertheless sometimes like to have his work and doings appreciated.

"Will you soon go away now and let me in peace?" he asked. "I prefer to be alone."

"I prefer to stay here until I delivered Manley's message," said Brigando.

"In another person's house, where you surely are not wanted!"

"In case of grave necessity yes!"

"Is not your curiosity yet satisfied?" demanded the general with a malicious smile.

"I don't know. Is there anything else you have to do before you want to read Manley's message?"

"Many things. Duties go before reading messages. But why should I be in a hurry to read a message and yet exhibit my powers and expert manship to a stranger?"

"I can think of no reason at all," he replied. "You know your Excellency I never asked you to do so."

General Federal looked at the boy who was curiously sizing him up from head to foot. "You are no spy you, say, you are now scout, and you want no information for yourself, and you are too stupid to be able to steal any of my military plans and secrets. This is a not a pretty cottage, it being half in ruins, while close by are my encampments full of fierce men, while outside are unshin, broad prairies and beautiful wildflowers and rivers. Yet just for the sake of an old message you insist on sitting on that old bench and annoying me with your unwelcome presence."

"I have you in the message!"

"Three folded up sheets of paper in a large envelope."

"Where did you get the message?"

"His Excellency handed them to me."

"Here is General Manley," asked Federal trying to trap the lad for fear he was a christian spy.

General Manley is stationed near Crosser's army, but is moving forward an army to you in capturing the Calvinian army."

"Where did you get this information?"

"I overheard it while spying on some christian dogs."

the last sound he heard was the booming roar of the battle.
The great glumelminian general arose from his chair, came over to the bench, and as the boy handed him the envelope he took out the papers and looked them over.
"It's a strange order," said he. "Stanley wants me to capture the vivian girls who are in the Calvinian army surrounded by my army. How did he know it?"
"I don't know," answered the boy.
"The vivian girls are pretty but orders are to be obeyed," said Federal.
"Let me send you and some of my boy scouts for the vivian girls."
"No," objected the Calvinian.
"I would love to make those little dare devils prisoners, for their capture would be interesting, and I have never yet captured those vivian girl spies in all my service in the glumelminian army."

"If you are wise you will let them alone," said Brigando.
"What makes you think that I'm afraid of them?" asked Federal.
"Noting but I advise you to let them alone."
"You are not a very pleasant visitor for your age," laughed general Federal. "Too ple, and the christian generals and the like accuse me of being cross, ill tempered, and crabbed and ferocious and even unsociable, and they are quite right at that. If you had come here pleading, and begging for things, and asking for favors, or been scared of my generals and my sentry, I would have cursed you and abused you until you ran away, but you are quite different from that. You are the unsociable and crabbed, and disagreeable one, so I like you indeed, and bear with your grumpiness. It's time for my breakfast, are you hungry boy?"
"I do not feel hungry," said Brigando, although he really desired food.
"Well, I am," the general declared. "I shall go to the kitchen. I usually have a number of men appeared and soon at Federal's order the big table was spread with linen and covered with dishes filled with various foods, some smoking hot. There were two plates laid one at each side of the table and as soon as Federal seated himself all who had still remained in the room went out.
"Come my boy scout stranger, sit down and eat," he called cheerfully, and while he was eating let's decide in what way to cause the capture of the vivian girls."
"They are all right as they are," asserted the boy, drawing up his bench to the table. "Those vivian girls are beautiful, and nothing that humiliate can compare them beautiful little dare devils."
"What do you think they are a lovely?" General Federal asked smiling at his serious face. "I think you are in love with them, your own enemies."
"I don't object to them that is one thing--especially for their heroism you know," he said helping himself to the food and eating with good appetite indeed.
"And don't you consider it a duty to capture those beautiful girls, no matter how beautiful they be when it is duty."
"Well," replied Brigando, after a period of thought "that might be. If we captured them it might please me as well as it would you. You won't be able to do that of course, because you can't with all your skill, or your boy scouts and soldiers.
And should you be able to do so, I fear your troubles would then be more than you could bear as they are little mad-caps and as dangerous as tiger tigresses. They would not consent to be taken prisoners as long as they have their weapons and ammunition--especially when they know they would receive help--and so they are at times almost impossible to be taken prisoners. So general Federal, let us not attempt to capture the vivian girls at all. It is too dangerous an undertaking."
The boy indeed had put his case with remarkable cleverness. He really realized that if he appeared anxious for such a work as he wished to accomplish, the general would become suspicious, and if not taking him prisoner may drive him out and make it impossible for him to discover anything, yet the boy had skillfully suggested that he wished to have a copy of the plan.

After the meal was over, and the glumelminian general had eaten all he could be called to the kitchen and they came and soon had the table cleared of everything.
"I wish you would consent to go and find the vivian girls," the general said as he started work on his plan which he had not finished yet.
The Calvinian boy scout replied. He surely thought it very unwise to try and hurry matters. All during the afternoon he sat very silent.

Once general Federal went to the strange cupboard and after thrusting in his hand, into another drawer took out a small box of paints and started working with that on the plan. He worked the general to the boys surprise away working with words to them--just as the best singer in the world had been carefully trained to do. Indeed the songs were interesting and the brave boy scout enjoyed listening to them. In an hour or so the general who the boy thought sat very quietly for a glumelminian general acted very queerly stopped singing but continued with his drawing but seemed thoughtful. Now the boy saw that Brigando had marked the size of the plan with his eyes and had concluded that the strange general had seen something else from it that enabled him to color the map or plan in a more picturesque if not beautiful way. He thought also that he himself could be able to escape it in case he could remain in the cottage, and the general fell a nap sleep asleep he could slily approach the table and with his pencil and paper revise the design of the plan and secure it himself. Indeed he had firmly resolved to carry out this plan when the chinkered man put down his color crayons, and walked to the door leading outside.
"I'm going out for a few minutes," said he. "Do you wish my lad to go with me, or will you remain here?"
The boy sat did not move a muscle but sat quite quietly on his bench. As the general went out and softly closed the door, as soon as he was gone, Brigando, rose up, tiptoed to the table and look at the plan.
"The boys take care," cried several girls' voices, coming from somewhere he could not at first make out. "If you touch anything you will be in danger."
The boy sat still, but remembering he need not consider the general's order if he succeeded in securing a duplicate copy, he was about to take out his paper and pencil, when he was arrested by the voices of children at one of the windows and which called out:
"Come here Brigando."
He went to the window and discovered two of the vivian girls under it.
"Let the plans alone," said Violet to him earnestly. "You could not succeed by stealing a duplicate for only Federal knows how to draw it and it would take you time. The best way is to allow him to send some boys after us as he suggests, or then we will be able to draw him away from the place and you may secure the real plans. You are already eating freely. We did not know you were so intelligent or that general Federal could be so easily deceived by you. Continue as you have been and try to persuade him to follower persecute us, but insist that you be left alone."
A little girl ducked her head down just as the general re-entered the cottage.
He joined the boy by the window but did not see anything.
"He were those girls you were talking of?" he asked.
"They are the vivian girls and they desire you to chase them," he replied. "For all of the vivian girls are very darling, just now I tried to detain two of them for they were asking me for bread. They are hungry and tired and had been pursued by some of your men already."
"Well they can have all they want to eat," said the general. "But it is nearly supper time and if you would allow me to have them brought in here they could join us at the table and have plenty of food much nicer than they had ever eaten before. Why not allow them in here?"
The boy thought this was strange speech from a general who hated the vivian girls, and he also wondered to himself, "Why is it the general acts so suspicious?"
"All the boy said, as if hesitating, "Go out and ask them. If they consent to be prisoners, why--why the n't I think it over."
The general again went outside and saw the girls standing near the place and asked to be let in a whisper:
"Can you understand your duty?"
"All of the little girls nodded their heads.
"I understand it all," said Violet saluting to the boys surprise for he knew that the vivian girls never saluted to a general before, and it looked suspicious. Were they really the vivian girls, or were they making game of him, were they rebel spies disguised as the vivian girls. "What was this mystery?"

the last scene he was in the possession of the...

"I want to ask you to do one other duty for me, or something; but your boy friend inside inside here, the party about doesn't wish to and think a I want to make you prisoners, however he has agreed to my supposed plan if you will consent. But come inside, and play the game before him and get his goat."

"The little girls did so and the eldest said:

"I would like to copy your plans on that table and bring it to general 'vian'."

"No, no don't do it," he exclaimed the boy. "It is dangerous."

"If you promise to allow us to have just one copy we would like to do it," said Angelina.

"No, no be careful please, you will make trouble," exclaimed the boy scout again.

"Let us have some of the crayons," said Joyce 'vian'.

"I don't know exactly what you mean," replied the fierce looking general musingly; "but as no one is as powerful as you girls are when on your duty I guess I'll have to consent."

"We won't spoil anything, or interfere in your dutiful work in any way," promised Annie 'vian'. "On the contrary we will always be your friends."

"Will you agree to go away and leave me alone for the rest of the time so that I can reach the lines, whenever I wish to and not say anything about it is until I'm going?" asked the general.

"I promise that," cried the little girls to the boys surprise.

"Don't do it, don't do it," urged the boy getting scared.

"They have already consented," said the general laughing in his face; "and you my boy have promised me to abide by their decision, so friend boy scout whatever your name may be, I shall perform the work, whether you like it or not."

Brimando hated himself on the day he had again a deep seal on his face and a strong suspicion in his heart. The general moved over the table, took some water colors from the drawer, and returned to the corner table and handed the paints and water colors to Violeta the boy who had now seen the 'vian' girls face to face in daylight for the first time. They looked to be the most beautiful intelligent looking girls he had ever seen in his life, and clothed in handsome clinging purple robes. One of them to his surprise had golden brown hair, and blue eyes and was exceedingly fair of skin their complexion matching by their lovely features; the one who was the youngest resembled a good deal the little Dorothy Gale girl he had read of and seen in pictures in the Oz books he had read but he knew it was Annie 'vian' herself; her hair contrasted exquisitely with her pink cheeks and ruby red lips, and she appeared to be the most beautiful of all them. As soon as they had seated themselves at the table and started to draw a map of the same kind, all getting to work at the same time to make it quicker, Violet said to the boy with a bow:

"We thank you Brimando."

"Very good," said the general, erasing the map of his own with art critical approval. "You little girls are much better and more interesting than any one else I have ever had with me before, and this wonderful boy would scarcely allow me to work on my plans but for them. With an old man's consent to be by general Hanley, I know," he continued to the boys evident surprise. "Now exactly where Hanley is and what direction he is moving in. He is coming with the army which is surrounding the Calver business. You surely have much to thank him and see for on this for I'll notify general Hanley of this as soon as possible. But now and have accomplished our work and I know you girls desire let us dine in honor of the occasion."

He clapped his hands together several times and to the boys surprise redoubled surprise two purple coated soldiers came in, the general called to them they saluted and soon the table again was covered with dainty eatables. This time there were places for the 'vian' girls too as well as for the general and the boy scout.

"Sit down all of you my friends and eat your fill," said the general, but instead of seating himself at the head of the table he went into another room, saying to the little girls:

"Your beauty and grace almost outshine me. So that I may appear in my proper way at this banquet table, I intend to 'don' of this occasion to put upon myself my natural uniform."

CHAPTER SEVEN.

A FIERCE BATTLE ALONG THE BOUNDARY LINE, AND

OTHER EVENTS.

These persons who whole line was upon a line of their main works the enemy refusing to follow, being content with the nature of the victory as it went.

And with his combined force. The advance guards of the enemy however discovered the movements of kindred forces and retreated a considerable distance to give the alarm. Hailed in great numbers behind a long stone wall the landelindian infantry opened upon the christians, who at first the assault with appalling fury, while janson's division gradually but very slowly got one force after another to go forward, and the attack of the christians was so vehement once more and even so persistent that the enemy abandoned the works in frightful confusion leaving two million dead and wounded inside and outside the works. However the advance of the christians could not be stopped now, and the landelindian general pengler advanced with heavy numbers to force the attacking christians back. Bragg was the first to come forward with his artillery, and opened fire upon the landelindians, while Phil's dragoons simultaneously attacked the landelindians vigorously but he was soon forced to retire before a counter charge. Still on came the other divisions under a murderous fire compelling a portion of Bragg's infantry to sweep over the works and mingle with the enemy while again simultaneously a large force of Angelinians attacked general pengler's landelindian front but the foe had retired behind a very prominent position. Once more however rushed the foe again in a counter charge and with the greatest ferocity, showing great bravery and making an impetuous dash, while all along the rest of the enemy line defending the position, broke a fearful cannon and musketry fire, and the christian losses were fearful. The dragoons under general Jim janson were demoralized, but general janson's divisions counter charged the our christians with the bayonet driving the christians in confusion from their works. Several other divisions were also ordered to bear down on all sides of the christian assailants, and place them between two fires. This was done, and the landelindians penetrating into the lines were scattered by overwhelming numbers who assailed assailed him as. Even still the main line of christian assailants continued on in their fierce assault, with unabated fury, the Angelinian generals launching their forces forward with apparently irresistible energy, the struggle again being fearful and raging without any respite or pause, and general janson who overthrew the divisions of general Wentworth however was killed by a landelindian sharpshooter. The slaughter however was very frightful and general wentworth went down mangled and bleeding. Gracedeline tried to capture the position, and goblin also tried to capture the two batteries no matter how great the peril. He knew that it was like death, but he had no fear though it was like running into the jaws of death, and his excitement urged him for the attempt.

At once he gathered all his forces and charged at a furious pace for the batteries. His cavalry forces were annihilated, then his most massive dragon columns were mangled and cut to pieces. Under the withering fire the remainder of the christian columns however soon reached the batteries and after a severe hand to hand fight captured the artillery and gun carriages. With the captured artillery they opened fire upon the fleeing gunners, sending them flying amid the dreadful carnage, but the infantry recovering from the shock, rallied and attacked with exasperating fury, and soon again recovered the artillery shattered general goblin's division of one million so badly that only five thousand were left. He himself lay among the slain but was only severely wounded. His remainder of the division did not yield however, however and lost annihilation.

The main line of the christian troops still attacked in formidable array however being under general jelson, while the other portions of the his massive lines rushed forward and they captured all of the position at last but immediately the landelindians after retreating for a certain distance counter charged closing with the christian troops under general junderline and all the divisions counter attacked at once plied their bayonets having no time to reload their guns but undaunted the enemy rushed on. J Kinderline men alone were behind high breastworks and they had the full brunt of the fight.

Again and again they committed awful execution with their bayonets upon the advancing foe tearing their main line to fragments. But on pressed the landelindians. The resistance of the christians was terrific but however the pressure was too heavy, and soon the assailants were pressing glimmering back while the counter assault along jennings' lines were also pressing on successfully. In jelson's jansons' whole line was soon on a slow retreat back to their main works the enemy refusing to follow, being content with the nature of the victory as it went.

CHAPTER SEVEN. A FIERCE BATTLE ALONG THE BOUNDARY LINE, ON AND OTHER EVE EVENTS.

It is possible that the boundary line of Angelina and Glandelinia, was to be the soil of the movements that was to lead to the final and most decisive conflicts of the Glandelinian and other war for the opening to be made for the new planned invsion into the "landelinian country." The first section of the "landelinian arm army extended ten miles south of Growley which was also besieged, and the rebel army also extended from Allenburg to "landelinia Junction." General George Furgun was the main rebel commander and opposing the brave christian forces, the that had been a portion of that that had recently and time and again tried to capture growley from the other "landelinian armies" defending it. Both sides at this portion for nearly two months, while the fiercest disturbance of the war was going on in northern Angelina were making preparations for the coming general and final strife along the border.

The christian forces continually receiving reinforcements, from the directions northwest of Growley and elsewhere were gathering in force while one of the "landelinian" "committees" of this, the christian general genderson sent forces of ten ten divisions, eight hundred thousand strong each to destroy the rebel formations on the morning of whatever the first or whatever date this was to happen but information of the movements had reached the rebel commanders and general warrington Joseph, dispatched two "Hollensteinian" officers, colonel gawson and francis gault to order general Rosenberg to exit extend his lines and Captain James Henderson by way of water garring to the left of the grand army.

The news of the preparations made by the christians reached all rebel commanders on the (go outland line) Captain James Henderson happened to run into a big body of Winkie Abyssinkilian cavalry, and was stopped, but he was mounted upon a very fine steed, and after shooting down several, and killing their a in leader, he escaped and he rode toward general Holfords divisions he then aroused every general and other officers and spread the news of the coming christian attack. (If you don't believe it ask him.))

Colonel General Dawson however while going on his mission was also surprised by a column of Winkie Abyssinkilians and shot dead. The form foremost of the fierce Angelinian column came in sight of the enemy positions at about seven thirty in the morning led by thirteen brigades general and personally under general Aberdean Knowings. Knowing that their intentions was discovered, six divisions of light and heavy infantry was ordered forward to secure all banks, and also if possible possible the banks of the "gelling Onion" river, and secure all bridges over the river, and also messengers were sent to the main line for reinforcements to come on and give assistance.

As the drums beat the alarm and the bugles called the soldiers from their camps, about seven million seven hundred thousand "landelinians" assembled to their works to contest the war. Thirty eight hundred pieces of artillery (why so many) were formed into line in one long stretch at the north side of the border. Before other guns however could be brought up the Angelinians came up and stormed the "landelinian" works. The "landelinians" stood their ground with utmost fury, while their artillery officers gave the word to "fire". The order was followed first by a few guns which committed little execution, and then by a close and deadly discharge of grape and canister and shell and shrapnel. Many christians were moved down and two generals with them. The Angelinians however as almost warned using the guns, but in the disparity of numbers the "landelinian" officers ordered every artillery man to stand to his guns to the last, and they stood accordingly fought as stubbornly as they possibly could.

While they were so resist the first wave of the christian assault the second wave of the Angelinians overtopped pressing the others of their comrades before them, and therefore the muzzling guns fired suddenly into the midst of them the valleys of grape and canister tearing through both waves like a tornado does through a wood.

The Angelinians however returned a fierce and storming musketry fire at the rebel soldiers point blank and many thousands were killed and wounded at close quarters in one moment. One rebel officer was captured and then shot in his endeavor to escape. Thus the first success of the border conflict was accomplished by the very Angelinians themselves. The Angelinians then pushed on and at over their success some of the regiments blowing up the "landelinian" military stores. By this time some four hundred thousand Omarians arriving to the assistance of the rebel comrades had gathered on a long rising ground near Vanitt Vanity Dell.....

General Barrett, Jackson who was in command of this Oarian Column gave the orders to his men to advance and retake the guns. At the head of their brigades each brigadier commander of the Oarian column led the furious counter charge, with general puttrickson in personal command followed by a force of the gissersmannians and Gendensians. The Angelinians in the foremost column had begun to drag off the captured guns, to prevent it the "landelinians" yelling like demons quickened their on onrush onrush. At this the Angelinians let go a terrific fire with the machine guns firing one or two broadsides into the "landelinians", then another by which twenty thousand "landelinians" along the line of charge were shot down at once. Then a tremendous machine gun and rifle fire combined followed simultaneously, and a full multitude of scores of thousands of "landelinians" and general puttrickson and Abner Hic-Jollister also in command were killed.

When seeing confusion among his survivors the main Oarian Commander gave the word to his men to fire, and as the "landelinians" continued to advance a general discharge from the whole line of Omarians and other rebels was given seven thousand of the Angelinians including three generals falling on the spot. In two minutes the Angelinians who had captured the guns retreated in the greatest disorder, and the "landelinians" were left in possession of the many machine guns once more.

At the beginning therefore of this tremendous border conflict, the "landelinians" noted merely from the pulse and at first attempted no pursuit but as the Angelinian forces retreated, the Hic-Hollensteinians having rallied ran everywhere and ambushed the flying troops every place of wood for miles, every rock by the wayside served as a lurking place for these fierce "landelinian" soldiers. Every small hill seemed to the "landelinians" and stricken Angelinians to swarm with countless numbers of the enemy, as a most unintermitted withering fire was poured on them from behind stone walls, hay stacks, from cornfields, trees, and from every hiding place known of. All the panic stricken Angelinians began to run rather than retreat in order though they strove to pick off their unseen foes. Their generals and many other officers vainly strove to stop their flight for they were being driven before the enemy like frightened sheep.

Just at this moment the main column was moving up to the assault. A portion of the advancing column met the fugitives, and forming into a huge square three miles long and as wide enclosed the fugitive columns many who literally lay on the ground their very tongues having out of their mouths like those of dogs after a chase. The "landelinians" who pursued rushed time and again upon this square and for three hours a most terrific and sanguinary conflict raged. The "landelinians" however were repulsed with the terrific loss of seven hundred thousand and ten Hic-Hollensteinians general in killed.

At about eight o'clock after this happened the main column of Angelinian troops added now by the Winkie Abyssinkilian infantry and Abbeinnians advanced themselves to make a second assault upon the rebel position.

Twice the terrible fire of the "landelinians" all along the line drove whole waves miles long back in great confusion and with horrible slaughter but the ammunition of the "landelinians" gave out and during the third assault which was concentrated heavily upon all points and covered by a heavy artillery fire the "landelinians" suffering frightful losses as well were again obliged to retreat across the field losing their machine guns and even other cannons and second time. And this time the slaughter among the Angelinians was terrific. Among those shot down was general Fittermarines. The loss of the Angelinians was one million eight hundred and sixty two thousand four hundred and forty four in killed and wounded.

Nothing along the border so far since the war began could have been more shocking than the carnage that followed the fierce storming of the rebel works on the extreme right and left during the third assault the christian soldiers fairly teemed over the myriads of the countless dead to a get at the rebel works and drive back the "landelinians" who were being crowded out of their works in order to form under the main defenses which they had prepared to cover their retreat. Of the rebels general Freshoot was the last to leave the works. Though his uniform coat was pierced by bayonet thrusts and his hat carried away by a bullet he got off unhurt. Among the killed of the enemy was general warrington one of the most active and distinguished of the "landelinians".....

At another section of the battle line, general Fraddock and his three divisions of two million five hundred thousand men on charging upon the "landelinian" positions on the center which were under general guquams met a serious and disastrous repulse. At this location there was thick underbrush which grew thick and high, and a large forest of trees a cast deep sh adown on the attacking lines as the Angelinians overconfidently advanced with many waving banners and gleaming muskets and bayonets suddenly well directed volleys miles long from Omarians who with the Hic-Hollensteinians and urmersmannians had formed an extensive ambuscade was poured upon the christian columns. Yet all along the line not a single foe was to be seen but their hundreds of thousands of deadly rifles and hidden or masked cannons sent a storm of death from every tree, thicket, and breastworks for the distance of ten miles. Nearly half of the attacking christian forces fell under this murderous fire of the glandelinians, and appalled at such frightful losses at so short a time with their main general killed, the survivors turned and fled in the utmost confusion. Their other general I generally who showed cool valor saved the rest of the column from total destruction. They were exposed in the most dangerous part of this battle line, two horses were shot under one general, and three under the others, and fourteen bullets tore into one general's uniform and badly wounded him in the thigh but as fierce was the rebel fire was they all seemed to bear a charmed life. Rallying ranks of the panic stricken soldiers as possible the generals placed them behind trees, rocks, fences, and on defenses along the roadsides and when the glandelinian glandelinian Mangaboos rushed in big swarms from their places of concealment followed by the Omarians and Jo-Hollostinians to counter charge, they were greeted with such a deadly fire that the foremost of the column was fairly shot down, and the shattered army was able to recoil without further disaster. Other portion of the enemy's line of Scoddlers and other glandelinians near the vicinity of Ester starring was also suddenly attacked but the glandelinian fire made the most terrible havoc in their many ranks. The assault however was delivered with terrible force but the glandelinians held the assailants at bay until the other wing recently driven in was reinforced and rallied. Here both sides in titan throngs fought on through the whole day with the most savage ferocity and the losses was dreadful beyond exceeding. General Stork of the glandelinians was wounded in the wrist, and a bullet shattered his sabre. He wrenched another sword from the grasp of a dying Angelinian soldier and fought on until the assailants withdrew. And at this moment of success he was shot dead. At this point, all night long the work of picking up the wounded dragged on, and when many of the wounded could not hardly walk they were carried on litters. None of the soldiers rested that night many accomplishing the feat under the heavier heaviest shell fire. In the meantime general Medford in leading his own soldiers across the rebel works through a merciless glandelinian cannon and rifle fire miles long was shot dead during the hottest of the fight, but despite their losses his men fought on with the steadiness of the best veterans, and when the Angelinians were repulsed were the last to leave the field. All along the line that day the battle raged with the most terrible fury, and on both sides there stormed a most terrible fire of musketry and cannon and for the extent of forty miles both sides fighting with the fury of demons and a precision of veterans and time and again the enemy was routed the christian cavalry and foot soldiers storming in long waves over the fields and winning glorious advantages.

The storming of the central portion of the "landelinian army was on the same day assigned to the commanding general whose christian divisions whose columns were south of Growley and he successfully carried the position by a series of desperate assaults in which his losses was tremendous.

The defenses of these landelinian positions had been during the previous days been greatly strengthened and with the strong omarian and other glandelinian forces defending them, and all the parks of artillery was absolutely impenetrable.

This christian general divided his Abissinian and Angelinian forces into four columns and hurled them against the rebel positions like the overflow of an enormous flood upon the ground. Six assaults were made before the long waves of nationals scaled the extensive parapets and drove the Angelinian rebels before them despite the most desperate resistance ever seen made by the glandelinians in the war before.

While the terrible hand to hand conflict raged between hundreds of thousands of men within the glandelinian position three christian generals fell within the rebellious but when the enemy fell back for a short distance they were rescued despite the hot rebel fire.

At the same time general Gump gander was ordered to attack the rear of general J. H. Hudson's rebel position and divisions thinking the main section of the landelinian army had passed in retreat over the Omarian river.

This christian general fell upon this glandelinian division as directed but found it fit to be the main army itself. Grasping the dangerous situation he made such a vigorous assault with his whole force that the rebel commander general Beppo gians thought the entire christian army was upon him and began to prepare for a fiercer resistance than ever. Under cover of his desperate movements the christian general was able to withdraw his forces thus extricating them from a most perilous position.

The various glandelinians pursued fiercely but the indomitable spirit of the general and his officers rose above every obstacle, and rallying their shattered columns charged the exultant enemy and drove them back twice with wholesale losses, until he cleared everything before him and he virtually withdrew his forces to a new position. While he was withdrawing a strong glandelinian cavalry force of the dangerous golden cap squadrons charged his dragons with the rush of a tornado but the Angelinian infantry opened a fierce fire and completely routed and almost destroyed the cavalry and then he turned his attention to a force of oncoming Scoddlers.

He instructed his front line (if he had any to spare for his losses already was too heavy to think of) to rely entirely upon the bayonet. This rebel column however outnumbered him but he fell upon it with such impetuosity that the rebels fled before him in a frightful panic. Later while he again was falling back a strong force of the fierce omarian Jo-Hollostinians appeared on his left like a human tidal wave and with a terrible warwhoop like those of a million of the American Indians attacked him. All was terror and confusion but the general and his officers rallied the confused columns and despite the enemy being ten to his one led the Angelinians in a fierce center attack, against the Jo-Hollostinian forces. With his own sword he cut down a tall landelinian officer who even in his death throes fired twice at him but twice missed his aim, and killed the general's horse instead. His conflict was a shorter one and soon before the unerring fire of the Angelinians the Jo-Hollostinians fled in dismay.

When the most furious of this part of the first days battle was fought general Heller led one of the fiercely attacking columns and throwing himself between the main body of the rallied Angelinian troops and their advancing reinforcements brought about the severest part of the engagements. He contending forces at this section being about equal in size and strength and having the same number of artillery the whole battle ground was contested with a redoubled fierceness. The glandelinians were thrown into great confusion at first by the vigorous and wild insane resistance of the Angelinian nationals they encountered and the intense intensity of their fierce and destructive artillery and musketry fire butty great personal exertions in which their own lives were recklessly exposed the glandelinian generals and other officers rallied their columns and leading their veteran Scoddlers to within thirty yards of the rallied Angelinians made a headlong charge in the face of a withering searching fire which mowed down thousands per volley and per second.

After some redoubtly fierce resistance the Angelinian forces again broke and fled unable to resist the terrible onslaught of such fierce landelinians. General Heller fought desperately and bravely, and when three horses were shot under him continued to fight on foot against terrible odds. He was finally seriously and dangerously wounded and when taken prisoner two fierce wicked Abyssinilian soldiers who had lost their lives or wives and children and even parents and other relations and homes and property on account of his savage Omaria Omaniens brutally felled him to the earth when he asked for honorable treatment and then plunged their bayonets into his body when he was on his knees with hands upraised begging for mercy.

Then they left him where he lay after kicking him twice, believing him to be dead but after the conflict he was found by some of his comrades and carried within the rebel lines bleeding from forty heinous wounds inflicted by these two Abyssinilian brute brutes. He lingered in agony for a few hours and then died a martyr in the cause of his own country.

Indeed success for the landelinians was for this point at least, but finally huge masses of Angelinian reinforcements impeded the progress of the exultant landelinians and gave the routed Angelinian forces time to recover from the panic into which they had been twice thrown when after repulsing the tremendous christian onslaught, the landelinians counter charged.

Struggling on through all this resistance, and another strong battery and christian force confronted the battalions of brave landelinian soldiers. For several minutes they recoiled, but their generals rallied them, and their chief commander, plantoria waving his sabre over his head shouted:

"Men of Omaria, surely you will not need to charge or fear to charge up upon these christian dogs, forward!"

But he fell at the first discharge from the christian cannon and seeing their brave leader stretched upon the ground, the troops personally under him recoiled in confusion and fled.

General Dagon led his brigades intrepidly against another section of the christian force receiving a cannon volley, and he was killed. Another general received a musket ball in both legs, and general Morgannia assumed command. Under his leadership this portion of the christian force was finally hurled back and a strong battery of cannon captured.

The battle raged furiously and he knew nothing of the fate of general Plantoria's columns and the death of their general. After being heavily reinforced he dashed his columns furiously upon another christian battery. A full division of the dreadful wicked Abyssinilians met the attacking landelinians here like infuriated savages and a most terrible conflict ensued. Swarms of Angelinians also swinging around from two divisions or directions finally enclosed his forces.

Morgannia fought with the most furious desperation but was forced to give way. He attempted to cut his way through his flood of fiercely attacking foes but his numbers were too small and finally to prevent his troops from being massacred he was forced or obliged to surrender.

The rest of the greatly harassed glandelinian forces started to recoil, and the Angelinians rushing forward burst like a whirlwind into the thickest of the bloody fight and drove all before them. One of the generals on his black steed was seen wherever the Angelinian soldiers fell thickest, even his sword flashed whenever death was thickest. He led the charge against the rebel columns that caused them to break and flee. His horse was shot under him and he sank to the ground with a ghastly wound in the right leg during the retreat of the foe general Anderson of the rebels was pursued by a large force of Abyssinkilians. Ten of his body guard were killed, and fourty seven mortally wounded, and his jaw was shattered by a rifle ball. Lying fast to his horse's neck he darted away pursued by his relentless foes. One Abyssinkilian soldier alone was soon able to keep pace with the flying steed and his rider but as he was being outdrawn outdistanced he thrust his lance which missed its aim and the rebel officer reached his lines insensible but still clinging to his jaded horse.

At all points the Angelinians following hard poured in such a fire that the enemy fled faster. The bravery of the rebel officers and their men were unravelling. Many in the retreat were captured. The ginkie Abyssinkilians were a terror to the enemy and knew the precision of their fire was marvellous, and they always fought with an obstinacy and desperation and also determination that nothing seemed able to overcome. Indeed they were seldom beaten, and even when defeated, their retreat was sullen, stern and dangerous.

The main christian generals were more determined than ever to capture the center of the glandelinian position and as it was rumored that the glandelinian armies were losing out in their efforts in Calvernia it was possible to send greater armies to reinforce those fighting the enemy at the border. The generals sent forward hundreds of thousands of the most veteran soldiers, trained in all the arts of war and having experiences on many a hard fought battle field. All of the christian generals were brilliant leaders. During the day at night and while the proud and overconfident christian army was preparing for the final struggle of the battle general de Luxe Walthe marched into the rear of the extensive rebel lines with great forces of strange looking glandelinians clothed in the garb of the gargoyle and carrying long rifles and bayonets. These were the glandelinians known as the Growleywogs who had fought with all kinds of Nationals and now were being brought up from vanity fair to try their strength with the trained Abbeismians and Angelinian glandelinians.

The next morning the main christian general Kimball failing to better down the foe's positions with a fire of all his cannons determined to carry them by a main assault. He had over 10,000,000 men prepared for the assault aided by Abyssinkilians and others but before he could accomplish anything a disaster occurred.

While the columns were being prepared five million Osmarians, and 10,000,000 other glandelinians besides the Growleywogs and supported by the Turnerranians advanced in long waves upon the Angelinian positions near the southern section beyond Growley and were met all along the line by a most terrific fire from artillery of all make. Despite their dreadful losses, they swept on with wild enthusiasm. Then the glandelinians meeting sterner resistance were compelled to fall back after an hour and a half of desperate fighting but as soon as the Angelinians counter charged the other glandelinians covering the retreat of the other assaulting glandelinian columns arose from behind their breastworks and other fortific fortifications and with deadly aim poured volley after volley into the approaching lines.

The carnage was simply awful, the waves were gapped and torn to pieces, men fell in long windrowed heaps everywhere, and the Angelinian columns broke, only to be reformed and again hurled against the ten mile merciless fire of the fiercest of the glandelinian fighters the Osmarians.

Again the slaughter was repeated, and again the survivors broke and ran. General Kimball was struck down by a grape shot and fell from his mangled horse before it dropped, other generals and officers of the highest rank took command, and they too were stricken down killed or wounded.

Nothing could stay the panic, nothing could stand before the long rifles and cannons of the Angelinian insurgent forces. Ten times the assaults were repeated and ten divisions were shattered and all their commanders killed or wounded. A thousand flags were rent and torn until they were rags, 10,000 flag bearers were killed and the slaughter of soldiers became a massacre. Finally the remainder of the torn and mangled Angelinian and Abyssinkilian columns slowly fled to the shelter of their own works leaving many weapons and a sea of dead and wounded behind them.

In these twelve assaults one million seven hundred thousand Angelinian soldiers were killed, six million four hundred and sixty six thousand were wounded, and five hundred ninety thousand taken prisoners. At this point only the glandelinian loss only at this section of the battline was seventy thousand killed, and six hundred thousand wounded. The glandelinian general de Luxe Walthe proved himself a hero during the stubborn resistance against these series of christian assaults and was severely wounded by a shell fragment. He also received two bullets in his right shoulder, and three his left leg and one in his hand.

his wounds were so severe that he was borne to the rear and general Radice took his place. During the pandy retreat of the Angelinians a dozen regiments of devoted Osmarians and Abyssinkilians had when overtaken by a brigade of their pursuers taken refuge in an old abandoned farm, and within ten minutes an overwhelming force of Osmarians and other fierce glandelinians besieged them on all sides. General Zachary Turner their gallant Abyssinkilian commander made all the efforts that few mortal men could do to cut through the encircling rebel troops. The glandelinians made six desperate and unsuccessful attempts to destroy the christian force, and were six times repulsed with great loss. On the seventh attempt being made the fire of the christian defense was so severe and rapid that their ammunition became exhausted and the fierce glandelinians finally overpowered them. With drawn sabres, daggers, bayonets, and clubbed guns the brave survivors fought on until near all nearly all of them were cut or shot down. Their general Zachary Turner fell near the farm house, and brigadier general Tecumse was shot down near a haystack. Colonel Owens was butchered and mutilated with while lying wounded in a cornfield. Captain Owen Gwansonian was shot while attempting to set fire to a haystack where had been no surrender of this surrounded christian force and neither had there been no retreat. The glandelinian general who conducted this venture as a sacrifice had seven horses shot under him and his ankle and arm were shattered by bullets.

At other points on the same left wing of the glandelinians a simultaneous christian attack was made, and the Angelinian commander failing to gain the positions by strategy commenced one of the most furious assaults of the battle upon the lines. Here for seven hours amidst burning positions, trees and the like the glandelinians offered such a determined resistance that the Federals were driven away with wholesale losses. At gaspoints the Angelinians charged across wide meadows that separated them from their glandelinian foes and fought the fierce and stubborn nation knee deep in water and in the wet yielding soil. Again and again the flames of Angelinians sixteen miles long threw themselves upon the glandelinian foe but nothing could break the unflinching rebel line before which they were soon obliged to give way. At still other points on the glandelinian left the contest raged still more fiercely. General Anderson at this point had only three million three hundred thousand men to oppose an attacking angelinian force of over six million. The battle here raged furiously all day with artillery and musketry and most savagely. So fierce was the fighting that forest and prairie grass caught fire and dense clouds of smoke hid both sides. Leaves were clipped from the trees till they fell like a hail of blizzards of snowflakes the grass was cut down by bullets and canister and trees splintered and shattered by shell fire. The Abbeismian infantry advanced to the charge sixteen times but each time were compelled to recoil. The Angelinian general in charge of the attacking Abbeismians had four horses killed under him and was wounded in the left shoulder.

During one of these eighteen attacks seventeen hundred thousand glandelinians repulsed and put to flight six million of the fierce and dangerous inkie Abyssinkilians. The main christian commander at this point that day had hoped however to cut the whole glandelinian army that stretched between Growley and Jennie Q. When down into two, but found it impossible to do so. Again and again, and still again the most monstrous Abbeismian and Angelinian divisions stretched in long solid lines many miles in length were ordered forward to expell the glandelinian armies from the positions in the woods back of Growley at the point of the bayonet, but every assault that was made all along that extensive line was beaten back by the glandelinian army with losses too terrible to behold. The fierce contest south of Growley continued fiercely along the glandelinian right wing until dark but even the greatest and most monstrous christian forces were unable to win a single yard or dislodge their most equally stubborn opponents from their strong positions. When the christian general influenced by the timely advice of his generals and advisors withdrew from his perilous positions.

The affair of these assaults of the battle on the left wing of the glandelinian army was disastrous to the christian cause. One of the most stubbornly contested parts of the battle, was on the central wing of this great glandelinian army where general Turner Mylats by his most bold stand saved the glandelinian army from destruction. His divisions stood their ground with the firmness of a long wall of rocks and therefore saved the whole glandelinian army from a terrible beating and from being driven from the boundary line. At a critical time during the furious battle and when reinforcements were badly needed, the glandelinian chief officers watched the advance of heavy columns away to his rear. They could not tell whether they were foes or friends and rode to their main commander to give him the warning. The general then rode forward toward the direction they told him and through his glasses watched the advancing troops in silence. One of his officers also looking through his own field glasses believed he could make out the Turnerranian flag. Turner Mylats looked again more steadily and watched the advancing columns with the most deepening despairing anxiety.

suddenly he was seen to lower his glasses and a load was lifted from his heart. A slight breeze caught the foremost standard of the column and flapped out every fold to its fullest extent and the sunlight breaking through the dense clouds of smoke and dust shone on the excellent Quarian flag; none too soon however but Myletse held his ground at every point as the most extensive battle of the war ebbed and flowed, and fell back to stronger positions toward noon unmolested by the Nationals.

During the second tremendous assault of the Angelinians which came at one thirty in the afternoon after the most desperate fighting of the battle he completely smashed the long waves of the Christian assailants after being almost worsted himself. This charge and its grand repulse was the most wonderful sight ever witnessed. All the Glandelinian generals on the left of Inner Myletse line saw the right wing of the assaulting tidal wave of humanity coming, and ordered their infantry to hold their fire. The wave advancing was so extensive and strong that it appeared as if the whole army was advancing, but the rebels waited until they were within close range and could almost see the whites of their eyes, and then poured their fierce and murderous volleys right into their faces and kept on firing for several minutes until the whole rebel line looked like a gray wedge of smoking lava walls. The rebel commanders supposed of course that when the smoke lifted the whole Christian line of assault would have been broken and all the men in the front lines gone down to their deaths, but it was surprising, for when the smoke partly disappeared, the wave still showed itself but much nearer, and though badly torn and gapped with their fallen lying as thick as straws, was not staggered in the least. The whole wave came on slowly not at all on the run, surging forward cool as fate toward the rebel line like an irresistible tide, and walked up and to and over the works and around the left of the rebel line, before they knew the Angelinians were upon them.

It was simply astonishing to see such fighting. During the Glandelinian resistance against this tremendous charge, general Allen who especially distinguished himself had six horses shot under him during the headlong counter charge against the Angelinians in which he was mortally wounded. The main fury of the conflict opened during this time in the effort of the rebels to drive back the assailants who had advanced around the left of the Glandelinian forces. General Hendrickson rode forward during the fierce struggle to superintend his divisions in person but was immediately killed by a round shot. The command then devolved on general Ahmud but he was not at that time able to check the Christian advance and was wounded severely. The scene of this tremendous fighting was in a series of large farm fields consisting of plowed ground bordered by thickly bordered wooded plains and uplands.

General Frank Goodridge riding up in advance of his Quarian and Secodder troops then came up to take command but he too was wounded, his columns crushed and shattered, and still the Angelinians were gaining ground.

Then general Ginger-jump sent general Gillion to take the chief command and with general Saundersburg he reformed the broken lines anew on the summit of rising ground and elsewhere. The Angelinians pressed on, the conflict grew in fury and violence and the Angelinians already occupied part of the works. General Galden Turner soon arrived at this point at three o'clock with his columns and viewed the fierce Angelinian attack. In spite of all his resistance at the outset the whole of Myletse line had been driven back with terrible loss at exactly three o'clock.

Three o'clock and he himself was severely wounded, but he was reinforced and retained command despite the protest of his officers, strengthening his lines and opening with all his guns, which committed terrible execution but still he could not expell the Angelinian forces to retire. General Galden attacked Myletse batteries, and great demonstrations were made against other portions of the whole Quarian line but these attempts were not being well supported and it was soon to be apparent that the results of the whole day's operations was that the Angelinians would soon be driven back with enormous loss.

The Glandelinian loss was already very heavy. During the struggle all the strength of the Angelinians had been gathered up and thrown in one last and most desperate effort on the whole of the enemy's lines. During all the fierce attack a most furious attack or cannonade had continually reared from more than ten thousand guns for in forming the batteries from Beppo Evans, and Henry Johnston. Other Glandelinian batteries also blazed and thundered, and during the assault and cannonade which raged without intermission for four hours the whole battline itself rattled and thundered with an infernal storm of death and destruction. Hundreds of thousands of great limbs were every minute torn from whole forests of trees miles in extent, countless rocks were splintered, and the death and destruction scattered far and wide.

All that time the furious Angelinians in vast extensive purple and scarlet waves tore upon and through the whole Glandelinian front and gained the works at all points soon only to be driven back by the long gray lines blazing with an eruption of death and death and horror.

It was like a comb-combat of the world. Scores of thousands of battle flags on both sides were shot to earth quicker than that many men could pick them up. The storm of bullets brought down leaves from the trees as thickly as a hurricane would blow down branches and had made down the branches of the trees.

suddenly he was seen to lower his glasses and a load was lifted from his heart. A slight breeze caught the foremost standard of the column and flapped it every fold to its fullest extent and the conflict became more and more

It was like a comb combat of the worlds. Scores of thousands of battle flags on both sides were shot to earth quicker than that many men could pick them up. The storm of bullets brought down leaves from the trees as thickly as a hurricane would have done. Purple and red coats dropped by hundreds of thousands as rebel regiments and brigades poured in side ones to the assistance of those who defended the crest of the glandelinian works and the repulsed and shattered christian forces were their way back under cover of the smoke clouds. Vice and sanguinary deseculation the battle of the boundary line was over and a thrill of hope ran through the glandelinian as had not been known since the beginning of the horrible glandelinian war. It was apparent that the tide at the boundary had at last been turned but not until Angolinia had ridden on the topmost wave and been dashed on the rocks of the boundary.

At the right wing of the rebel line the conflict was nearly as fierce as it was on the center but raged the whole day long. At this point the Angolinian assault was almost completely successful. For suddenly with a yell that could have outdone the noise of the greatest cyclone the flower of the Angolinian army fell upon the glandelinian army under general Jemisin at the extreme of the rebel line. And the pandemonium of sound the whole glandelinian force flew into a great panic and confusion before the sudden irresistible crush of the Angolinians. In a most extensive and turbulent tide they streamed to the rear and along the banks of the Ouden river toward Vanity Fair, their ten commanders severely wounded, and one third their number killed or disabled, and one quarter captured. The contagion of panic spread to other Glandelinian divisions, the few brigades who stood their ground crumbling before the assault of the purple tents. With half of their number dead or dying they joined their flying comrades. Through the twilight, what was once six gallant glandelinian divisions still fled through to the rear. At the last height of the Angolinian success, their main commander was seriously wounded, ten of his staff were killed and thirteen wounded and this threw the victors into confusion and disorganization and then carried to the rear under a fearful fire from the lines of the rallied glandelinian armies. Five or two of his litter bearers were killed and the litter littered to the ground. When the Glandelinians were fully rallied they moved forward in full column and being reinforced began a most desperate counter attack over soon.

The battle with the whole christian army was now nearing its total conclusion but as at other big conflicts the bloody scenes of this day were only a prelude of what was to come elsewhere. In violence and fierceness the mastery and cannon fire along the whole front of both sides surpassed anything in battles yet anywhere. The main christian generals at all points had made defense of the most desperate attempts to cut the rebel army to pieces but were foiled. General Myletze was now with his army crowding general Mandell the main christian commander of the whole force and he was falling back though at all points the battle was still raging. Up to now general Mandell's brigades of the Glandelinians numbering eighty million troops had taken no part in this tremendous conflict but at seven o'clock he marched into position. The total results of the last day of the battle was really seeming to be undecided but unless general Myletze received reinforcements equal to general Mandell's troops he would soon meet disaster.

However so far the vast christian army which extended sixty three miles along the boundary was driven back at all points for ten miles leaving heaps of dying killed and wounded on the field also that distance and also at the whole front. It probably was the most terrible battle fought yet by both armies and closed just at the hour darkness came. As stated during the preceding sheets the whole christian armies had made repeated and most furious assaults on the whole three wings of the glandelinian army with at first with great triumphant success but later was driven back with great slaughter. A portion of Inner Myletze as line especially the center was crushed but he reformed it and secured it against further disaster. The Glandelinian losses had been very heavy but had nevertheless won a decided success. The Glandelinian wounded were estimated to amount to six million dead, and eight million wounded with nearly a hundred generals killed and twice that many wounded. Many of the Angolinian wounded who came to the base hospitals from the front declared to their comrades that it was one of the fiercest and fiercest engagements of the war. They declared that the worse of the battle had entered the storm upon Myletze in person but who repulsed them. They also declared that general Mandell and others made a most terrific and brilliant charge of the war but were driven back with the loss of one million in prisoners. The dead still lay in heaps and eighteen million of their wounded were already in the hospitals. Any could have ridden for miles and miles of the ground of the most stubbornly contested border battle of the war, how stubbornly could be attested by the millions of trees bowed and broken by bullets and the thick stream dead. No other battlefield of the war has yet presented so terrible a scene. Estimating the killed and wounded of the christian side and the prisoners the total loss may be twenty million. The total loss was about twelve million.

Hanson's army continued the slow retreat until their positions were reached and then the siege of Eva Grania was resumed. Not resumed but worse. Two desperate battles had already raged for the possession of the important southern stronghold of the No-Mirthian fortifications and still the brave and gallant christian armies had not made much success and had already met two bloody and crushing reverses. The battle indeed was a horrible struggle to behold, indeed was one of the worst two of the war and one of them surpassed Galverine or Mc-Golleston put alone.

But nevertheless retreat or high lightning landing was not quite over and though Hanson was repulsed there was no intention of Hanson stopping the fighting at no matter what the cost. He had now concentrating against this section of the great No-Mirthian fortress the strongest and largest christian armies the world ever had seen, and the strongest christian armies ever yet mastered. Nevertheless during the last battle horrible disasters had occurred to the enemy.

The many explosions among the enemy's lines during the great battle were the most fearful, and at the same time the most destructive horrors of the whole war up to this time. These great explosions have been attended with effects so terrible and destructive that no other great calamity, neither earthquake, fire, or tornadoes can compare with them. At the extreme right of the glandelinian position not less than fifty seven great explosions had occurred within the space of four hours. One of the most destructive of these explosions destroyed over thirty thousand lives and destroyed a whole glandelinian position for the distance of forty miles in length leaving no trace of the line along which it extended. Dense clouds of dust and smoke extended as witnesses said even up to the opposite hemisphere. Even then the minds of the survivors had not yet had time to recover from the terror caused by these series of unexpected cataclysms, when they were again plunged into dismay, by a another dreadful occurrence of a different description, but hardly less terrible and destructive. About half an hour after the most severe of these volcanic eruption like explosions had ceased, the Angolinian waves of men like surges of wild screaming, yelling cursing among rushed suddenly with the most incredible velocity and fury upon the glandelinians trying to rally, and the charging columns would certainly have annihilated this whole line of glandelinians, and completed the work of destruction, had not general ghosammia, permitted this enormous column of wave of wildly charging christian soldiers to spread themselves over a position of many square miles long, and thus open upon them a deadly fire of cannon which raked their lines through and through, tore them to pieces, and drove them back in confusion. But even this favorable circumstances did not exempt the glandelinian position from the effects of a horrible disaster. The Angolinians before being driven back had penetrated the enemy's lines to the distance of two miles, and the losses of the enemy in defending the position most frantically was terribly heavy.

It is stated that by the effects of the seventy six or seven explosions and of the Angolinian inundation of horror, not less than 11,600,000 Glandelinians perished, and the survivors were crushed with their losses.

After the battle had ceased even for a slight while the whole region behind the enemy's badly torn positions appeared in a terrible blaze from a gigantic conflagration which was so bright that it threw a glare seen for scores of miles the following bloody night, in which an inferno of conflagration was kept up and which split the air from the din of explosions and flashes. It was said without exaggeration that the enemy's handiapped position seemed to be on fire in a hundred different places at once, and thus even during the continuation of the battle continued to burn on for six days altogether, consuming everything the great explosions had spared, and the glandelinians at this point were so dejected and terrified that few or none had the courage enough to venture over in the region to save any part of their substance. Horror was added to horror. Evangelina Grania was a veritable reign of terror.

The enemy had certainly it is true crushed back Hanson's repulse and so on but had the worse of it on their own side, and it did seem as if the siege of Eva Grania would be won by the Angolinians. The many christian positions extended for about nearly a hundred miles.

The christian losses in total were not really estimated but it was considered as 28,189,339. The foe was considered to have lost about 21,000,000.

Evangelina of southern Calverinia seems now to be a...

devastation of northern Angeline was regarded as certain by all general, to royal national and state agents, because fleets and armies for the war were being concentrated against a possible southwestern spread of the flood nearest Gertrude Angeline City which was bearing the greater portion of the pressure from the Mic-Murthier River flood and back waters from the receding floods of the Mic-Murthier River. The flood continued to spread without entering the Mic-Murthier River. The water would then cover seven or eight miles to the west containing about four million more acres, and about three hundred and fifty five thousand inhabitants.

Therefore a vast steady and destructive clutch on this water front and already in conflict on for more than a month in the hope that the really made dikes might hold and confine the flood to the parent river, but with the flood rising, with dikes regularly away the dikes so strongly were they made, it threatened inevitable to overflow them.

Nevertheless again the desperate fight was still being carried on, with the army concentrating all available forces, even able bodied women and children, and gladiators, prisoners of all danger points, along a stretch of more than three hundred miles. An overflow of the levees there, would divert a large portion of the swiftly moving flood from the Mic-Murthier, to the Angeline River, and relieve the situation south on the main stream, but threatened new perils to the southeast and west of Angeline junction city.

Anonymous food supplies were also in transit to numerous concentration points, and hundreds of thousands of tents, and millions of sacks of food, were being sent to new danger areas. There was some concern at the situation however as the great moved toward the Mic-Murthier and along the levees from Angeline junction to Gertrude Angeline City was expressed at the two cross headquarters, although precaution though slightly flooded was believed to be assured of safety. But if the levees were topped by the flood, or if Glendelinians made extra chances by blasting the levees, a dense densely populated territory would be flooded.

On this front of more than nine hundred and fifty five miles of length and a hundred broad the Mic-Murthier embankments still were holding. The levees were inspected by Count Dr. Biff and the Secretary of War, and a heavy train trip from Big Girl Knool to Gertrude Angeline City after conferring with state officials and having all four cars loaded with soldiers armed with machine guns and hand grenades.

After a conference with the Count Dr. Biff and the city relief committee, Count Dr. Biff decided to return to Big Girl Knool and to remain there until the crisis had passed.

Flood waters had again in some parts of Northern Angeline Province isolated and endangered fifty refugee camps, and government officials appealed at that time for more aid, and predicted that forty three camps had been endangered, while a few others had been cut off from the base of supplies not only by flood but some enemy encampments with the only method of reaching them by small boats which could transport only limited loads. The numbers of refugees in these camps were said to be about two hundred and fifty six thousand, and these endangered were listed as camps at Buell's, Rickson, Chamberlains, and even near Big Girl Knool, but the other remaining levee and river dikes were now being guarded and controlled by so many Christians under the command of general Vilius, and some of the Christian command that there was no further fear of new enemy made breaks in the levees, and as nearly the whole population of all other threatened districts were fighting desperately, to ward off the course of the flood, it was hoped the flood would soon reach the sea. Practically all of the northeastern parts of the Angeline County was slowly being freed of the flood waters by this time, but the southwestern portions were still covered by water, though the cities of Angeline, junction, Gertrude Angeline, are precaution and others reported that the flood had gone down a considerable amount.

The Red Cross reported that in southern sections of this region the flood recently had made an additional increase of about two hundred and seventy three thousand refugees, but that with everything seeming to be in control the worst of the flood situation seemed to have passed.

The authorities of all bigger cities and towns on the 4th of December made a plea to the Abbeian Abbeian government and emperor Vilius in general for many millions of dollars for future flood prevention as well as for the refugees who were still homeless even though the flood was rapidly going down.

And indeed this plea for the national funds indicated the spirit of the most important flood prevention conference ever held in Angeline Angeline, and series of others held in other cities and towns, which opened on the 4th. The plea for the record breaking royal and federal appropriations for this cause was voiced especially by every city mayor in Abbeian and other states, and echoed by thousands upon thousands of other speakers, and endorsed by hundreds of thousands of every city and town, and others who called the conference, and approved apparently to the entire gathering.

The national director of all National Forests, first of the Abbeianians to name the amount said it was none too large and would prevent the enemy in the future from making more floods and keep the districts clear of Glendelinians altogether.

The mayor of every city proposed a hundred million dollars for every city to be used for the whole continuation of the unusual destructive war. And the governor of all states, declared that the job was not too big for the whole Abbeian country.

The large number of those scheduled to take part in these many simultaneous meetings such as counts, lords, barons, and all other royal delegates, besides every state governor, attorney, and judge were not expected to arrive to the destinations until the next day. Varying from more or less detailed descriptions of conditions at particular places to analysis the prevention of the causes of the constant increases in the seriousness of Glendelinian made floods, forest fires and other dangerous obstructions with highways guarded by sentries, the narrowing of wide channels into gorges during war time by the pressure of industry agriculture and transportation purposes, were the purposes of the meetings, but the thought of relief and preventing an about absolutely crystallized in the prayer for immediate aid from the authorities of Angeline Angeline.

"The government ought to begin with fifteen billion" said one of the mayors. "No earthquake disasters, and we sure can do that for our other nations during big storm and much money it takes to carry on the war. The national Abbeianian government is strong enough and rich enough" said he. "To expend one hundred billion a year for the duration of the war on the future future protection of waters of our country from Glendelinian vandals. Anything then less this amount would be false to the cause, and would not produce the desired effect. All the people of this glorious nation sit idly by and demand upon the royal Congress to pass legislation sufficient to take care of all the need of waterways, flood control and shipping horrors during the remainder of the war." This mayor said it absolutely plain that he attended the appropriation for the entire country of Abbeian, from one coast to the other, while others expressed the opinion, that the amount suggested was not quite large enough, that for the Mic-Murthier River basin alone into which the drain of the principal waters of nearly forty nine states out of the hundred, and lesser streams from many others. He also received a telegram from Count Dr. Biff reading in part--

"I and my followers will work along with you on any of the things I know you want us to do. The enemy must be prevented from making future floods, and shall."

The chief engineer of the Calvernia general country division of one hundred state waterways gave a detailed explanation for the recent floods, and predicted thus:

"I'm sorry to say gentlemen that no matter what is done as long as this war continues nothing can stop the enemy from making floods. There will during this war from now even not be still more serious floods and many disasters which will not be record. The best way to prevent this is drive all Glendelinians out of Calvernia, and give them no quarter."

His recommendation also was that the purchase of the states would be on of no avail. "The very bigness of the problem challenges the whole nation" said the mayor of Big Girl Knool who had urged the immediate creation of a committee committee of levee engineers to prepare a comprehensive plan of preventing the enemy from bursting more river dikes and levees. And on the assistant chief of the Big Girl Knool river levee districts also urged the appointment of a board not of only flood control but of the prevention of hiding places for all Glendelinian snipers, and that all places that could be hiding places should either be destroyed or garrisoned by Christian troops.

"The most dangerous situation of all during flood disasters, is the fact of so many sniping the refugees and preventing any of rescue" he said. "That surely can be prevented if we only try. While presiding at the meeting at Big Girl Knool in particular, Count Dr. Biff received from Baron Carl a telegram urging him to join in an appeal to emperor Vilius for either the permit to have the armies wage a no quarter war on the vandals Glendelinian armies, or a special session of The royal Congress or a national conference of that sort, the war should be carried on on such a ruthless enemy like Glendelinian... However the possibility that the whole system of for future war flood control in every river valley and lake, or dam might have to be changed as a result of the losses in obligations ordered by emperor Vilius was expressed at the royal palace at past agreements Abbeian. There the whole problem was of such magnitude that those who acted in emperor Vilius's plans, the latter being at the edge of Vilius's glory just now, felt that when flood control methods should be considered as impossible while the war lasts, and that the only next best thing to be done was the construction of a levee in such a fashion that it would take too much explosion explosives to destroy even one section, but that to keep enemies away from the levees at this time this was

Q. No man can therefore charge the fate of these unfortunate people to any failure on their own part, and they did not fail. Either nature has raised an equal to the charity of their country men, and therefore things were done for flood sufferers; that even made other nations admit and love Algonquians, and also willing to do their best to lend aid and condolence when they did go far Albia in Algonquians going according to this story planned it, Algonquians, etc., and let our nations know we could not really be held to any one but Algonquians, not to even say that God did it just because the guidance shows us that.

And if such a Glandelinian nation expects quarter for their stock, no one I believe can see why they do, or understand why Abolitionia puts up with all these horrors without striking back ten fold. But a catastrophe has come and gone to the people of southern California and northern Angelina, most of the flood still left in freedom over, and Glandelinia will have, pay by and by, and pay extremely well you.

an line stood back from the last section of the snow-covered camp of the main christ most gloomy part of the Mac-gollies Woods, and to hide the main strength of the fortified works there were many long narrow lines of seemingly unending railings appeared to be a frail protection from the expected surging attack of the glendalians should they issue forward once more.

In front of the works to decide themselves further, there were long lines of half armoured horse, buses, drays, drams, vans, and broken wagons and machinery of every description, and guards who passed up and down were so shabbily dressed, that they appeared like men who were either going to work in the camp or coming from it.

Other openings also a more desolate set of rifle pits had small piles of old half rotten lumber in it, another exhibited second hand furniture, chairs with unsteady legs, sofas with horsehair and other material bulging out of holes in their coverings, bedding, beds, stoves, a morose mirrors, with blotches in them.

The whole interior of the woods were as gloomy as the forest in the first dark story, especially of these known as the "lighting trees". And all was mostly alike. At certain parts were dangerous ravines ravines one big opening in the woods looked like a large scotch flagged yard. The whole region was shabby and cheerless on the brightest days of winter of sou summer, and in foggy or rainy or snowy days it was the most forlorn place within the whole christian most that was the thoughts of a certain boy scout as he stood within sight of one of the Iron rail fences, watching the countless numbers of soldiers at their drilling or at work, on the morning morning after the distant battle of Loughas they glanced at him; "What a fine strong boy guards! he would make for the Vivian girl Princesses." And every time they saw his face they would again and again look at his face. His was not of an Anglo-American nationality, or half the face of an Abbeismian, e the like, and was not a day dark in coloring though his face had a severe pugnaclio character which seemed to prove he was a boy who could not be daunted. In anything, and defied everything. His language was French, but he could speak English, Russian, Spanish, and also had learned the Latin tongue of the Abbeismians and the allies.

color of his hair. He was an ex-Angeliniian as any one could imagine, and all he soldiers who continually observed him were always struck by the silent look his whole face assumed, a look which suggested in expression that he was a boy who never talks much to any one, any of pretty girl a children, but fierce and dangerous to them when aroused by them of seriously offended. He had a look on his face this time which was more noticeable as he stood near the wall faces watching the soldiers at their drill, and work, the weather being only moderately cold. And to day he had certainly thought that thought's the would have brought a man's face itself a very unpleasantly expression. For to day he was constantly thinking of the long slow, and perilous journey and his big company of boyscouts and their officers with general Greathurst had made during the last two weeks, through cold waves, fierce blizzards to general Greathurst's army.

Norothy Gale (University) to General Greathurst, he had been cramped in a close the noise of the worse war they had ever heard of soon.

He felt sure however that if necessary he and his boys could night stay within a christian army a full year, or it may be prove to be in the middle of some night, or day his general of his army would send about leaders leader night when his from his sleep and say "General get out of bed quick, and dress yourself immediately. We need you somewhere else at once. General Advantages orders".

A few days or weeks later his and his very regiment might be back in goryth sale, Angelina Gathania, or Betsy pobbia, and to hide their true purpose to be muddled away in one of the powerful fortresses guarding these places.

n heavily o upon him and always sat him to deep wondering.
In not one of the boy scout regiments he knew or the one he commended had he ever yet met a boy who was like himself. Many other boys had commissions w in which they proved themselves capable to being grant boy scout heroes, they had gone to the boy scout schools regularly before the outbreak of the war and played with other boys and even girls, and altogether of the things which happened through out the war. But he and the four boys who were with him were different. They were in the Penrod regiment in a camp long enough to make a number of boy scouts. He knew that he must never forget that his whole existence was a most tremendous secret, whose safety depended upon his own silence and discretion for himself, and the whole nation.

When his boy scout company or regiment marched down a company street, all soldiers turned to look at and watch them, even oftener than they turned to look at him, and the boy scout leader felt as if it were not merely because he had command of a grand regiment, brave and well drilled, but because they looked somehow as if the leader been to command armies, and if as if no one would dare think of disobeying them.

But whether they were in one country or another, or going from one army to another, or from camp to camp, and how to turn, and whatsoever dark places of the prisoner camps they seemed to be hiding in, the generals and all the soldiers, the way they saw traced him and all his boys with a great spirit of deference, and they stood when they were in their presence unless he bade them to be seated.

He knew well about it, however and spoke and understood its language as a Meridian man. His father and mother who were now dead had continually spoke about the nation and its interests from ever since that day when the simultaneous killing of Crowley, Lawrence, and Jennie-Wren-Town had been fought. His school teacher had taught him to know all about it by personally he, pointing him to study curious detailed maps of all portions of Abbiassinea, maps of its cities, maps of its mountains, rivers, railroads, and everything else. His teacher had told him, and showed him the long detailed a story of the cause of the struggle, the wrongs done to the nation at all parts by the horrid wicked killing of child slaves by the rebellious landelinian states of Angelina, and their untold hellish suffering; and landelinia's wicked struggle against the cause for the childrens liberty, and above all, the experiences of the daring girl Princesses, and their unusual and most unconquerable courage even during dark dare-devil recklessness, and of their saintly ways, and their excellent lovelinesses.

As they talked together of the ensuing struggle, the perils faced by the pitiful African girls, the indescribable sufferings of the child slaves, the sad slavery of the worst Mandolinian cruises and their generals, Penrods boy blushed and leaped in his veins, and he always knew by the looks in the teachers' faces that though he was a German and that Angelina or Abbieaunna's welfare should have concerned him, that his blood burned also.

new was a difficult problem. But the people of the whole nation were given and giving again, and the excitement caused by the disasters was increasing the size of the army in an astonishing way. Even the poorest people were giving, even children were sacrificing their best. Many villages and towns, and even cities have had their population tripled or quadrupled by destitute refugees. Their own resources were becoming exhausted. They all gave more than would believe, and the people of Abbeinnia despite these disasters were demonstrating daily their courage and their abilities, and men, women and children by millions.

The unfortunate Galverinians, for not taking part or siding with the wicked rebellion had seen their helpless child children murdered countless number, they had themselves been robbed, their own soldiers had died of wounds by the hundred thousand while prison prisoners of cruelities, others by starvations, but their souls had never been conquered, and through all the months during which more powerful rebels arms or ice crushed the federals, they had never ceased to struggle with their enemies to free themselves, and aid the child slaves to a stand unfettered, as children of other nations always did.

"And why did I not have the chance to go and live there!!!!!" Penrod had cried one day after school was being let out. "And why is it I am only boy yet and not a great big man and a soldier? I would give anything to go over there and fight for God, if only I was a great big man. I would go over the seas and fight for Abbeinnia, and ever die for her cause."

"If you wish to serve Abbeinnia and her cause it would be better for you to live and die for her, working at every duty night and day," his teacher answered. "We must deny ourselves of everything possible to train our bodies and souls, to use our brains more than anything else, and to learn all the things which are best to be done for Abbeinnia and her cause. Even any unknown exiles in every nation may be Abbeinnians—I happily know some of them, but unhappily you are not one."

"Do you know any one of the exiles then?" asked Penrod. "Yes indeed," was the answer. "And he told me if ever he had the chance to set his feet on Abbeinnian soil he would give his life to it. Many have already given their lives even since they were the smallest boy or girl, and they will give it until they die. I am one of them had the money to go to night and maybe take you with him."

"Have you ever been to Galverinia or lived in her for a short time?" said Penrod.

At this moment the boy noticed that a strange look appeared in the teachers face.

"No," he answered I never was there. "and he said no more. Penrod watched him and knew therefore he must not ask the question again. The next word the teacher said, was about certain promises. Penrod was a very little boy at that time, but he understood the solemnity of a sacred promise and pledges, and even then felt was being honored as if he were a great general in chief."

"If you ever wake up your mind to go to Abbeinnia you shall learn all you may wish to know," the teacher said. "Now of course you are only a very young child, and I do not wish to burden your mind. But even now if you really side with Abbeinnia, and her cause, you may do your part. I know many children who usually forget that breaking sacred secrets may be dangerous not to a cause but also to themselves. You must never forget this. To break a promise or secret betrays you and causes your destruction. And no matter where you are in Abbeinnia or any of her states, even wherever you have playmates, boys or girls, or should you even meet the Vivian girl, or the Emperor of Abbeinnia itself, you must promise to be silent and never reveal any important thing unless commanded to do so. You must not speak of ever knowing me, what I do in my profession, what country you come from or of anything you will be sent to any part of Abbeinnia, in her more northern states, or rebellious states to go. You must not mention the things in your life, or anything you may even see the Vivian girl princesses do. And do not offend them. They are as good as and as lovely in manners as they are in features, but if they are angry or offended, its stand from under. Remember that."

As a foolish mischance might be betray anything to the crafty Mandelinian spies and secret service agents, you must keep in your mind not to reveal even a secret to the Vivian girls themselves. For the Country's cause, even though you are a boy who generally dislikes girls, do what you can to get in good stand for or with the Vivian girls and this may help the cause win out and bring you in good favor of them. You are a descendant of the oldest people of Canada, while I am a German subject, and there have been persons in every nation in this world claiming to be descendants of Abbeinnia who would have died a thousand deaths in a day rather than betray any secret entrusted to them. Therefore if you are willing to go to Abbeinnia to serve her in her cause, you must learn to obey everything without question, just as if you were of the Abbeinnian Germani. Now as I know you wish to do so, you must take your oath of Allegiance to her cause."

The teacher then rose from his table and went to the corner of the schoolroom. All the curious children, boys and girls saw him kneel down, open a small door in the wall, and take something from it. It was a large crucifix, and a sword from its sheath. Then the children noticed the teachers desk, he drew also suddenly stiffen, draw itself up, and his deep gray blue eyes flashed. "Before all the children in the school room he was to take his great oath of allegiance, both upon a crucifix and a sword for Abbeinnia and her cause as if he were a general. The brave little lad who was to really turn out one of the best of the Vivian girls to the enemy, did not become conscious even then Angelina Aronburg or opening and shutting with a most fierce understanding grip because those of his hand had long, for or long centuries past carried swords and sacred sables and fought for them in the Crusader wars."

The teacher first gave him the big crucifix, and stood erect before him, while all the children remained silent and respectful.

"Now Penrod repeat after me sentence by sentence," he commanded. And as the teacher spoke then Penrod echoed each one as loudly as he could. "The Crucifix in my hand bestowing my love for God and his holy country of Abbeinnia."

"The sword in my hand for God and his Abbeinnian Country."

"The swift ness of my sight, all my actions, all the thoughts in my brain, are as life of my life for Abbeinnia."

"Here goes a good boy for the cause of Abbeinnia."

"Death to Mandelinian traitors of Mandelinia, and child slave holders."

"Down with the Rebellion, and with victory for a good cause, God be thanked."

Then the teacher put his hand on the brave child's shoulder, and his own face looked almost fiercely proud.

"From this hour," he said "You Penrod and I are comrades at arms. I'll see to it you all go to Abbeinnia as soon as possible. I'll see my Abbeinnian friends this we now from that day to the one on which he stood beside the iron rail fence the Sun Beam Creek Camp Penrod now a boy scout whose capt capture would cause a new hundred million dollar reward to any Mandelinian officer, and a hundred million dollar reward to any Mandelinian soldier, and ten million to the lowest soldier, had not forgotten the hours he had been in general concentration Aronburg more than once before, but not to the regions where the fortified positions were up along the scorebound unbroken creek, however he always made it a habit when ever he brought his daring boy scout regiment a second or third time as some army he always selected a quarter that was new to him, for certain now he did not wish to see again the strange people he had before seen. He had been occasionally slight like links of acquaintances with officers, men and women, but he did not know how shabbily or well uniformed, but they had been easily broken and separated. His foster father, general Maldonia, a heart to whom the Mandelinians had never advised him against making chance acquaintances. The general had in fact always told him that he and all the Mandelinian generals had reasons for not wishing him to hold himself aloof from boy scouts, or officers and men.

only barrier which existed between them was the barrier of silence concerning secret operations, wanderings, and the like from army to army, and from one of the war stricken country to another. He had to be more careful for thousands of other boy scout leaders of all nations, therefore they would miss nothing from his own boyish talk when he did refuse to mention his own works when he was spending his first days in war stricken Galverinia he was to spend only of Abbeinnian places, and the Abbeinnian people, and their customs. When he went through Abyssinika, Angelini Dondobia or Angelini he knew he must do the very same thing. And when he had learned the language of the Abbeinnian nation Penrod did not know. Since he came here he seemed to have grown up in the midst of the Abbeinnian tongue which soon became familiar with him as all languages are to children who have lived with them until one scarcely seems less familiar than the other. Penrod did remember however that general Great heart had always been unwavering in his strict attention to his pronunciation and also the method of speaking the language only of the country he came from.

"You my dear boy, since you are now here must not show as a foreigner in this country until your character is well known. He had said to him. "It is absolutely very necessary that you should not. It is even dangerous to your life. All the insurgent Angelinian generals, even general Mac-Holleston Johnston and the Menleys themselves would give anything, sacrifice anything, even their lives in order to see you destroyed so dangerous you have made yourself to the Angelinians for even the short time you have been with us. When you are with us a longer time you must not appear to know German, French or English or anything but Abbeinnian. Scores of millions of Angelinians for these last months and ever since are still still combing, nay scouring the very world itself to capture you for the sake of gold and the cause you came to fight for, and for your own life be as careful as you would a jewel."

Once a few weeks before the bloody battle of Lieghburg landing after his regiment had done some excellent service, saving many regiments of soldiers from traps, a strange boy scout leader to try Penrod had asked him if he had ever seen the virian girls or, if he knew who they were.

"He had seen the famous virian girl heroes, knew them well, and had asked me if I had ever seen them or knew who they were." Penrod said later bringing the report to general Goncentinian Aronburg himself. "I said I had not. Then he asked if I would like to have the chance to see and speak to them, and another boy had said he had his companions had heard lots about my own work when they call heroes which almost outrival the deeds of the virian girls themselves and asked me whether I would like to have a commission in their bands of boyscouts or not, to join the virian girls, and I was so embarrassed, and felt so scared that I did not know what to tell those boys. I'm afraid I could not bear to meet the virian girls."

At that time he had returned from the signal corps and he put a grubby little hat on the great generals arm and clinked and almost fiercely shook it. "I wanted to say that accord according to what those beautiful little little girl Princesses were I was not surely worthy enough to belong to their band of special scout scouts, that I surely was not like them, in character, not at all and would not have the nerve to even meet them. And yet I do long to see them, to be in their presence to be with them, but do not dare think of it. I get shaky as if with the argue. Yet I knew I am not of their kind though I may be worthy of such a position. I confessed to the boyscout that I was not a real Abbeinnian but only a patriot for her cause, though I did not reveal my nationality, and declared that the virian girls were too good for me. Yet I'd give my life for even them the virian heroes who I have never yet seen." And Penrod said it grandly, and with a queer emotion and indignation, his black head held high up, and his eyes almost angry. General Goncentinian Aronburg laid his hand against the boys mouth.

"Hush, hush Penrod," he said. "It is not an insult the boys made about the unusual girl children of the world. If you should have a chance meeting with the virian girls, you would have better times, and happier moments, and if they saw you or knew you, your deeds would bring you the highest boyscout commission known in the world, and you would win their life loving friendship as well as their highest companionship and favor as other boys have done. Some time my friend you'll have this good luck. The virian girls are looking for such boys like you."

The great general was smiling but Penrod saw him hold his head up high too, and his eyes were glowing as he touched touched his shoulder.

"I know you did not tell the boys your real nationality!" He ended. "What was it said to them?"

"I said that I heard many stories about them, that they were nearly always writing stories of scenes, and drawings, leading scouting parties, directing generals and other officers, against the enemy, and everything else, and I merely said that they were the worlds greatest hero and heroines, but I did not know all the things they did—and many generals claimed it was a most dangerous and dangerous and most reckless trade for them to be the Abbeinnian Princesses. I once heard you say that once to his Majesty Robert Angolio virian their father. Was that right to tell them that your Excellency?"

"Yes providing you know boys to be trusted. Then you may tell all you know especially when you are asked. They are brave enough little Princesses to write a hundred thousand different things against the rebellion, and to do things which bring them such respect, love and honor. There seems nothing strange in their being writers, girl scouts, and code readers. When you ever come to fully know them to speak to and be a companion to you will be able to understand them better and won't need to be afraid of them."

So general Goncentinian Aronburg answered him and told him lots of things about the brave virian girls, and their deeds, and from that time if by any chance anyone enquired of him of his chance of meeting the worlds greatest heroines it was simple enough and true enough to say that he knew nothing about them but what he heard, but that he would be glad to see them if possible.

In the first few weeks of strangeness to a new christian camp Mario Penrod often drilled his boy scouts, or marched them on scouting tours and a great deal of other duties. And one to his surprise while on one of these performances he noticed seven of the most beautiful boy scouts of horseback watching him with great admiration but he did not do anything more but salute them and continued his duty as unconcerned as ever. They were the virian girls and he did not know it.

He and his whole regiment of brave boys were very strong and untiring and therefore it amazed him greatly to watch his regiment past these seven boys on horseback, or to go out alone and look at or help as much as his boy strength would allow in the erection of batteries and fortifications, and to pretend to review the drills of the armies.

He did not confine his regiment to the great thoroughfare on the outer part of the great camp but kept within the main interior or branched off into the side company streets and presently deserted and odd looking squares of the vast encampments and even courts and alleyways in the ardent hopes of coming within sight of the much spoken of virian girl heroes. Never did he think that these astonishingly beautiful boys on horseback were the very Princesses who in disguise had returned to the camp from a scouting tour and who had stopped and watched him drill his boys for nearly half an hour. He had often stopped his drilling to watch artillery men, or gunners, and talk to them if he granted the time. In this way he hoped to see and make the acquaintances of the virian girls, hoped to meet them in his strollings, and learn a good many things.

He also had a fondness for everything he saw, but never once to his knowledge had his main wish gratified yet, though he had seen the seven most beautiful boys of many occasions, and had even spoken to them and shook hands with them, and went with them on small or long scouting tours.

He did not know that the virian girls were not in Goncentinian Aronburgs army just now but in his very own and that he had actually been out with them while they were in disguise.

It was very full this first morning, and he therefore wished he was sent on a important mission, or given some something to do, or some one if not the virian girls to speak to. To do nothing whatever when in a big army camp is a depressing thing at all times but it was more especially so to Penrod who was always used to a life of activity.

This portion of the besieging christian camps as he saw it in the Sunken gulcher-Greek region seemed to him a most tedious place. The stretch of snow bound woods was dark and sombre looking and the camp full of dreary home sick looking soldiers and officers.

now was a difficult problem. But the people of the whole nation were given and giving again, and the excitement caused by the disaster was increasing the size of the army in an astonishing way. Even the poorest people were giving, even children were working their best. Many villages and towns, and even cities have had their population tripled or quadrupled by destitute refugees. Their own needs are even because exhausted. They all gave more than could believe, and the people of Abbelemnia despite these disasters were demonstrating daily their courage and their abilities, and men and women children by millions.

This was not the first time he had seen the same sights, and everything he did, made him have the feeling that he wished, he, and his boy scout regiment had something more thrilling to do than to signal with flags and other materials. Suddenly he turned away from the iron rail fence, and went into one of the big tents to speak to Lieutenant General Cromer. He found him in side the large tent.

"I'm going for a stroll." He announced to him. "Please tell His Excellency General Greathart Heart if he happens to ask for me. He is very busy just now and I must not disturb him."

General Cromer was writing something on a large piece of paper when Penrod spoke he stood up suddenly to answer him. This lieutenant general was very one obstinate and always very particular about many certain forms of manners toward allied boy scout leaders and the like. Whenever a boy scout or any kind of an Angelinian officer was near him, nothing would oblige him to remain seated.

At first Penrod had thought it was because he had been strictly trained to do this.

He had also noticed for some time that even General Concentin in Aronburg had had much trouble and the greatest effort to make him lay aside his habit of saluting when any important boy scout spoke to him. So one day Penrod had heard Concentin Aronburg say very severely indeed: "I have been thinking of you."

"Perhaps Lieutenant General Cromer, I remember once you had forgotten yourself, and had stood at military salute, while the Vivian girls in disguise as dirty urchins passed through a certain outer outskirts of an equally large camp as this where thousands of soldiers were out and at work or drill.

So for God's sake I hope perhaps you can at least force yourself to remember when I tell you, don't salute any one who is in disguise in public. It is not safe for you or them. You put them, the whole army and even yourself in the greatest danger."

It was evident that this helped the good officer to control himself. Penrod always remembered that at the time of Concentin Aronburg's rebuke, the Lieutenant had actually turned very pale, and had struck his breast and poured forth a torrent of "Abbelemnian dialect" in penitence and terror. "May he was so excited that he wept like a small child."

So though he no longer saluted any one in disguise, he however refused to omit any other form of reverence, and ceremony ceremony- and therefore the boy scouts and become quite accustomed to being treated as if they were as high as the generals themselves.

"Yes sir..." Lieutenant Cromer asked. "Where is it you wish to go?" Penrod for a single moment knitted his black brows a little in making an effort to recall where he had been the last time since entering the army.

"Lieutenant Cromer it seems I have been to and in so many places, and have observed so many things, the fury of battle or the violence of enemy attacks, and other things since I came here, that I am afraid I must start learning again about all the armies I do not quite remember were."

"Yes sir indeed." Said General Cromer. "So have you through so many experiences during your service in the war so far. I also forgot. You almost got killed in trying to warn some captain of an Angelinian regiment during the recent battle of Lieghburg Landing."

"I think I will go and find General Hanson Vivian and then I will walk or ride about on the outskirts of our lines, and learn something distant of the rebels if I can." Penrod said.

"Yes sir." Lieutenant General Cromer answered, and this time seeing no one else around he made his military salute.

Penrod lifted his right hand in recognition as if he were saluting the Angelinian Emperor himself. He had at first noticed that most of the Angelinian boy scouts had made themselves look very awkward and even theatrical as possible when making the gear gesture, but Penrod himself made his salute with ease and as natural as the soldiers did, because he had been familiar with the form, before he ever came to Abbelemnia, and joined her armies.

He had seen many of the Angelinian officers returning the salutes of their men or superiors, when they encountered and passed each other by chance in the camp streets, he had seen see a general passing the sentries on their beat more

August army personages raising the quiet hand of complete recognition to their shakos as the officers occasionally rode through the crowded crowded camp streets. He had seen many many unknown generals, royal persons, and many royal Angelinian pageants but though standing at the edge of the crowds of purple coated soldiers, he had never as yet seen Violet and her sisters violet and her sisters who without disguise, or any of their hero or heroine friends and company companions except Angelinia Aronburg. He however was a most most energetic lad, and had not spent his days and months in going to a going from one Christian army to another without by every day chance becoming familiar with the outer life of generals, and other commission officers, and royalties.

Penrod had stood by when the highest generals rode past with glittering columns of soldiers on foot or horseback before and behind them, and a populace of soldiers shouting courteous welcomes and praises. He therefore knew where in various great encampments the sentries stood before kingly looking officers or their tents. He had seen certain faces of generals often enough already to know them well, and to be ready to make his salute, when generals and other officers passed him by.

"My boy, it is well to know every Angelinian general and other commissioned officers, and it is well to do your best to observe everything that is going on, and to train yourself to remember all faces, and also every circumstance relating to all the causes of the war." General Greathart had said. "If you were to have your wish gratified, and to have a chance meeting with the beautiful Abbelemnian Vivian girl Princess's, you would by learning their experiences, be thought to notice and remember all kinds of persons, and soldiers, and also things as you had been thought to speak the Abbelemnian language with such great elegance and all such observations of the enemy's doings as would be your most practical accomplishment would bring you in their highest esteem. And to accomplish such purposes it is as practical for one boy scout leader as another. For certain boy scout leaders as all others for a private boy scout as for one whose place is to be in the highest commission. As you cannot have the chance to meet the beautiful Vivian girls in the ordinary way you so desire, you must expect to accidentally meet them during your travels, and daring adventures. You must not lose your chance on anything forget not even a thing, in your most perilous duty."

It was General Greathart who had thought Colonel Marco Penrod everything about the Angelinian camp, and in that short time he had learned a great deal. General Greathart had the power of making all things about boy scouts duties interesting to fascination. To Penrod it seemed that the general knew everything about Angelinia's cause, and the world's opinion of it in general. On account of the rigors of the on going siege of Evangelina Crania they were not having much time to go very far, but General Greathart knew the treasures of the great city of Vivianwickley, the resources of all its largest and smallest sections.

During the time he had to spare he or Penrod walked or rode through the endless galleries of the camp, and to the highest point to show him the formation of the beginning of the most greatest siege in the world, the besieged city itself filled with probably the most savage and wickedest Angelinians in the world, and pictured before him the enormous multitude of besiegers, which would make an unbroken procession of soldiers last for centuries. And also because the general could describe for him the burning work of millions of still living soldiers whom all the powers of the besieged could not break back, because he could tell the stories of all those soldiers living and laboring to triumph, stories of what the besieged felt and suffered, and where the boy because as familiar with the cause of both sides, as he was with the cause of nations that fought in many wars.

And all the highest or lowest Angelinian generals were not as superiors to him, but men who were very great in a Most Holy Cause, men who seemed to him to wield beautiful swords from heaven and held high splendid lights.

General Greathart was not able to go with him on these tours often, but he always did take him often or did often to take him for the first time since he entered the army to view all parts of the besieged woman's section. Then having seen them once through his own eyes Penrod, now was a difficult problem. But the people of the whole nation were given and giving again, and the excitement caused by the disasters was increasing the size of the strain in an astonishing way. Even the poorest people were giving, even children were mortified their best. Many villages and towns, and even cities have had their population tripled or quadrupled by destitute refugees. Their own resources were becoming exhausted. They all gave more than could be believed, and the people of Abolitionist see, its these disasters were demonstrating daily their courage and their abilities, and men and women children by millions were working.

went again and again alone, and so grew very intimate with the wonders of the sea, and the almost unnatural resistance of the foe. And he knew indeed, that for certain reasons he was gratifying the wishes of the general when he tried to train himself to observe all things within the camps of the besieged and forget nothing whatever. To view all distant parts of Vivian Wickey, and the marvels of the distant glandelinian camps and fortifications, and the mighty St. Paulinean fortress was like being in his school room again, and this strange but dangerous education for at these works he was always under fire from rebel artillery! was the most interesting as well as the most exciting part of his life.

In due time he knew exactly the places where the great Pygmalion, Mic-Allister, Stanok, Ruben Mac-Hollister, and Delight Barry Page and other glandelinian chiefs were situated with their titanic insurgent armies. He knew whether this rebel division, or that was in the for Angellian army, near Corna Catherine, in Julio Callio, in Vivian Wickey proper, or the main fortifications of Lucille Pickens and Collyer and Stanok. He heard many conflicting stories about these glandelinian generals and their rebel Angellian armies and the strength of their positions and batteries.

Any boy wandering to amuse himself on high points of the Christian camps, could see what he observed, but boys living fuller and less lonely lives would have been less likely to concentrate their entire minds on what scenes they looked at, and also less likely to store away facts with the determination to be able to recall at any moment the mental shelf on which they were laid. At a certain time having lost hope in ever having the chance to meet the Vivian girls, and having nothing to do whatsoever Penrod began to make a sort of game out of his perilous rambles outside of the limits of the Christian lines, and to view the places which whether they were the weakest glandelinian works, or not were to him something very unusual. There were always the blessed free days when he and his regiment of boys could climb any high hills, and to the top of the highest pine trees on the summit, and from there view the distant Mic-Whirtherian fortifications facing the sea toward Vivian Wickey, without being seen by the rebel signal boy corps or signal station corps. Once on top of some high hill and on top of the highest trees on the summit, there were immense crowds of rebel soldiers to be seen within their own almost snowed in encampments, and even rebel boyscouts, but there were not often boys anywhere whether on the Christian side or the foe as young as himself or older than he. On all occasions he was a quiet and orderly boy, but even on the hill top facing the coldest weather, he found himself stared at. The greatest scouting game which Penrod had created for himself was very absorbing and as simple as any boy could ever make it. He always tried to see and remember as much as possible and describe to general Greatheart as much as he observed, when they met together during spare time, and talked of all he and his boys had seen.

What ever filled Penrod's happiest hours was the long talks during his leisure hours. At this time Penrod never felt lonely. And when the great general sat and continually watched the lad with a most curious and deep attention, in his reflective eyes, the boy scout was contented and comforted. Many times the boy asked serious questions about the strength of the Mic-Whirtherian fortifications, and general Greatheart always related to him the full rich story of everything about Vivian Wickey he wished to know. He told stories so splendid and so full of color in the telling that Penrod could not for get them, and liked to tell them to his comrades.

now was a difficult problem. But the people of the whole nation were given and given again and the excitement caused by the disasters was increasing the size of the army maintaining law and order. The people were given what they needed.

CHAPTER TEN.
PENROD LEARNS THE HEROISM OF THE VIVIAN WICKY DURING THE REIGN OF TERROR IN VIVIAN WICKY.

As PENROD walked through the Company streets of the camp he was thinking deeply of one of these stories, and it was one he had often heard when he had first come to serve as a boys-out in the Angelinian armies, and it had also seized upon his strongest imagination, so that he had often asked for it.

Indeed it was a part of the whole of the history of Vivian Wicky during the siege, and the harrowing and thrilling experiences of the Vivian Wicky, and their narrow escapes, and for that reason he had loved it more than any other. Many other officers had often told it to him, and very often adding much detail, but he had always liked best the version of general greatheart, which to his imagination was a very thrilling and living as well as interesting thing.

On their long journey from Dorothy Gale, during an hour when they had been forced to wait in the cold and driving snow in the railway station at little, little girl Knoll, near Conservatory run on the "Mc-Hollister and Pandora Rail Road, and had found the time long, general greatheart had discussed it with him while stamping up and down to keep his feet warm. The general had always during the long stop over of the train found some way of making hard and comfortless hours easier to live through.

"That boys-out colonel is certainly a fine brave lad for a foriegner who sides with our Holy Cause." Penrod heard an Angelinian officer say to a colonel as he passed them that morning during a heavy snowflurry and wind. "Looks to me as if he was some noble lad of France or of England."

Therefore what led his thoughts back to the story of Vivian Wicky was this, he knew that most of the Angelinians who looked at him and called him a brave "foriegner" had heard and knew more about Vivian Wicky than even general greatheart did.

Those who chanced to recall the existence of the recent "Reign of Terror" in the Norma Catherine section of Vivian Wicky, knew of the "landelinians" who were in possession as the fiercest Oasians and pursermannians of the entire landelinian nation, and the most savage and cruel.

Penrod heard, Vivian Wicky was to be the main termination of the rebellion. Before its capture by the rebels the landelinian authorities had observed that the city and its surrounding fortifications were so placed, and so well formed and placed so that if once possessed by a strong garrison it could so control and so keep it in order that without blunder, none of the largest powers could besiege it successfully four years.

At the Galverinian authorities had not strengthened its garrisons at Emperor upon Vivian's orders. Of course they were not for "landelinia" but were overconfident as to the strength of all the fortifications and the size of the city itself.

The "landelinian" authorities at the outbreak of the rebellion sent large armies which took possession themselves. Because the fortifications were erected the Angelinians it was often said that Vivian Wicky was one of the most strongly fortified and beautiful Galverinian cities in the world. It was one of the oldest cities and had been celebrated for its long peaceful happiness, and with as well as for its size, beauty and the big river running through it, a favorite Galverinian legend was that it had been the site of some ancient

In all these great measures that the City had stood, its people had been of innumerable race, as well as of other nationalities, and physical beauty. But now not of its own fault but of Catherine's foolish whimsy, it had been compelled to turn itself over to the gladiatorial authorities, and the commander of this vast rebel army was bad and weak in character. A ill his life he had been a most extravagant vicious man, of most furious temper, and of the Jewish race. He was jealous of his Country, and of the English nation, and he tried all he could do to help his Country win the wicked rebellion by repelling the most fierce, fiercest troops, and the most extensive the world ever heard of.

fiercest rage, and the thousands of the Irish who sided against He ended by saying, while an assassin of the Irish who sided against He the Revolution and the cause, caused in one week a greater horror than a whole year's crime of the Reign of terror in Paris during the French Revolution.
 There were some of the most frightful slaughters the world ever conceived but mostly of children, and savage new orders, and imprisonment of millions of men women and children, slavery by hundreds of millions of dollars and again squandered with the purpose to resist these barbarians, and until poor poverty and starvation happy for the first time to save the surviving inhabitants in the face.

After the wonderful almost magic escape of Violet and her sisters from normal gatherings during the height of the Reign of Terror in Vivian Lakey, the author, Elizabeth, suddenly broke forth in the most furious rage.

Though born of Abbie and Annan parents, the given girls were totally unlike any of the best Abbie-Annanas known; and despite all perils, they were true pure Royal Abbie-Annan p Princess'es, they were even prettier, and more braver and more righteous! For their age than any known children or person in the whole world; and they were probable an handsome in features and form; as the most beautiful beautiful ancel in heavens."

More than this, instead of having girlish hearts, they had hearts like lions, and no man had the bravery or nerve to do what they always dared. Many song-composers had made many sweet songs about them, and thrilling songs and marches about their young valor and righteousness, and their queerly kindness, loveliness in manner, behaviour, and courtesy, besides generous friendships with every one even wounded rebel prisoners.

Not only the soldiers of the army sang them, but the people throughout the world; the best and bravest of the Angolanians had always feared them; they were even jealous of them, even before the outbreak of the war, when they were just beautiful stately children, whom the people roared with joy to see as they rode through the streets of Angolanian Amthia. When the disappearance of the given girl was discovered, and it was learned who had rescued them, the Angolanian generals and the Angolanian authorities were more furious and enraged than it would take a million years to tell about. When the population of soldiers began to clamor for the desecration of the given girl, that is, to let her sisters, and demanded that they be led out of their prison to their deaths, the general in charge of the prison discovered that they were gone, having escaped by the help of some one who frustrated the drivers' intentions of taking them to the slaughter pen. This discovery was reported to general Purgatorian, who became insane with rage (he was always crazy) and fury and swore and blasphemed like the demons in hell. The soldiers ran and thus themselves. They stormed all the prisons, and all the houses, killed and overpowered all the prisoners who attempted to make any resistance, and rushing even into the tri tribunals burst in upon the judges, while other prisoners shuddered green with terror and fury at the terrible deed of the insane rabble.!!!!

..... "The vivian gnake girl Frba Princepsus must be found or vivian wickey and round the afrighted prisoners would be no more....." They roved as the huge crowds close "Wore Jive Wime was the vivian girl Princepsus, who shot them in their faces. helped them who wattle the vivian girl Princepsus, who shot them in their faces. They must recover the christian dog who kidnapped them from Banton Prison! who they whom & they wanted, those destruction would probably win the war of the rebellion for, lamelins, or in her favor, hundreds of thousands per day searched all over one section of the city alone, while the streets of other sections were combed for them, a lunies to house search and everywhere else. It was evident the vivian Girl had escaped out of the city, and either hid- den themselves, or by thimself of their kidnapper reached the christian lines in the rebels failed to find Violet and her sisters. "Try and find themf you can." "One of them said with derision. "They have escaped and I am glad of it."

"They have escaped you christian hellhound!" He shouted. "If we do not find them it is because thou has helped them rats to escape, and for that thou shalt be a dead man."

This failure to locate them set the mobs of plantations all afire with a hotter turning. They forebore and every day broke into every possible hiding place, even into sewers and tunnels, and guarded all streets and houses, and raided a 11 build plantations by night, and did everything possible to locate them. When all the the viridian girls we re not found among them.

They sought them with a frusky, hursting down doors of all houses, and even flying down all obstacles in their way. One kind cowardly prisoner owned that he had seen a strange person with a bull dog expression of face kill or nearly kill two night three days before the virgin girls in a closed carriage in every nook and cranny high and low, the rebels sought them believing that they were hiding in some secret place, or had escaped to the christian lines. As the fury of the escape of the and the fury of the ginslindings at the escape of the virgin girls grew to a greater frenzy every outside town, and other places in possession of the ginslindings authorities were armed and searched. There were places searched for hundreds of miles, even the whole country side was scoured, and secret service men by scores of thousands went inside the christian camps in perfect disguise, and searched and kept their eyes open for signs of a plot and her slayings.

But no trace whatever of the victim girls were found. To the wicked, landlowners they had vanished as air-vanishes when it drops from the sky. During one of the worse rotings of the landlowners many of the best christian nobles then prisoners were killed. A powerful tribunal he headed one of the worst massacres learned that the victim girls had been taken away by a christian spy called Siegmund. From that time all the most desperate efforts made to capture him. The christian armies were torn and wracked, because the enemy were bound to kill him. The gladiators assassinated all christian officers they could, and offered great rewards for his capture, and greater rewards for the recapture of the victim girls. And his captors, and greater rewards for the recapture of the victim girls, and places throughout the city and country side within or without the range of scope.

He was sure where the Yvian girl Princesses had gone, or whether they had reached the Christian lines belonging Yvian Iskey, or whether they had died in needless fights with their pursuers, or through stress of starvation during their escape to the Islandinians. There were no more signs of their being in existence, still sung about the Yvian Isis, but the rebels had heard some of the old songs by the Islandinians, and they were suspicious. The song most noted by the Islandinians, and followed by the Angelinians and having the same tune was the song of "The Queen of May" was about the seven beautiful lost Princesses who were known as the Yvian Girls, and who had escaped from Yvian Iskey and were unknown.....

At that time Penrod had first heard the story about this, and when he had heard it he had been bitterly troubled by the unconvincing mystery of how they really escaped such a place when it seemed utterly impossible. And where had they gone -- the brave Abbotinnian Princesses? (Had they really been rescued or had they first escaped themselves or had they hid themselves?) That is hid themselves in some dark dungeon, and broken out when they saw their opportunity? Penrod mused at the story had diverse and invented for himself a hundred endings to the story.

Then he would say or ponder over and over again in a restless manner. On the first night after the great battle of Liepzig landing, as the boy and general sat together before a large stove in his big tent a big blizzard raging outside, he had been so unusually eager and had asked the general so many questions of a searching nature, that general Gneisenau gave him an answer that he probably had never given before, and which was an ending to the story, though to the boy it was not satisfactorily one to his liking.

he and his subalterns had been sent to scout from a mountain peak. The captain had said that going out in the early morning to scout from a mountain peak near the Norms run River despite the deep snow and the second cold weather, he had observed through his glasses through the snow in haste what he had at first thought to be a number of Omariar soldiers in possession of seven beautiful girls, female children going in the direction of the christian campus under general Hanson. Jivian. He feared some of the enemy had probably recaptured them, after the news of their escape, and the captain yet wondered ex coingly why they were so recklessly heading toward the christian lines with their fair child captives. He was however not quite confirmed. As to the reality of it. Since there were so many large scouting forces of the enemy roaming about despite the severe winter weather and the fierce storms, he was afraid to risk the use useless loss of his men in order to go in pursuit, or even afraid to speak of what he had seen, and by the time he discovered that the supposed Omariars really had the jivian girls in their possession, and that they were heading toward the christian lines, he at first did not know what to do.

The scene of which he witnessed was far from where he stood and while he was still so weak from apprehension that he was hardly conscious of what was going on, he saw the procession with the captives enter the christian lines, and disappear out of sight.

The captain, much disappointed, and feeling certain that in his duty he had failed to go to their rescue, went back to his own encampments, but was always in terror of having the bad luck of hearing that the African girls may have perished, despite the savage battles fought for the rescue.

"Yes in that case it would have been impossible," said Penrod. "But I don't even see how any one could have even rescued them."

As he walked on through the deep snow, and the thoughts as filled his mind, and excited him to such emotion that the expression that appeared on his face attracted attention in some way or other. As he was passing the main section of the camp, a well uniformed officer, very distinguished looking, and with serious clever eyes, and yet firm determined face suddenly caught sight of him and after looking keenly and seriously at him accelerated the pace of his horse as he approached him from the opposite direction. Any one else might have thought that this general, who the officer really was saw something in the boy scout which surprised and puzzled him greatly.

"My dear boy, would you not mind telling me your name?" he asked. "I believe I have seen you somewhere before."

For certain important reasons Penrod had received special training ever since he entered the Angelinian army that was very extraordinary for had of his seen his love for Angelinian's cause, and the admiration had for the victim girl whom he had never seen yet as he believed believed, had made it natural and also ample for him and he had never asked questions for the reason of it. He had always been taught to keep silent and also to control the very expression of his face, and also the sound of his voice, and never allowed himself to give a startled look he did not start at the extraordinary sound of the English words suddenly uttered in a vast Angelinian camp by an Angelinian general he had never seen before.

The generals' clever eyes scrutinized the boy keenly, when after some moments he spoke in Abbin-annian:

"I believe you do not understand me! I asked if you would not mind telling me what your name is, because if I'm not mistaken, you are very much like some English speaking lad I have known to have been out with the yivrian tribe out on a scouting tour a week ago when in disguise." He said.

Fenred was astonished to almost a shock at this but without any signs of emotion he answered:

'I am Maroonian Parrot,' 'A 111/100/11' ((.))

The general smiled broadly and then looked straight into the boy's eyes. "I don't believe that is the name I expected to hear," he said. "It sounds a little French. So I'll beg your pardon my brave boy scout captain." The general uttered an order to his horse, with the purpose of gaining on his way and had indeed ridden a dozen yards away when again he halted his horse, and turned to the boy again.

"You may tell his Excellency, general Haldonia Greatheart that he has succeeded in making you a very well trained boy scout. I for obvious reasons wished to find out for myself." "And then he rode on for a few minutes Penrod felt that his heart was beating a little too fast. This same incident or this made him feel that though he was in the heart of the strongest army he had ever seen he was living among things so strangely mysterious that their very mystery was giving hints of some grave danger. But as far as he himself had been concerned he had never before seemed involved in them. Why should it matter whether he could talk English or the Angelinian tongue or whether he was well behaved or well trained. Then suddenly he remembered something important. The general had said to tell general Greatheart he had trained him well. Trained him well in what way? And also he said he had been seen with the Vivian girls while in disguise. And he even did not know what the Vivian girls looked like, or what they were in size or what horses they rode. For a moment he felt his forehead prickling slightly as he thought aside of the keen smiling look which the handsome uniformed general had set so straight upon him. Had Prince Jimmie of Vivian for he is was spoken to him so suddenly in English just to try him or for an experiment to see if he would suddenly be startled into forgetting he had been so strictly trained to seem to only know the language of the country. And Nation under whose Holy flag he was serving? And he being with the Vivian girls. When had he been with them? And how had he been with them? But fortunately he had not forgotten. He remembered everything well, and was thankful even to god that he had not accidentally betrayed nothing. At first Penrod feared persons of other countries were not admitted into the Angelinian army without permission from the government of the Nation they came from. But then he had nothing to worry on that for he had received his.

And it appeared, never had Abbeismia's state of Angelinia and others needed help as she needed it now. Only less than five months before, Vivian Wiskey Galvernia's capital had been captured, and since then it was apparent that the bloodiest war the world had ever seen was raging, and through the country for many hundreds of miles, the wildest tumult and disorder raged without ceasing. General Purgatorian was a powerful chieftain, and in Vivian Wiskey and all or powerful fortifications had a great following of the largest army of the worse and most savage Omarians and other glandelinians known. On account of the horror going on at all sect ions of Vivian Wiskey, and the cutting off of all trade throughout the Christian world by the siege, distant and neighboring nations had tried as stated before to get the two sections of Abbeismia to mediate between each other for their own welfare sake but in vain, and all news papers throughout the world had been of stories of the most savage and violent battles, and atrocities, and of starving and homeless scores of millions.

Penrod had after returning returning late one blissful afternoon from a scouting tour on foot entered general Concentinian Aronburg's headquarters for shelter from the wild winter storm, to find that general general pacing to and fro like a caged lion. A strange looking paper crumpled and torn in his hands was in view and his eyes blazed like fire.

The boy suspected the general during a short time of rest, had been reading of the great cruelties wrought upon men women and children in Vivian Wiskey and that the Vivian girls were still missing. The general's aide-camp was standing inside the tent staring at the excited chieftain with huge tears running down his cheeks. When Penrod entered the aide-camp suddenly strode over to him and led him gently out of the tent.

"You will have to pardon me my dear Penrod," the Aide-de-camp said sobbing. "No one can see him just now, not even you. The poor general is suffering badly from the effects he has just read."

The Aide-de-camp led the boy to his own camp tent, and he stood by the entrance and bent his grizzled old head, and old as he was wept just like a small child who had just received a licking.

"My dear blessed mother, ask god and tell him it is usually in time now to give the child slaves their freedom." He said and Penrod knew the words were intended for a prayer from broken heart, and wondered exceedingly at the abject frenzy of it, and the intensity of it, because it seemed so wild a thing to pray for, the freedom of enslaved children, who on account of the situated a situation of the war it seemed so impossible. When the boy reached the vicinicity of the outskirts of the Christian lines, he was still thinking of the handsome Prince who had spoken to him in English.

Even as he looked carefully at the distant rebel positions he was still thinking of them. He rode nearer to try and count the number of the enemy's tents and stone barracks, and size up the strong land fortifications of Thumbelina and Weyna. He also intended to make a note in his memory of the size and form of fortress Marcucian and its entrances, and guess at the size of its navy.

This he did because it was a part of his duty, and part of his strange training. When he rode back to a more well able spot he saw that approaching the company street of Company Avenue a large party of Abbeismian generals and other officers. Penrod halted his horse and watched with the greatest interest to see who the elegant officers were. He knew that these Abbeismian generals, and the salwade of officers with them who usually returned from important scouting expeditions and tours looked more like well uniformed Angelinians, excepting that in stead of lavender uniforms they wore scarlet. So Penrod thought perhaps if he waited he might see some of those well known faces which represent the highest rank of commissioned officers and power in any Angelinian and Abbeismian army, and in which in times gone by represented also the power over child slavery and the cause of Liberty. Then Penrod said to himself:

"I should very much like to tell general Greatheart that I have seen Prince Jimmie of Dondobia and know his face, as I know the faces of many other Christian generals."

There was suddenly the arrival of another group of officers all generals of the highest rank, all in purple uniforms designed like those of Kings and Emperors and the like. And in the lead was a handsome majestic looking man attended by another just like him but taller and stouter who rode along side of him. The column of generals halted, as they met, saluted, and then forced into one and they all started onward toward where the boy stood. Penrod was able to see them all distinctly. There were seven beautiful boys and two girls were asking if interested. With them were seven majestic looking of the party were asking for General Aronburg but the other two he did not know. The face of the majestic looking officer in the front rank was the face he had seen often in all newspapers, lectures and the like. Penrod made his quick formal salutes they rode past.

The two main ones in front were Emperor Robert and Hanson. The seven boys he had seen before and were out with twice but knew them not as to who they really were. The Emperor smiled and he and all the others returned the salute and then he spoke to his nearest companion.

"That fine boy scout captain or colonel salutes as if he belonged some royal family." was what he said though Penrod could not hear him. A handsome companion leaned forward to look clearly. When he caught sight of the most singular expression came over his face.

"He is some lad indeed." He then said, "He belongs to a coessionion that puts him at the head of all t he boy scouts in the army though he does not know it. His name is Marcellian Penrod." At that moment Penrod caught a plain glimpse of him for the first time in his life. He knew it was the general who had spoken to him in English and who had the keen eyes. It was Prince Jimmie. Penrod indeed had wondered most exceedingly if he had heard the words but as he had been too far to hear them he turned toward his own part of the camp wondering at other things. Any man who was the likeness of the Abbeissian Prince or who would be in great attendance on Emperor Jivian must indeed be a person of the greatest importance. Penrod felt sure that the Prince and other high officers knew many things not only of his own country or its language, but of the count countries of other kind knig kingdoms and also Presidents.

But few Angelinians or Abbeissians had ever really known any thing of poor Angelinia, and especially Calvernia, but of the horrors of the titimes war, and how could it be that Prince Jimmie Jivian could speak the English language. It would indeed be very interesting to tell his experience to general Grathenart, that one of Emperor Jivian's sons, Prince Jimmie Jivian had spoken to him in English and had sent that curious mysterious message, and had told him he had seen him out with t he Jivian girls. Later when he rode on he began to pass an opening square in t he camp which was considerably cleared of the deeper snow and alush and which was near the border of the great Mic-Holleston woods, and paused to look at it or up it if you please to mention.

The opening square was very wide and bordering it on either side were such tall handsomely striped tabours and circus like tents that it at once attracted his attention.

It looked as if it were the headquarters of some officers or generals of the highest rank, while at the distance the beautiful foliage of evergreen and popular trees that grew up around the Square hid it from view. This was the kind of scene any boy liked to ride through for the sake of pleasure, and also curiosity and adventure. He knew many of the handsome squares in the camp, in even the oldest quarters. He had resided in some of them. He could find his way back to his own quarters from the other end of one of these squares. There was another thing very its beauty and queerness attracted him. He heard the sound of boys talking and he wanted to see if they were scouts like his own, and what they may be doing to excite attraction. Just now he had a lonely feeling and therefore he had followed every boyish or even girlish clamor of play or wrangling and had found many friends among both sects. Half way to the eastern end of the square there was an arched passageway of big pine trees.

He heard the sound of the voices coming from that direction, one of the voices being high and thinner, and shriller than any he had ever heard before among boys. Penrod therefore rode up near to the arch of trees and dismounting from his horse looked cautiously down the passage. The arched passage opened on to a larger one more formidable portion of the camp shut in by a wall of gigantic tents and barrack barracks. The boys to his surprise were not playing but attentively listening to one of their number who was explaining to them some thing he had read from an Angelinian newspaper called t he Angelinia Agatha daily news. Leaving his horse fastened to a tree, Penrod walked down the passage, and listened also standing behind a tree at the end of the arched outlet, and listening to the boy explaining what he had read.

He was a handsome but strange looking lad with a normal forehead, and deep set eyes which were curiously sharp, and he had the expression of a bulldog when excited. But this was not what attracted Penrod's attention. He had seen a fo firm strong, yet slim boy body, and his legs seemed powerful like that of a boy prize fighter. He sat with his legs crossed before him on the top of a high wooden box disregarding the cold wind then blowing, and the flurry of snow fluttering about him. Near him were sixty five of his boy comrades and each were armed with small rifles and boy scout pistols.

And one of the first thing that Penrod noticed was that the boy had a savage and dangerous feature of his face, which were marked with lines as for some reason only known to him, as if he had been angry all his life. He was as for some dressed in uniform as his comrades, and seemed to be their general or leader, but he did not speak in the Angelinian dialect but something like it nevertheless. He spoke in the Abbeissian to g tongue. If he was one of the National boy scouts as his companions were he was somehow different.

Then by chance the strange boy scout saw Penrod who was standing behind the tree in the arched end of the passage. "What are you standing there listening for?" He shouted in a furious tone of voice. "Are you a glandelinian spy?" And he at once drew one of his pistols and forgetting that Penrod was only a boy was hiding and shattered some bark all over him. And what Penrod did not understand was that another Abbeissian boy scout should want to fire a shot at him like this, and also in fact did not like it that three or four of the other boys promptly took the matter by up by drawing their guns to fire at him. He therefore without any fear walked straight up to the group, and even into them, and stopped close to their leader and demanded:

"Why did you shoot at me for?" "You see the color of my uniform?" And he asked this in his rather deep young voice. All of the boys who were grouped there could see that it would take more than all of them to overcome him in a free fist fight, he was so big and strong and that he was also a boy it would not be easy to dispose of. But all this was not the cause which made the group of Calvernian boys stand still and stare at him.

It was something very unusual in the boy himself. It first was a kind of lack of anything like excitement or anger at the attempt to shoot him down. He stood there before him as if it had not mattered to him in the least if they all had fired at once. Neither did he appear insulted, or angry. He only appeared curious about it. Despite the fact that he was very slim, and his hair and his uniform well brushed, and designed like a boy scout colonel, they had the impression by his peculiar appearance as he stood behind the tree in the archway of trees that he was a young glandelinian boy scout having entered the lines and poking his nose where it was not wanted, but as he drew near and came among them they saw that the uniform was worn by a lad they had heard about, and that he was well trained, and well behaved.

"Why did you fire that shot at me for?" He again asked in a tone as if he only wanted to find out the reason, and not looking for a fight. "The reason is that I'm not going to have you disguised glandelinian boy scouts dropping in on us as if it were your purpose to spy on us." Said the Calvernian lad.

"I'm not a glandelinian boy scout spy, and I did not know you were holding a scold." answered Penrod. "I heard you boys talking, and I thought I would come and look. When I heard you explaining something about the Arcburg Mystery, as they call the Bu Situation at Jivian Wickey, I wanted to hear for my own good." He looked at the leader of the Calvernian boy scouts with his expression but silent eyes. Then he added "But you needn't have fired that shot. They don't allow you to fire at any one without warning in the Angelinian camps. But if it suits you I'll go away."

He turned about as if he were going on his way, but before he had gone several yards, the Calvernian boy scout leader halted him suddenly and most unceremoniously.

"Hey you boy scout in purple." He called out "Hey."

Penrod stopped.

"Well what is it?" He demanded.

"I bet you don't know how far Jivian Wickey is from here, or what the glandelinian rebel states are fighting t he Abbeissian Federal states for?" The boy scout leader fairly threw the words at him.

"Yes indeed I do. Vivian Wickey is northwest of the region of the Mic-Hollester Run river, on the western coast line of Calvernia. Three large mouths of the Norman gun River divide the great sections known as Mic-Whither Janet, Je Julio Galio, and Norma Catherine and Vivian Wickey proper, and Norma Catherine and Julio Galio are the main sections. And the glandelinians are fighting because they wish not only to gain their freedom for a wicked reason from Abbesmnia, but to do it with the horrible child slavery as well, and as our own governments are fighting to overthrow this most unjust and most wicked of rebellions. And why should glandelinia be allowed to win? Her's is a wicked cause, almost as wicked as a rebellion against God, and for that cause they do not deserve their freedom...."

"Oh..." reluctantly admitted the Calvernian boy scout leader. "You certainly do know your geography and history don't you? Come back here!" "AAAA" Penrod immediately turned back, while the group of boy scouts sit still stared hard. It appeared as if two boy princes, of two different countries were meeting for the first time, and their armies looking on wondered what would become of the encounter.

"The fierce Gamarins of general Purgatorina are the worse lot of all the glandelinian soldiers in glandelinia, and only want to see the war ended in their favor for wicked cause," said Penrod speaking first. "They have assassinated all the christian nobles in Vivian Wickey, hundreds of thousands of men and women, and two million children, and they care nothing for power-powerful Abbesmnia of or of her opposition of glandelinia's child slave trades. And the traitor and insurgent government of glandelinia, and the ruler who should not be there, only care for money, power, and luxury, and the violent power to make laws, which will serve glandelinia's purpose, and crush every weaker christian nation. The glandelinian government knows that in their capture of Vivian Wickey, they have the power and means to carry on and maintain their wicked rebellion, and also to keep the world from butting in, and that if general Purgatorina could force our vast armies to break this siege, and then do what they could to crush the opposition of Abbesmnia and win freedom from her, they would try to rule the world in their own way." "AAAA"

The fact that Penrod happened to speak first, and though he spoke in a most steady voice for a boy of his age, without a swagger he seemed somehow to take it for granted that they would listen made his place for him at once. At any time as any one ever knows the most impressionable creatures are boys in this country, and they know a leader, or a superior when they see one. The Calvernian boy scout leader fixed glittering eyes on Penrod. The rabble of Calvernian boy scouts began to murmur.

"Rattlesnake, Rattlesnake." Several of the boys at once cried out in good Angelinian. "Ask him some more questions, Rattlesnake."

"Is that what the boy scouts under your come cow and call you?" Penrod asked the Calvernian leader.

"It is what the glandelinians call me," he answered in a respectful tone of voice. "The Rattlesnake. Look at me. Don't I appear as vicious as one? Taking the enemy by surprise as often as I do. Look at me. Do you wonder that they call me a Rattlesnake?" He demanded.

"You made yourself be called one on purpose," Penrod answered. "Do you do it for fun?"

"No not exactly," said the Rattlesnake. "When I think of what the enemy does, I feel like one. Every one of the glandelinians is my enemy. I'm vermin, a rattle, snake to them. I can fight and defend myself though as if I were a Rattlesnake. I can shoot good too."

And he showed two fierce looking automatic colts, and a row of fierce strong daggers sharper at the points than daggers usually are. "I fight like a fiend when I'm surprised by the enemy, and the glandelinians try to capture me. I've shown some glandelinian generals some things they won't forget in a hurry." And the Rattlesnake boy laughed a shrill squeaking kind of laugh. "One of the worst glandelinians have captured me yet, and they've always chased me far and far. When he laughed again and still more shrilly...."

"Purgatorian is a most dangerous man. Look out for him. I'm onto his game, and give him a life for the recapture of the Vivian girl Princesses. I'm thirteen and a half now. How old are you?" "I'm ten years and four months," answered Penrod. The Rattlesnake boy twisted his face so obviously.

"I wish I was of your age and size. Are you a general's son? You look as if you were." "I have no real father or mother nor relate relation of any kind," was Penrod's answer. "But general Heldonia Greatheart did adopt me, and takes care of me."

"He's sort of gentleman to adopt you and get you a commission besides." "That's the name of the highest of all the glandelinian generals?" "Yes," said the Rattlesnake boy. Then suddenly he threw another question at him.

"What's the name of the highest of all the glandelinian generals?" "Yes," said the Rattlesnake boy. Then suddenly he threw another question at him. "What's the name of the highest of all the glandelinian generals?" "Yes," said the Rattlesnake boy. Then suddenly he threw another question at him.

which betrayed nothing whatever. And it was true that no one in any nation throughout the world (in this story) could open a newspaper, book or magazine, at this period without seeing news and stories of the great war now raging. The Rattlesnake boy at this time saw some possible chance of important information opening up before him.

"Sit down here please," he said, "and tell us what you know about the 'vivan girls. Sit down also everyone of you fellows. It's not too cold and you can stand at for a while if I can."

At this point there was nothing to sit on but the hard frozen ground partly covered with hardened snow and ice, but to them who had seen hard service in all kinds of weather winter or summer it was nothing, even the smallest matter, because they were used to it. Penrod himself had sat on a broken flagged pavement, bare ground, or any place often enough before, and so had all the Angelinian boyscouts in the army. He took his place near the Rattlesnake boy and the other boys forming around him made quite a semicircle in front of them. The two leaders of boyscouts, one a colonel and the other a marshal had not joined forces so as to speak, and the sixty flower followers fell into line at attention. Then Penrod began to talk. It was a good long narrative, that of the lost Vivian girl heroines and indeed he told it in a manner that held them all spell-bound. And how indeed could he help it. He knew just as well as they did, that everything about them, their ways and manners and heroic deeds were real. And also all about the fortifications around 'vivan wickey.

He had poured over every map of all parts of 'vivan wickey and the country outside of it since he was eight years old. He had studied maps and all geographical books about Abbiennia and her states, and though yet he was a stranger in western Calvernia, knew of the Abbiennian states as a great righteous country, where if need be he could find his way to any part, if even he had been dropped in the deepest part of the Mic-Hollister woods, or any mountain or hill in Angelinia. He knew every high way and byway and all of the country on both sides of the Big-girl Knoll road running from Angelinia Agath to Calvernia a distance of 1,000 miles. And he could have found his way blind-folded in any part of 'vivan wickey or the rebel fortifications. He knew all the captured Tribunal buildings, the ins and outs of every gigantic fortress, the poor streets, the rich ones, and all the seaports of 'vivan wickey.

Some few months before 'vivan wickey was captured by the enemy, general Grathheart had once shown Penrod, a plan of all the gigantic Mic-Whirtherian fortifications, which they had studied together, until the boy-scout knew every part, their barracks, and all parts in them by heart. But this he did not speak of to the Rattlesnake boyscout, and the others. He knew from experience that it was one of the main things to be silent about when in the presence of strangers, for who among those boys may not be an enemy in secret? But of all other things he could speak especially of the mountains. He could speak of all parts of the city because he could offer a good enough reason for his knowledge of it. He could make scenes of many of the wide streets and the emerald covered roofs of the Tribunal buildings, and he could describe where the three mouths of the Norma Catherine gun river divided the three wider sections of the city, and of the number of inhabitants it held or did hold. He had more than one reason why he had knowledge of 'vivan wickey, but the one he mentioned would serve enough.

"The papers and books you read, had more than one article about Abbiennia in it, and the stories about the Glandelinian uprisings." He said it to the Rattlesnake boyscout. "The daring war correspondents, and news reporters get all the accounts they can, even risk their lives for it. I had met one reporter who had seen the full battle of Lighburg Landing from start to finish, and who therefore knew a great deal about it. He said it was one of the most violent battles raging, in one of the most beautiful country regions he had ever traveled in, and the most fertile. He said that all who witnessed that bloody battle say that its violence spoils the beauty of the whole country."

The group of boyscouts before him knew nothing of 'vivan wickey or her surrounding fortifications. They only knew the Christian camp like, and life in the own country. Most of these boy scouts had not been allowed to travel far outside the Christian territory on account of the fierce winter and of the enemy scouting parties. And in fact if they had not seen the Mic-Whirtherian fortifications and the lost 'vivan girls, they would have believed in their existence. All of these boys were a very rough lot, and if indeed they had stared at Penrod at the very first sight of him, they stared still more as he talked. When he finally told of how 'vivan wickey was captured, the strength of the insurrection army resisting the still larger army of besiegers as if it was no siege at all but a war game, the reported heroic exploits of the daring 'vivan girls, their youths fell wide open.

"Believe me," "If I had been one of the Lords of the Calvernia in one of the audience, and his exclamation was followed by fifty or like nature from the others. When Penrod told of the long seemingly endless chain of cannon along the sea board of 'vivan wickey, and of the deep endless fortification line, and of the strength of the Calvernia garrisons forced to a surrender to Purgatorian, and of the youths obstinate battles for the possession of Julio Callico, and how the enemy finally won out in the end, and about high deeds and bravery on both sides they were excited. This was the sort of thing to allure a boy's imagination. The boys did not understand how it could be possible that a Glandelinian army could in so short a time capture so many strong fortresses, even so foolishly neglected by the Calvernia government. They did not really know that the garrison strength had been a handful compared to the size of the rebel army. They heard more or less of the Norma Reign of Terror, all through the story of the lost 'vivan girls, because since their escape from 'vivan wickey, they had been to all appearances mysteriously missing. Both sides were still scouring the lowland woods and other regions for them.

When Penrod pictured the dazzling beauty of the 'vivan girls, as also strong despite their delicate appearance, winning everyone with their goodly ways, when they were sailing and all talking among them, the boy scouts grinned grimed with great pleasure, and did not know they were grinning. "I surely wish that the 'vivan girls had not been lost." "One of the boys cried out.

When they heard of the unrest of the Glandelinian authorities over the rescue of the seven Abbiennian Princesses, and of the wide and close search, the boys began to get very restless themselves. Yet when Penrod began to reach the section of the story, in which the immense masses of armed Glandelinians rushed into the Tribunal and all buildings and prisons possible, demanding the 'vivan girls to appear and surrender, they ejaculated scraps of if not bad words, were words enough to excite some ones attention at once. "I'll bet they went and hid themselves in some secret place, or maybe some sneaking assassin killed them from ambush, that's what may have happened. You never can tell what those fierce Glandelinians are up to." They clamored vigorously. "I wish a lot of us had been there then—wish indeed we had. We would have given the Glandelinians something they were not looking for anyway."

"And they being held so long in one of the prisons of Norma Catherine just because they are Christians." Said another boy. "If they had escaped of their own accord some assassin would have followed and killed them." He decided with an exclamation of boyish wrath. Somehow the fact that the beautiful 'vivan girls had either been reported rescued, or escaped from 'vivan wickey, and then were mysteriously missing, made them feel more savage. Their language was extremely bad now at this point. But if it was bad here it soon began to get worse, when the apparently cowardly captives or whatever he had been saw what he believed to be the seven Abbiennian Princesses in the midst of a column of gray-coated soldiers heading toward the direction of the Christian lines.

"I'll bet they had been done for them. The glandelinians must have surprised the yivian girls in an ambush. And seeing they were heading by mistake toward the christian lines, must have not given them any chance to see escape, and may have murdered them. G-r-r-r-r." They all groaned in chorus. "Wish we had been there when the glandelinians recaptured them. We would have done anything to rescue them."

Indeed Penrod was telling a story which had a most strange effect on the Calverinian boyscout leader, and his followers. It made them think they saw the scenes he mentioned, it fired their blood as if they were the witnesses of the exciting events, it set them wanting to fight like the soldiers did it, and also for ideals beyond their means, most adventuresome things beyond comprehension, for instances, and the high and noble yivian girl Princesses were a and had already shown themselves full of the possibility of great and brave deeds.

Sitting upon the hard frozen ground, in the square they were suddenly dragged into the reality of it, and to them the noble young yivian girl Princesses became as near in their visions, as if they were standing before them. And then came the retreat of the captain or colonel and his squadron when as the boys believed he should, he had failed to go to their rescue. All of the boys held their breath, why did the old colonel fail to serve them in their time of need? Penrod who was absolutely lost in the very recital himself, told it as if he had been present at the scene. The boyscout indeed felt as if he had, and though for the first time he had ever told it to thrilled boy listeners, his own imagination got him entirely into its grip, and his heart jumped in his breast as he was sure his own father even would have done. And then there was no more to tell-----no more, where the story broke off entirely, and the semi-circle of boyscouts gave forth something like a low howl of dismay.

"As gee wizz." They vigorously protested. "The story oughtn't to stop there. Don't you know any more to it?"

"That is all that I ever know really, and that last part is only a sort of story told by the captain or colonel himself. But I believe it myself that he was held on the charge of cowardice. And the penalty of cowardice is death."

The boy whose name as the Rattlesnake had listened to the story with flashing eyes, all through the story he had sat biting his finger nails, as was a trick of his all his life, when he was excited or mad with anger. Then he suddenly exclaimed:

"I'll tell you what I believe happened. It was some of the Omerian soldiers who retook them after they had been rescued by that man who was called Seigmery, and mistaking the christian lines for their own in the blizzard and confusion, ing darkness they headed for it with the purpose of killing them. They meant to even kill Emperor yivian with the purpose to win their wicked rebellion. Some of the Omerians must have stabbed them in the backs the friends. I dare say they discovered the christian lines when it was too late and left them for dead and retreated."

"Right indeed you are. That was all of it." Agreed all of the lads. "And if they were not murdered and recovered from their wounds." The Rattlesnake boy went on in a feverish manner. "They could not find their way back to the christian lines without being fired on in ambush, and their poor father the Emperor, couldn't do anything even with his powerful army to recover them. And he then had no means to raise a vigorous search because after that so great a storm came up and which raged two weeks that nothing could be done. Perhaps in his sorrow he did not know what to do. I dare say that if they did not perish, they must have found their way to either the cities of porothy Gale, or Angelina Agatha, and remained there for their safety. Then perhaps as all communications had been cut off from Angelina Agatha, porothy Gale, and yivian wickay they had no means to let their father know where they were, though every person in either city may have known them, and of their flight from yivian wickay."

The Rattlesnake boy began to look revengeful, and "And I if I had been his Majesty Robert Angelic yivian I'd have told all my generals not to forget what the glandelinians did or had done to my daughters in yivian wickay. I'd have told them that if nothing whatever could have been done to find out what had happened to them, I'd see what my army could do for revenge." And I'd make all torture and killing and make the whole glandelinian country suffer for it. And not to give any quarter whatever. I'd have made them swear not to leave a glandelinian if they were too soft hearted to do so, they must pass their commands over to some one else. Wouldn't you?" He demanded hotly of Penrod.

It is no doubt that Penrod also felt his blood boiling, but he had talked often with a very sane man to have the same opinion as the Rattlesnake boy.

"No indeed," he said slowly and with conviction. "What good would it have done anyway. It would have done the Angelina states of Abbie-man a more harm than good to torture and destroy a besieged glandelinian any. Of course to do so is a truly worthy thing before heaven itself, for glandelinia deserves it, but remember what the glandelinians will do for revenge seeing how many children have been cruelly massacred and raped by them already, and it is better not to take a chance, and also find out the facts before committing such a big massacre. And if you are a real Calverinian par patriot you would think of your country's welfare first than committing a slaughter of so large an army of your country's welfare. Avengeful an enemy as glandelinia. He wanted to add that is what general Greathart said but he did not."

They are nothing but an army of rebels, traitors and murderers. What would you have daughters?"

"I'd have told him to learn everything about what may really have happened to my daughters, and everything about the scenes in yivian wickay, and the things the world would want to know about yivian wickay, and study things about the strength and size of the yivian wickay, and about keeping silent about securing the whole the Tribune in yivian wickay and about keeping silent about securing the whole Calverinian country, and if all this failed they could be ashamed for all their lives. And if I'm not mistaken I'd have asked him to tell his generals and their officers, and other officers, to tell their men and non-commissioned officers the same thing. So you see no matter how long the time may seem to be, there would always be enough men to look out for their appearance of the yivian girls, and they alone would bring joy to the nation." Then Penrod stopped himself suddenly and looked at the semicircle of boyscouts.

"I did not make that up myself," he finally said. "I have heard many Angelinian and Abbie-man officers say it. I believe the Emperor may have been having the very same thought. If he had and told them to tell his generals there would be whole armies scouring Calverinia, and perhaps without any one knowing it, violet and her sisters are walking about the streets of Angelina Agatha or porothy Gale, or maybe Ome town or Be tay pobbin now, and they would be ready to return if their father found out about them, and sent for them."

"I wish they would appear." One of the boys yelled. "It indeed would be a queer secret to know about their escaping all the time, when no one else would know it." The Rattlesnake boy commended with himself as it were. "That you were one of the yivian girls and you with your sisters ought to be with your father in his grand army and leading big regiments of girlscouts and commanding all the generals. I wonder if it would make the world look differ if they were here?"

Then he laughed his queer squeaky laugh, and then turned in his sudden way to Penrod. "But Emperor yivian would indeed be the biggest fool on earth to live up the vengeance over his loss. By the way what is your name?"

"Marrocia Penrod, what is yours. It is not the 'Rattlesnake' really." "It is James Mic-Givney Radcliffe. Where is your Regiment?"

"In Company C of Eleven." "I'm of Company A, Camp One." Said the Rattlesnake boy. "These boys are some of my squad. I'm called the Mr. Marshall but I'm really their captain. Tention sledhopper. Let's show him your skill." "Let's."

Suddenly the semicircle of boys sprang to their feet. There we re as I said before about sixty lads about her, and when they indeed stood upright, Penrod at once observed that they were for some evident reason accustomed to obeying the word of command with the greatest military precision.

"Form in single line!" ordered the Rattlesnake boy. They obeyed at once holding their backs, and also their legs straight, and their heads high up like soldiers. Each had sized their light rifles which had been stacked together. The rattlesnake boy himself stood up straight in front of them like some haughty general. He had all the military in his bearing that the highest general would have. His voice suddenly lost its funny little squeak and became natural and commanding. Indeed he put the sixty lads through the real military drill as if he had been one of the Angelinian generals himself. And probably the most practiced soldiers in the camp or barracks could not have made the drill as prompt and as smartly as these boys did. It made Penrod involuntarily stand very straight and watch them with the most surprising interest.

"That was certainly good, the best ever." he exclaimed when it finally came to an ending. "How in the world did you happen to learn that so well?"

At this sudden question the Rattlesnake boy made a savage savage gesture. "If I had grown up to be a tall man instead of being a boy yet, I'd have been in the ranks of the Angelinians as a high spirited soldier or officer." he said. "I'd have put in my enlistment in any Angelinian, winks Abyssinilian or Abbeysinian Regiment that would accept me. I don't care and would not care for anything else." Suddenly his face took on a change and then he shouted a loud command to his squads;

"Right about face he ordered." And they executed the movement with a promptness, and looked into the woods. Penrod saw that the sixty boys were indeed obeying an order which was not altogether new to them. And also to his surprise he observed that the Rattlesnake boy had suddenly thrown his left arm up over his eyes as if to cover them. It appeared at first to Penrod as if the Rattlesnake boy did not want to be seen, and as he held the arm in that position for several minutes, Penrod also turned his back as the boys had done. All at once the brave boy scout Penrod began to understand that though the Rattlesnake boy did not seem to be crying of weeping, yet he was feeling something strange which any other boy or girl would have possibly collapsed under. Suddenly with startling promptness he shouted almost shrieking;

"All right. Front face." and he dropped his uniformed sleeve arm and stood straight up again.

"I would give anything to go into battle." He said hoarsely. "I want to fight the enemy. I even want to lead an army of men into Vivian. I want to destroy the enemy for their treatment of the Vivian girls. And yet I'm too young. Some times it takes the pluck out of me to know the Angelinians murdered my parents, and two sisters and a brother and yet be revenged."

"You have not grown up yet." Said Penrod. "but you could do just as good deeds though. No one knows what is going to happen during this war. How did you learn to drill your boys?"

"I managed to receive my instructions from general Ricken at Barracks No. One. I also watched the soldiers at their drilling, and I listened to the commands of their officers. I also had followed the drafted soldiers at Camp Agut Ann, near Dorothy Gale, on their long marches and hikes. If I could get geographies and other books I'd look over the maps and maps and see also about the extent of this cruel war. I or my own boy officers have not the time to go on long scouting as often as you and your boy scouts do. All I have time to do is drill my boys, and signal to the generals during artillery duels and battles."

"If you can get the permission I can take you on some real sight seeing tours." Said Penrod. "There are places where we are liable to expose ourselves to the enemy's fire, and where no one else is allowed to go. And I can show you some good geographies too. I could get one from General Greathart..."

CHAPTER ELEVEN.

STATEMENT ON THE MYSTERY OF MYSTERIOUS RESCUE OF THE VIVIAN GIRLS, BETWEEN GENERAL MELDONIA GREATHART, AND PENROD.

"Can you?" said the Rattlesnake boy almost doubtfully. "Do you want to join my company?"

"No," Penrod answered. "I am in command of a full regiment. I would rather you would join me."

He said it because in his own mind he had found a sort of response in the queer look in the Rattlesnake's eyes. He wanted to be with him if possible to be with him for good. Strange as the Calvinian boy scout was, there was some kind of strong attraction in him. In his own way he had drawn a comrade company of rough Calvinian lads to him and succeeded in making himself their idolized commander. They obeyed him in everything, they listened to his stories, about his experiences and harangues about the terrible war, and of the battles, disasters and the like, they loved to let him drill them and give them his orders and so on. Penrod knew that when he told General Greathart and all his boys about him he and they would be interested. The Calvinian boyscout leader wanted to hear what General Greathart would say.

"I'm going to my own part of the camp now," he said. "If you are going to be here when off duty to-morrow and nothing important keeps me, I will surely come."

"We shall try to be here," the Rattlesnake boy said or answered. "It's our camp right here."

Then Penrod drew himself up smartly, and making his salute wheeled about and marched through the archway of trees and mounted his horse, and the sound of his horse's hoofbeats was as regular and decided as if it was a man keeping time with his Regiment.

"He's been drilled more than I have been myself," said the Rattlesnake boy. "He knows more than I do."

And he stood up so proudly that he almost burst his coat buttons as he stared down the tree-lined passage with new interest.

CHAPTER FLEVEN.
 ESTABLISHMENT OF THE MYSTERY OF THE VIVIAN VIVIAN GIRLS, BETWEEN GENERAL GREATHHEART, AND PENROD.

EVERYTHING was more than unusually still now, no firing being heard anywhere, and the supper the boy scouts ate with Penrod was somewhat scant than usual that evening; one of the boy scouts stood upright at each side of the table in the boy scouts mess hall and served all the rest of the boys with the strictest military ceremony. The lodgings of the boy scouts were kept as clean as soldiers would keep them and in good order. All objects that could be forced to shine were strictly polished and no one left undisturbed a single grain of dust and this perfection was not attained through reasons of military law, but even all of the boy scouts had made themselves extremely popular by taking up the work of caring for their own barracks and other army buildings occupied by them.

They all learned to do many other things in the barracks. Each boy scout carried or had in the barracks a set of table cloths, towels, tooth brushes and paste and other cleaning materials which they took good care of. They mended washed their own clothes, darned their own socks, and in the barracks fight all soldiers and boy scouts must face the fight with just and also cleanliness. They always held their own. All of the boy scouts had only beans, dry bread and coffee during their supper, but nevertheless the bread and coffee was good and the beans were wholesome. After supper Penrod went to general Greathheart's headquarters, and told the great general the story of the Rattlesnake boy and his company of rough boys. The great general listened attentively, just as Penrod felt sure he would with the same strange far away intently thinking look in his eyes. Penrod had always been fascinated by that look because to him it meant many important things.

It was probable he would tell a story of his own, and perhaps he would not. General Greathheart had a strange spell over the boy colonel in the fact that Penrod to Penrod he seemed a wonderful man, something like his father had been. Yet Penrod had a strange feeling, that general Greathheart's attraction was something like a sort of spell and of something that keeps one continually making guesses about him.

Penrod had always noticed that when general Greathheart stood and talked to his staff officers of the highest or lowest rank, he held his tall and powerful body with a grace that was so singular that every one stared. The general never was nervous, even under the hottest fire during battles, and never stirred or moved himself as if he were nervous or under uncertain when his own army was in peril. He was like in manner as if he had been general Stonewall Jackson himself. He could hold his beautiful and slender hands very still when talking angrily or excitedly, and he could stand without shuffling his feet, and could sit without any sign of ungracefulness or showing restlessness.

His very mind absolutely seemed to be bent on the law of telling what his body should do, and his fine limbs and nerves never disobeyed. So this great christian general could stand as still as a statue and with perfect ease and look even at his highest superiors when they were talking to him or giving him orders, and they always list listened to what he said, and looked at him, and somehow courteous and uncondescending as the manner of the generals were without fail it seemed always to Penrod as if he were giving an audience to his generals as great kings always give them. He had seen many generals and other officers bow very low or salute very respectfully when they walked or rode away from him, and more than three score of times it happened that some certain kind of officer had stepped out of the general's tent or presence as people do before some great and high sovereign.

And yet the general assumed a bearing which was the quietest and least assuming in the world.

"And they were all talking about the situation at Vivian Wickey. And every one knew the rumors of the lost Abbia-annian Princesses, the Vivian girls." He said ponderingly. "Even boys in that place."

"Yes he wants to hear about the situation at Vivian Wickey about the war--- and he wants to talk about the Vivian Wickey and their heroic companions." Penrod answered. "If he only had time he would go on scouting tours, but his general Maurice Costello keeps him busy at signals for other generals."

"The whole region inside and outside of Vivian Wickey is a blood drenched horror and the saddest place in the world now," said general Greathheart. "All the whole landelinnian army and the portions of the populace siding with the insurgents are mad with war fury, and all the prisoners not yet slaughtered are heartbroken and terrified."

Suddenly Penrod struck the general's writing table a resounding blow with his boyish hand. He even did it without any intention in his young mind. He even did it before he realized.

"Why should the whereabouts of the lost Vivian girls be such a strange mystery? They were reported brought out of Vivian Wickey at the Norma Catherine sect ion twice, by a man called Seignury, the most savage and clever of the fierce O-arian Scoundrels could not frustrate him. It is reported that the very slickest of landelinnian soldiers, detectives, secret service men, and the like, have been searching throughout the whole world for them in disguise. Only that person who calls himself Seignury knows where they are, and he is still at large. There is only one man in the wide, wide world who alone has had the knowledge as to their whereabouts and I don't know whether he is in our lines or not, but I believe he is. I do. And it's Seignury."

General Greathheart looked at Penrod's hot ten year old face with a very reflective and greatest curiousness. Indeed he saw the flame which had leaped up in the land, and which had leaped without warning, just as a most fierce heart beat might have shaken him.

"You mean who?" he suggested softly.

"General James Seignury he calls himself but who really is general Jack Ambrose Evans, and the whole world is wondering about him and the seven beautiful Abbia-annian Princesses he rescued. If they were only found the good old days would come again."

"It is fifty weeks since he or the Vivian Wickey Princesses left Norma Catherine and disappeared so mysteriously." General Greathheart still spoke softly.

"But your Excellency," Penrod protested vehemently. "Even the boy the enemy call the Rattlesnake thought the main thing you did, that no one even Seignury knew that that any one could say who could safely bring the Vivian girls out of Vivian Wickey with the most diligent search of the landelinnians was in full swing. And if he succeeded he would have to work hard and use all his caution to elude the clutches of his many pursuers, and perhaps he had they are still fugitives, and it may have been probable that the landelinnian authorities may have called to all distant towns in their possession, and told those local authorities of the escape of the most important of prisoners, and those local authorities may have telegraphed to others throughout the country, and the warning would have gone on and on. They surely would leave no stone unturned to find them. And what you said about them must be true. If they were anywhere within the lines they would make their appearance."

He suddenly sprang from his chair and stood upright. "Why if they are still alive, they may be partly hidden away in some distant Agelinnian or Abbia-annian camp or town, and when they read or hear about the search of both sides for them, and of the bloody fighting inside and outside and all around might y Vivian Wickey their blood may get red hot. We are really their own people their very own. They ought to go back to Angelina Agatha or their fathers army, they ought to appear and tell all the Angelinnians who they really are. Don't you think they ought to, Your Excellency?"

"It is not half as easy as it seems to you my boy." The general answered. "There are many countries and their governments who for their own safety would have something to say. 'Locallin' would have her say about the situation, and powerful Protestantia, and, of course, and even Mighty Abhis-anna can never be silent. But if the vivilian girls are as strong hearted as it is said about them, and know how to make a make many strong friends and escorts in silence, and obtain for themselves a most powerful guardian they might when it is more safer be able sometimes to openly declare themselves to all."

"But as mainly if the poor vivilian girls are hiding anywhere some person or slick Angelinian might be out looking for them. As it ought to be some old clever Abhis-annian, gemina who is very watchful and also a strong and bold patriot---" the boy suddenly stopped at a flash of recognition. "Your Excellency!" He cried out. "Your gracious Excellency. You are the only one who could probably find the beautiful vivilian girls, if any one else could. But maybe---" And again he stopped for a moment because new thoughts began to rush through his brain. "Have you ever looked for the Seven Beautiful vivilian girl princesses?" he asked in a hesitating tone of voice.

"For a moment or two he felt sure he had asked the general a stupid stupid and silly question---perhaps general Greatheart and all the other men had been looking for violet and her sisters, perhaps that was his main secret, and his greatest work. But general Greatheart did not look at Penrod as if he thought he was stupid. It was quite the contrary. With the same curiosity he kept his handsome eyes fixed on him as if he were studying on him---as if he were much more than a ten year old boy scout and he decided at once to tell him something strange and startling."

"My dear friend and comrade at arms," he said with the same smile that always made Penrod's heart glad. "You have made yourself a very fine boy scout indeed, and like a firm detective have kept your oath of allegiance. And you were only nine years old when you took it. You are now one year older. As you know silence is still the order, but you are man enough to be told more than others."

The general paused for a moment and cast his head downward and then lifted it and looking at Penrod steadily spoke suddenly in a very low tone:

"I am sorry to say that I have not looked for them." He said. "Because I believe I know where they are now."

"Your Excellency," but the boy scout said only those two words. He felt he had no opportunity to say any more. He had been trained not to ask any unnecessary questions for the order was silence still. But as the two faced each other in that magnificent tent, as two side-camps stood stock near the general, and kept their eyes fixed also on Penrod---there was some kind of a sign that the vivilian girls were somewhere around, alive, in probably some part of this camp this very moment. And general Greatheart, Penrod's own guardian knew where they were.

He glanced at the two side-camps but though the faces of these two officers were as expressionless as if they were cut out of wood or stone, Penrod at once realized that they also knew this thing and had always known it, and they continued to stare at him. General Greatheart spoke again and lowered his voice still more:

"The most dangerous persons the rebels fear the worse, are not violet and her sisters but the members of the Great Gemini, who are spies and great thinkers." He said. "The Gemini form formed themselves in a strong secret society of spies, about one hundred and eighty nine years ago. They formed it when they had no reason in the mind because of more common spies and most of them have already returned to the Christian lines from their search because their leader known as the Supreme Person discovered that the vivilian girls were living and knew where they were."

He looked at violet and the Supreme Person is also one of the head generals in Hano and vivilian army. This great Abhis-annian leader he served had always thought the strong geminian society to be a very strange mystery, but the men all of their members had the bearing and also the speech of men who had not been born work of their own, and caring for their own wounded, and sick, and rescuing lost ones were those of men who were well educated for their work, and had studied their duties well. But as they are, they are not so familiar or assuming, and never act like superiors over any one lower than their own rank. They are all of great stature, and in bravery, silence, and ability to keep secrets are most extraordinary. And instead of acting as superiors over them, the Supreme Person made companions of the officers and members under him, and either keep close together or separate, when going out on their duties. On once the Supreme Person took a hundred of his fellows with him when they daringly went through the whole rebel camp to hunt for the lost vivilian girls, that is violet and her sisters themselves. He found that every one of them knew every work of the Hic-Whirriton fortifications, as if they were their own homes, and that they were so familiar with the landolinian camp life and custom that there was no danger what whatever of their being detected.

Before they left the insurgent lines, the Supreme Person himself received legal permission from the landolinian congress in vivilian wiskey to go and have an interview with the terror of yornan Gatherlaw, General Rickmann Purgatorian. He also went among other landolinian generals and pretended to make friends with them asking many questions about the strength of the fortifications, the number of their guns, the strength of their garrisons and so on. One night during a fierce and terrible cannonading of thirty thousand cannon, from one side alone and sixty thousand from another, the Supreme Person was startled by hearing the strange songs about the lost vivilian girls which had not been forgotten within the very rebel lines themselves. Many of the landolinians spoke about the escape of the lost Abhis-annian Princesses, and told old stories about their heroism, and related the prophecy that they would be brought back, or those responsible for their escape would pay with their lives. The Supreme Person saw one very old landolinian suddenly totter to his feet and lift his wild looking face to the myriad of stars like jewels bestrawed in the clear sky above the city of fortifications, and he wept and prayed aloud in his own way that the great God in Heaven would bring about the recapture of the vivilian girls, or cause their certain destruction for landolinia's benefit. And then many others of the fierce Garians and other landolinians also stood upright, and lifted their war maddened faces to the sky. And though not one of these insurgents uttered any words the Supreme Person saw the tears of rage on their very cheeks, great heavy wet tears.

They were becoming the escape of violet and her sisters. The next day the Supreme Person and his followers went to the Northwest broken branch of the great landolinian fortifications where one of the most dangerous kind of fighting landolinians were garrisoned, and who knew more than others about the escape of the vivilian girls, or their rescue.

When he and his followers left the rebel lines a strong vigorous searching party was formed by the 8 Gemini to scour the country for the lost Abhis-annian Princesses, and all the members of it knew that the vivilian girls still lived they were concealing themselves somewhere for their personal safety, or were passing through the country as terrified fugitives. But for a long time the success of the Gemini was a small one indeed, and also though the search was by the enemy had been extending and growing ever since it has brought even then no success, and though their searchers of both sides have one all they could, and did their work also in secret, many searchers died in the skirmishes between each other, and though the Gemini and I know where the vivilian girls are, we do not for their safety sake tell what we know."

"Had the landolinians expected to be successful in their hunt?" Cried Penrod. "Had they been successful?"

"No, but the Gemini were the ones of those who found them were not given. And all of the Gemini in Heaven are well trained, and as well trained as we are. All this I know to be true, though I should have believed it was true whether I knew it or not. There has always been the strongest hopes for the return of the Vivian girls even when they were so mysteriously missing, and both sides were searching the whole world for them. Each of the Gemini before going to foreign countries to search took away the oath of Allegiance."

"You just as I did," said Penrod breathless with excitement and awe. "When a boy scout is only ten years old and to be so near the beautiful Vivian girls and yet not see them, and yet be told by Prince Vivian that I have been out scouting with them is a thrilling, and disappointing thing."

"He says indeed," general Greathart. "Maybe you were with them when they were in disguised disguise and you did not know it."

At this Penrod threw his hand up and saluted like a general.

"Even though I am a Canadian by birth, here grows a man for Abhis-nunin, and be thanked for the safe return of Violet and her sisters the Fair Little Princesses of Abhis-nunin." He said quoted. "and they are all somewhere. And you know your Excellency." "????????"

General Greathart slowly bent his head in acknowledgement, for many months the most secret work had been accomplished by the Gemini, and the Gemini are quietly has grown until it is much greater and much more powerful than any one ever thinks. The other Christian nations are already appalled of this fearful war young as it is, and of all this disaster and "Reign of Terror" in all parts of Vivian Vikikey. Their very trades and interests are terribly disturbed by the situation at Vivian Vikikey, and they are deciding that the sea ports of the mighty city must be opened, and so things can be counted for. There have been my dear boy, Angelinian patriots and others who have literally gave their lives in trying to bring this most important event about, by making friends of the most powerful Christian countries, and also working secretly for the future good of their nation.

Because Vivian Vikikey is so strongly fortified, and has a series of most powerful and extensive fortifications in the world, it is feared by the very Glandelinian Authorities, and feared by all other nations to boot, that not on y the whole Christian world but all the angels and other low creatures in heaven itself could not recapture Vivian Vikikey for Abhis-nunin in ten years. It almost appears to be true, but there are other great powers besides all heaven, and that is God himself, and you know nothing is impossible for him, no matter what the odds are or any.

put when it was falsely reported that the Vivian girls were recaptured, and also assassinated, and the great battle of Liefburg, ending broke out, there were great and powerful generals who began to say that if some leader of good blood, and reliable character were given the commission for bringing their safe return, he should be upheld. "????"

"Vivian girls, Assassinated." "???"

In his intensity of feeling Penrod dropped his voice almost to a whisper. "Why not your excellency, no one would have the ability or have the nerve to assassinate them. And if it comes through that they are safe----" though Penrod gave a slight little laugh (laughing) he found himself obliged to rapidly wink his eyes hard, because without warning he felt the tears rushing into them, and which no boy scout likes. "The Angelinian song composers will then have to make up new verses.---- it will have to be a lively and joyful one about how about seven beautiful Abhis-nunin Princesses were captured, escaped, and came back to their fathers army."

"On no count of their ways, the entire population of Abhis-nunin are a devout people to their princesses and rulers. When their return is opening known, the whole nation will chant prayers, and peasants and shepherds, will burn incense as an offering of thanksgiving to God." "?????" "Saif said general Greathart. "put the end of this horrible war has not yet come----the end is not here----but God alone knows".

All of a sudden Penrod remembered the story of his own he had intended to tell and what he had unknowingly held back until now the story of the handsomely uniformed Abhis-nunin prince who spoke to him in plain English, and rode on the right side of Emperor Robert Vivian. He felt sure now that it also might mean some very important news which he had not even thought of before.

"Our Excellency, there is some very important news that it pleases me I should tell you." He said.

All through his life general had the habit of relating experiences, stories and incidents in very few but clear words. And it was in this way he spoke to general Greathart. He had received this training from his own father. And general Greathart had declared that somehow the lad may have an important story to tell in a very few seconds ---- some story or report which might mean life or even death to many. Penrod reported what he knew, well and quickly. He described to the general the splendidly uniformed Prince, with the i kingly and deliberate manner and the very keen eyes, and he also described the way the man spoke to him. "I am extremely glad to hear that. He is one of the brothers of the Vivian girls and is a Prince who knows what military training is." Said general Greathart. "He also is a person who knows what the whole world is doing over this war, and almost all that it will do. According to your description of him you really mistook him for Prince Jimmie Vivian. But he was not. He was Emperor Hanson Angello Vivian himself, and those with him you mention were the emperor of Abhis-nunin his brother Robert Vivian, his two brothers and sons and general Francis Vivian and many others. The error Robert Vivian is the ruler of the entire section of the most powerful of all countries. If he saw that you are a well trained and a fine manly boy scout----it might even be good for you and Abhis-nunin."

"Would it matter to him if I were so well trained. Could it really matter to Abhis-nunin when I am only a Canadian American!!!!" Penrod cried out.

General Greathart paused for a full minute----watching the boy gravely---- looking him over---- his well built big boys frame, his handsome purple uniform and his eyes that were burning so eagerly. The general then smiled one of his well known wonderful smiles.

"It might even matter to Abhis-nunin." He answered.

In fact general Greathart did not at all forbid or advise Penrod against his revival of his sudden acquaintance with the boy scout known as "The Rattlesnake" and his company of followers.

"You will be able to find it out yourself for yourself, whether those Calvinist boy scouts are the right kind of friends for your company or not." he said. "It will take you only a very few days to make your own decision. In all various parts of this country, you have come to know many lads and you are a good judge of them. You will soon be able to see for yourself, whether they are true Calvinist boy scouts or mere rabble, or a bunch of boys of the foe side in disguise. The boy who is called "The Rattlesnake"----how does he strike you?"

He is a brave boy scout. "Said Penrod as the general's handsome eyes with their keen look of questioning beamed upon him. "But he confessed to me that he alone is no Calvinist, though he looks like one. He is a winkle Abyssinian. He might be cruel to the rebels as he hates the G. marians most bitterly."

"Any boy scout who may or does make himself a brave and most reliable scout, cannot under any conditions be disdained, but any boy scout who wishes to be vicious or cruel to even a Glandelinian no matter what sex, sect, is surely a fool even if he would be justified before God. And then tell the rattlesnake boy that that advice is from me." General Greathart answered. "It would do us no good to retaliate. The enemy would grow worse only for revenge. It would only be wasting force, our own and the nature of the fierce and most savage Glandelinians we would be treating cruelly, and we would be the biggest fools to waste force."

"May I have the full permission to speak of you?" Asked Penrod.

"Yes as long as you know how. And I surely know you will remember the things which is the order of silence."

"I never would dare forget them." Said Penrod. "And I have been trying not to for such a long, long, time."

"You have indeed made great success Comrade." Returned general Greatheart from his writing table to which he had not now gone, and where he was turning over some very important papers. A very strong impulse suddenly overpowered the boy scout. He suddenly marched over to the general's table and stood exceedingly straight, making his amazingly soldierly salute, his whole body glowing.

"Your Excellency," he suddenly said, "even if I have not seen them, and do not know them, you do not know how I love the beautiful Abbieannian Princesses. I wish I was a general, or their appointed guardian, and that I might die or survive through the wildest battles for them. When I heard so much about them, and their brave deeds, and their most lovely manners, I long and long to do something for them the bravest boy could not do. I would die of a million wounds rather than disobey you, or them--or Abbie-annia." He seized general Greatheart's hand, and knelt on one knee, and reverently kissed it.

It may be probable that a real Abbie-annian boy scout or even a cavalierian could not have done such a thing from unaffected natural impulse. But he was a Canadian and was of warm French blood.

"I took my oath of a allegiance to Abbie-annia Your Excellency when I took it on entering the Abbieannian army. And it seems as if you and they were might y Abbieannia too." He said and kissed his hand again. The great general had suddenly turned toward the boy with one of the movements which were full of the same dignity and grace the lad had seen before. Penrod looking upward at him felt that their was always a certain remote statefulness about him which made it seem that the general was a king, and that it should be natural that any person should bend the knee and kiss his hand.

There was suddenly seen to glow in the general's handsome face a sudden great tenderness, and he gently raised the boy scout and placed his hand on his right shoulder.

"My dearest comrade," he said tenderly, "you don't need to know much about the givian girls, and even I love you--and what reason is there that you shouldn't also love them. You don't know how their very Angelinian soldiers have been watching over you, and how I have been thanking God every day that you had the grace to join the war on our side, and not on the enemy's side. That I know you have done--and you are as brave and as the bravest of men, though you have only lived for ten years. This very year may be full of strange and dangerous things for me and you. No one even you or I will ever know what Emperor givian may have to ask you or I to do for him, his daughters and for Abbieannia. It may be that perhaps he will ask you to do something that no boy of any age, has ever been asked to do before."

"Every morning and night," said Penrod, "I have always been praying that I and my whole regiment may be soon called to do it, and that we may do it absolutely well and proper."

"If you are called by the Emperor my Comrade, you surely will do it well. That any one can make out." General Greatheart answered him.

In the meantime the whole of the Rattlesnake Boys' Company of boy scouts had assembled in the wide enclosure beyond the regular square when Colonel Penrod made his appearance near the arched end of the long passage of trees.

The boys about fifteen hundred of them were drawn up in rank formation with their signal flags unfurled but every one of them wore a dogged and sullen look.

Penrod at once guessed the explanation. For some reason or other the Rattlesnake boy was in a very bad mood. He stood facing the middle of his Company looking fierce, his very face being twisted into a hideous scowl. He did not look around him or even look up from the ground on which his eyes were fixed, while he stood at ease.

Penrod went forward with his military step, and stopped opposite of him with a salute like that of a general.

"Sorry to see you in such a mood sir." He said as if he had been a private.

"It's the French Canadian. He has come Rattlesnake." He said as if he had been a private.

Lieutenant shouted. "Look at him. He's here." He said as if he had been a private.

But to their surprise the Rattlesnake boy would not even look, and did not make even the slightest movement.

"What's the matter please?" said Penrod with less ceremony than the lowest of the privates would have shown. "Surely there is no use of me to waste any of my valuable time coming here if you don't want me."

"He has a grouchy feeling because you did not tell him you are a French Canadian." Called out of one the Lieutenants. "and there is nothing you can do with him, when he is angry."

"I will not try to do anything," said Penrod. "And I did not come here for an argument. I came for the purpose I promised. I've been with general Greatheart since I entered the army, and I'm superior over you all. And I cannot help it if I was born in Canada. And my general comes first. I cannot admit your company under my command if he does not say so. I am on active service with my own regiment and my rank is higher. And we are not enemies."

Then the Rattlesnake boy swung round sharply, and turned to look at him.

"I thought you did not have the nerve to come at all," he snapped. "My general said so himself. He said that nearly all of the foreigners only come over the seas to join our arms to see the war, make world which is against the law. He also said the Canadian and the English and French were the worse of this kind, and that you were a deceiver for all your handsome uniform and good bearing. He said general Greatheart would, or does not know the true ways of most of you foreign war correspondents and sight seers, and that your own Nationality wouldn't let you have anything to do with Abbie-annia and her christian states, and with their boy scouts. No one begged you to join us or bring us into your own regiments. I care I about your rank. If my general ordered it I would make you my prisoner. You Canadians and other foreigners can go to blazes."

"Don't you speak in that way about my Nationality," said Penrod quietly. "Because you are in a Marshall's uniform and I can't make you fight or strike you down."

"I'll take off my uniform and let you now," began the Rattlesnake boy immediately white and raging. "I can stand twelve rounds with two together like you. I'll take off my uniform and let you."

"Now don't talk. Now take it easy and don't do anything rash," said Penrod. "If you want to know what general Greatheart said I can easily tell you. He said I could draw into my regiment any new force of boy scouts I liked, and look them over, and find out by experience whether we should be friends or not. I must find out only for myself."

At this the Rattlesnake boy did a very strange and surprising thing. He suddenly altered the whole situation by doing this unexpected and strange thing. He changed his voice and expression suddenly, and fixed his sharp eyes on Penrod in a most shrewd manner. It seemed apparent as if he were asking of Penrod a command. No doubt he knew it would be one or would have been one to most Angelinian boy scouts, and boys of the very class he appeared outwardly to belong to.

Also, he knew Penrod was his superior officer no matter if he was a Canadian. He therefore must either know the answer or the wouldn't.

"I beg your pardon sir," he Rattlesnake boy said. "We who side with a Holy Cause as this should not fight each other under any conditions."

Indeed this was the command. It was what any officer of any kind of regiment would have said if he felt he had been rude or made some very serious mistake. He had heard that from many generals.

"I beg yours for my threatening to strike you," said Penrod.

for both it certainly were the right words, and Penrod's was the perfect answer. And it was the one another officer or gentleman would surely have given. It settled the matter at once, and settled it more than was apparent at the right moment. At this moment Penrod remembered as also general Greatharts Greatharts warning about the fierce nature of Winkie Abyssinkilians, boy or a man, girl or woman. It also decided that Penrod was one of those boy scouts, who knew the same thing the very Rattlesnakes general did, the things all gentlemen do to prevent a conflict among themselves without a cause to ir or not. Therefore not another word was said. It was alright. Penrod slipped to the right side of the Rattlesnake, and both stood erect with their military bearing, and the Rattlesnake began his drilling.....

"Company attention."

"Slope arms."

"Form by fours."

"Right face."

"Left face."

"Right about face."

"Quick march."

"Halt."

"Left turn."

"Right oblique."

"Left turn."

"Order arms."

"Shoulder arms."

"Present arms."

"Stand at attention."

"Stand easy."

"Rest."

They did the drill so well, that it was quite wonderful indeed. All these boy scouts had often been drilled in this manner, and the Rattlesnake boy was a severe as well as a smart boy scout officer. This morning for it was a morning they repeated the exercise for nearly a whole half a day, and even ended and varied it with a general Review Drill, with which they were just as familiar.

"Where did you learn it?" The Rattlesnake finally asked, when the flags were encased again, and Penrod and the bunch had retired to their barracks where it was warmer than outside and when Penrod was sitting by him as he had done the previous day.

"From general Greathart." And I like to watch it as you do."

"If you was a general in the Emperor's body guard you could never be smarter at it." The Rattlesnake boy said. "And the military way of manner you name to hold yourself. And the Excellency way you stand. You've got the military bearing of a king. I wish I was you. It comes as natural to you as if it was born in you."

"I have been trained that way by general Greathart himself. I always tried to drill myself since I was a little fellow." answered Penrod.

"And ever since I became commander of this company I have literally been trying to work the military rules into these fifteen hundred fellows." said the Rattlesnake boy. "A nice job I had of it too. Many of them were so ignorant that I thought I'd have to give it up. It nearly made me sick at first. I stuck it out though."

The boyscouts who had not been dismissed yet, only giggled or laughed outright. All of them seemed to take very little offense at the Rattlesnake boy's cavalier treatment of them. It was without doubt that he had something to give all of them which could be entertaining enough to make up for all his tyranny and apparent indifference. As soon as he had dismissed the company and repaired to his own tent with Penrod, he thrust his right hand into his left coat pocket and drew out a large piece of Abbeannian newspaper printed in the Co n country language.

"My general brought this to you to me I mean wrapped around a large book." He said. "Just look and see for yourself what it says there."

He then handed it immediately to Penrod and pointing eagerly to some very important words printed in large black letters and in Abbeannian language, words in and letters all the way across the newspaper. Penrod sat very still as he looked carefully at it, and the words which he read at the headlines were:

"EXTRA. GOD BE PRAIZED. GOOD LUCK FOR ABBE-ANNA. LOST VIVIAN GIRL PRINCESS'S FOUND AT LAST."

Suddenly what flashed through Penrod's mind came the thought: "For their sake I must still keep silent. It is the order." Then he said aloud:

"What does all this mean?"

"There is not much of it as there should be," the Rattlesnake boy said in a fretful tone. "Read all of it and see. Of course many of the Angelinians say that it is not true—but I for one believe it is. It says here in the paper that many authorities think some particular person whose name name is Siguary known where they are, or at least whether they had perished or whether they were saved. Anyhow it'd be the very same thing. They are somewhere within our lines. If they would only kindly show themselves, it might encourage the army to try and capture one section of Vivian who is wicker by more desperate fighting. Just read all of it please."

Penrod did read and his skin prickled as the blood went racing through his body. There was however no change in his face. There was only a short vivid sketch of the story of the finding of the missing Vivian girl Princess's to begin with. By most people and Abbeannian soldiers and officers themselves it had been regarded as a sort of false report or blunder, 1 or lie. Now there was a definite rumor that it was not a mistake at all but a part of the lost past history of Vivian wicker. It was said that through the weeks and months there had always been large parties of soldiers and the Gemini loyal to the memory of the Vivian girl Princesses who were searching the very world for them.

All the people of the whole country of Abbeannia adored the Vivian girl Princesses as much as their own father, the Emperor. And now strange as it seemed, it was becoming an open secret that some person believed that a descendant had found the one who had rescued them, and knew who or where they were or are—and Angelinian worthy of being their guardian, and also that a certain section of the Secret Gemini also held that if the rumors are true, they could bring joy and encouragement to the whole nation and her armies.

In that excitement the Rattlesnake boy began to bite his finger nails again.

"Do you believe that they have been found?" He asked feverishly. "Don't you?"

"I wonder in the world where they could be, if it is true. I wonder where indeed!" they are!" exclaimed Penrod. He could only say that and he might seem as eager as he was feeling just then. Some of the boys in the Company who had been admitted into his tent began all at once to jabber. "Yes where are they? There is no one but that person who knows. They are likely to be hiding in some foreign part of our country for safety sake, or in some real foreign country, America or other countries would be too far away from Abbeannia to be there. How far off is Canada? Was it in Abbe-anna, Angelinia, Abyssinkille, or where the Protestations are, or the Moromulians? But where wherever they are hiding they beautiful as they are, are the right sort to put courage in all our armies, and they'd be the right sort of girls to turn and inspect us boyscouts."

The Rattlesnake boy continued to chew his fingernails vigorously. "The Vivian girl Princesses might probably hiding anywhere for safety" he said his fierce looking face glowing. "At least I would think about it that way. It might be probable that they might be passing through this company" outside this archd arched passageway of trees they might be in the headquarters of one of our generals." jerking his head over his shoulder toward the direction of a certain distant building. "Perhaps they know that the Angelinians are missing them, and perhaps they don't. Anyway they would know it if it was true that you said yesterday, about countless numbers of women of both sides incessantly searching for them."

"Yes they surely would know." Put in Penrod. "Well it would be a fine thing for all of us if they did."

"Are you sure about that." Went on the Rattlesnake boy. "However as great a danger as they would be in, they would know the secret about the search all the time. And if disguised Glandelinians would sneer at them, or try to kidnap them, they'd sneer back at them, and laugh to themselves. I dare say they must walk or ride exceedingly straight and hold their pretty heads up. If I was one of the Vivian Girls, any one of them, maybe Joise or Jennie, I'd like to make both sides suspect a bit that I was not like they ever think I am." He put out his hand, and in his excitement gave Penrod a vigorous push. "Let's work out plots and plans or there. That would be a splendid game to play on the Glandelinians. Let's get in league with the Abbeianian Comini."

His excitement was now becoming tremendous. He took out from his coat pocket a large piece of white crayon chalk. Then drawing toward a large blackboard he had in his tent, he stood before it and began to draw something very quickly. Some of the boys who were with him, leaned forward with breathless eagerness, and Penrod also leaned forward.

The Rattlesnake boy was rapidly sketching with the chalk a very good map, and Penrod knew what the map was of, before the Rattlesnake boy spoke out.

"That's a map of Vivian wiskey, and her surrounding fortifications as well as I can make out." he said. "It was in that newspaper I told you already about--the one I read about of the Vivian girls from woman Catherine. I studied it for days until I wore it out. But by practice I have learned to draw it by myself by that time, so it does not matter. Now I could even make a sketch of it with my eyes shut. That's the section known as Mic-Whirther" pointing to a spot. "It's called Mic-Whirther Janet. The strongest fortifications in the world defend it. It is the place where the first fortifications were erected. It may have been from here we where the Vivian girl Princesses had been rescued a second time. It's where the core of the horrible reign of Terror was formed. I believe it was the famous Cominian leader general Jack gabrose Evans, who rescued them from the destroyed ship while under fire in the rivers mouth and where every one else perished. He did it by means of a big hatch under which they floated. He should be elected their guardian, he should be adopted to be the Emperor's son. Let's swear he shall."

He flung down his crayon onto the table and sat down. "Give me my two pistols. Help me move the black-board stand to the corner of the tent."

Two of the boy scouts immediately sprang to his assistance. Each took hold of one end of the stand, knowing evidently what he wanted. Penrod rose from his bench too, and watched every motion with a keen curiosity. He thought that the Rattlesnake boy was going outside, but it seemed it was not his intention, but he was going to do something anyway. The nearest boy scout handed him his two guns which had been lying on the table, and then both stood at his side waiting for orders. The queer thing that Penrod had noticed was that at the Calvinian boy scouts were extremely proud of their marshall and regarded him as more than their leader.

"If we could do more than just plain signalling we could do more than this for our country." said one of the boy scouts whose name was Pen Madden, and he said it in a very proud manner.

"Yes and we should be going about like other boy scouts do." added another and he said it in the very tone of one who likes to boast. His name was Santa Banna.

"I'm going to make my whole Company stand the main test now and also all of my officer's." said the Rattlesnake. as he went out of the tent. At the order of the officers the whole company was assembled into a long line go out and dine and then the Rattlesnake strode up and called "Attention!"

"Company Attention!"

When the Rattlesnake said to Penrod;

"Will you please do me a favor and go at the head of the line and help." Penrod did so. The rest were in line in a moment, straight--as soldiers should be, back straight as sticks, and chins way y way up. And at the head stood Colonel Penrod.

"We are going to take a most important oath." said the Rattlesnake boy. "It is an oath of Allegiance. Now of you Calvinian boy scouts as you tell me were born Glandelinians or of Glandelinian parents who also are in the christian armies, and who took our side to help crush the rebellion. And an Allegiance means faithfulness to Country, god, King and flag. That we already have made binding ourselves under pain of mortal sin to break. Ours means now an Allegiance to Emperor Vivian, and his fair daughters, Joise and her sisters. As if we do not know where they are but we will swear to be awfully faithful to them under all conditions not sin, to fight for them, to plot for them, to spy for them and to bring back for them the fallen away Glandelinian boy states."

And the way in which the Rattlesnake boy flung up his head when he said the word "is for finish was exceedingly fine indeed." "We are to be a secret party of our own. We will do our work better in the dark and find out things the enemy are doing--and run any risks--and do recruiting recruiting work, and collect armies of boy scouts no one will know anything about until it is strong enough to suddenly arise at some secret signal and with our w boy scouts work help the Angelinian armies overwhelm the besieged Glandelinian army at Vivian wiskey, and seize all the fortifications and citadels. I believe no one among the wisest of the Glandelinians even know my boy scout Company exists. We even now have made of ourselves a secret silent thing, that never speaks aloud."

They were indeed a very silent and secret Company of boys, but at this juncture a bunch of young strange girl scouts came strolling along, and seeing the boy scouts assembled in line they broke into a howl of exultant cheer. It was a grand sight indeed, and for that moment the girl scouts forgot themselves. "Hooray for the Rattlesnake Company." they yelled. "Hooray for Abbie-anna and the Vivian Girl Princesses. Ray, ray, ray."

"For the love of Mike shut up you confounded swine." shouted the Rattlesnake. "It is not the way you promised to keep the Secret. You'll call or bring the skulking Glandelinian spies and agents and see secret service and others upon us you fools. Look at my company of boys. They are quiet as mice. They have some sense."

The whole Company of boy scouts in fact had not made any sound.

"Come here you girls, and ten of you boy scouts." Raged the Rattlesnake. "I'll not have this at all. I'll not allow them to get into the game at all pretty as the girls are. It is no use with a lot of fat head head raw girl recruits like you. Where's your captain Jennie Angelina Turner. You are all under arrest."

The small column of girls broke and surrounded him in a moment, pleading and urging.

"Aw Rattlesnake, we girls just forgot. And we girls are the priestess of the squads that you have ever recruited, Rattlesnake. Please don't be mad at us. We'll keep quiet after this, Rattlesnake. Aw Rattlesnake, keep it up! Don't have her discharge us. Our sneaking about the enemy's camp and the like will be the priestess part of all. Aw Rattlesnake please keep it up."

"Our girls can keep it up yourselves if you want to." snarled the Rattlesnake. "I'll order Jennie Turner to discharge you."

"You alone could do it Rattlesnake and not us. No one else could think of it or think it out for us. You are the only boy scout who was able to ever think out the things you did for us, and had us do for you. You thought out the scheme of recruiting the Company. That's why you are the Captain. And if we are not with you Rattlesnake you know you will never succeed in your enterprise."

Indeed this was all very true. The boy known as the Rattlesnake boy was the only one who could do anything to train girls and boys as well. He could also invent all kinds of good military entertainment for the girls scouts and as well as the boys. He could seemingly from nothing create what excited them most, and give them something to do to fill useless hours, and useless wet and cold snowy and wind stormy days. Despite his savage way of speaking he really was good hearted, kind and generous, and only what really excited him to anger and fury was when they carelessly blundered, and those pretty young girls one of whom was his only remaining sister foolishly cheered at the wrong time. Yet he was their supposed Marshall, and their pride. Slowly but surely the Rattlesnake snake began to yield but grudgingly. He had not pretended to be mad, just because they were girls. No boys in that country hated girls, and his sister and the others had yelled without permission. Once before some of his boys had done the same thing and the result was that a almost fatal meeting with the glandelinians occurred. He therefore again pointed at Penrod, and the Company of boys who had not moved or uttered a sound, but stood still, remaining at Attention.

"Look at them," he said. "they know how to remain in line even, and know enough to stand where they were put until they are ordered to break line. Though only boys they are real soldiers, not raw recruits, that don't even know the German Goose Step march. They have been trained in barracks before they were assembled under me."

But he reconsidered and decided to go on after this outburst.

"Well here's the oath," he said. "I and the whole company of boys swear to do our duty as far as it is in our power, to stand any torture, and submit to death of any kind in silence rather than betray any of our secrets or our knowledge about the Vivian girls, and their hiding places. We will obey everything in secret and in silence. We will even swim through seas and oceans of blood, and help the christian christian armies fight their way through the lakes of seething fire, if we are thus ordered. Nothing, not even the war of perdition shall bar our way. All that we will do, and say, and think, and all the sacrifices we make will be for our Country, God and our just Emperor, and his daughters, violet and her sisters. If any one of you boys have something important to say, speak out before you take the oath."

He saw Penrod make a slight movement, and made a sign to him.

"You colonel," he said. "Have you something important to say?"

Penrod turned to him and gave his military salute.

"Here stands at attention fifteen hundred brave boy scouts for Abbie-annia. God be thanked he said."

Penrod had dared to say as much as that anyhow, and he also had the feeling that that general Greatheart himself would have told him that they were indeed the right words. The Rattlesnake boy believed they were more than the right words. And he felt somehow that they struck home and to his heart. He suddenly reddened in the face with the arising of a strong emotion.

"Company Attention," he suddenly said. "I'll let you for once give three long cheers on that answer. You girls can do so too and cheer for all you are worth. But it will be for the last time around here. We will have to be always quiet afterwards for our own safety's sake."

And to the complete and exultant relief of the company of boy scouts and of the girls too who still remained, the Rattlesnake boy led the cheer, and all of them were indeed allowed to make just as much noise, not as it was their wish only but with all the power of their lungs. The Calvinian boy scouts being of a high spirited nature, liked always to make the greatest uproar that was in their power, and they did so with a hearty hearty good will. Finally when the uproar of yelling came to an end it had done so much good for them, that they were ready for the final work.

The drama was opened at once by the Rattlesnake Rattlesnake boy. And the whisper of the most secret conspirator had surely never been so low or as hollow as his Company "the 'at ease' order."

"My most secret of Members," he said. "The best time for us boys to work our schemes is at midnight. The best time to meet is in the depth of the darkest night. On account of the danger of the prowling enemy we would not dare to have our important meetings by day. But when we pass each other during the day time we must pretend that we do not even know each other, or get to exchange any greetings of any kind whatever. We are now meeting in front of Vivian Wickey besieged by the biggest christian army in the whole world, and where we also face the mightiest christian army in the world. We will do all the work in our strength and power to help the mightiest christian armies, take them when the secret sign is given, and the whole besieging army makes its final plunge. As soon as everything is ready, and as soon as the lost Abbie-annian Princesses, that is the Vivian girls are surely found, the secret sign shall be given."

"That is the name of the section of Vivian Wickey that we are facing here!" whispered one of the boy scout lieutenants.

"It is called J I Julio Gallio. It has an important fortified seaport. We expect the armies will take it as soon as other christian armies. And the next time we have an important secret meeting, I myself will bring my strong flashlight to you."

"If Penrod could have had the permission to draw for them the map it would have been a great advantage to this gigantic war game of the world. From his learning every big fortress of Vivian Wickey—every strong hold, and the size and form of the different sections. Being a well learned and a most expert expert boy scout he knew in his heart just exactly what kind of excitement would have forward, directing his finger to this point and that, and pile question upon question."

Penrod had learned to draw any kind of map, and every kind of map in existence as correctly as they are seen in a book or geography, and he had learned to draw maps, before he was eight years old, and just from interesting reasons he had drawn different maps again and again, and also because there had been plenty of time. In all his school lessons he had learned so well that his Teacher was flabbergasted. And indeed Penrod could have drawn any kind of a map, or other great achievements to a first ray of joy and surprise. But he sat silent and listened, only speaking when he needed to ask some important question, as if he knew nothing more about Abbie-annia or her fortified cities, than the Rattlesnake boy did. Indeed what a secret part of boy scouts they surely were. All of the boys that could get near enough drew themselves into the closest circle and they spoke in unearthly whispers.

"One guard ought to be posted at the end of the passage of trees there," Penrod whispered. "We may be surprised by a glandelinian spy or raiding party you know."

"Ben go on guard duty at once," commanded the Rattlesnake boy.

The boy scout thus mentioned rose stealthily and placing his hand on the holster of one of his pistols, crept on tip toe to the opening. And there he stood on guard.

"General, and even his officers have told me that a hundred or more years ago a strong secret Society known as the Gemini had been formed," the Rattlesnake boy whispered.

"And who told them?" asked Penrod.

"A soldier who had lived for fifty years in Vivian Wickey," answered the Rattlesnake boy. "He said it was the most wonderful Secret Society of detective spies in the world because because it had worked through many many terrible years, and have never given up their duty despite any peril, though it had no special reason for its formation. It first began among some expert war spies and old soldiers who bound by an oath to help Abbie-annia in all her wars. They are now leagued together in the effort to find the lost Abbie-annian Princesses, and bring them back to their fathers army. There are not too few of them to do any thing against any of the worst glandelinians, and when the first lot discovered the news and mysterious news, at that about the stk' still more mysterious disappearance of the vivian girls from Vivian Wickey, they made untold efforts to locate them. The news has passed from one seat of the Gemini to another and from each seat the search for the missing vivian girls had grown. No one in the world really knows how large and powerful the great Gemini is now, but it is said that there are members in nearly all the countries in the world who belong to it even in the dead dead secret, and are all sworn to help Abbie-annia in her need when they are called. They have been patiently waiting until this war broke out. Some of the members are very rich, and will give assistance in life, money and property and many more are very poor men, men and women together are in that society, and children of certain age too have formed companies of their own, and many of these have worked themselves over on ship, or have slipped across the frontier to fight for Abbie-annia to help to smuggle in arms and munitions. It is even said that during this war so far the most secret and dangerous of the Gemini. Members have their secret headquarters made in caves in the hills, and mountains or in swamps, and woods, and have most important arms and other weapons hidden there for the use of special Gemini spies and workers. There are members among them who are called the 'Mad Blengins of the nation' and they and their under officers, and their Supreme Persons have always made or concealed unknown weapons, and made their headquarters in large caverns, no one in the world knows of, hidden caverns underground."

A thought suddenly came to Penrod's mind as he listened, a thought which brought fear to him, and unconsciously he spoke it aloud; "If all the soldiers in the army, or every people in every street in the world talk about it, they won't be hidden long I'm sure." "And my Good general Maurice Costello says that it is not common talk. Very few have even guessed, and many of them think it is part or part of some legend about the lost Abbie-annian Princesses." Said the Rattlesnake boy. "Even the whole world laughs about the reports of the vivian girls from Vivian Wickey, but the best of the very glandelinian generals have always been rank fools. They are too full of their own useless swagger to think that anything can interfere with their purposes."

"Do you speak much to your general?" Penrod asked. The Rattlesnake showed his sharp white teeth in a grin. "I believe if I'm not mistaken I surely know what you are thinking of." He said. "You are remembering that I said he was a great general. So he is though it is his command that I should not have revealed his name. He is the most splendid fighter in the Christian army to my way of thinking. He remembers everything he has learned of about the enemy since he joined the cause. I get him going at times and listen to his stories. He always likes to talk to those he is sure he can trust, and I want to hear everything he says. I know everything that goes on within the enemy's lines, because that is the way I find out. He tells me many other important things also, with the purpose of teaching me. He is a great gentle gentleman, besides being a famous general...."

"If you really care about Abbie-annia and her Holy Cause you'd better ask him not to tell me any one that the Secret Gemini have discovered the hiding place of the vivian girls." Suggested Penrod.

"The Rattlesnake boy started a little. "Indeed that is true." He suddenly exclaimed. "You are more clever than I am. Not one part of the news ought to ever be blabbed about, because our camps are frequently full of hidden and disguised glandelinian spies and Secret Service men, and some of them might hear enough to make them stop and investigate. I'll do my best to get him to make the promise. And the real one queer thing about the general." The Rattlesnake boy added very slowly as if he were trying to think it over. "I suppose it is the loyalty to his cause that's in him. If he makes a promise to any one he never will break it even if he was tortured on a rack."

On a table in the room
the Rattlesnake boy

"Ask him to make the promise." said Penrod. Then he immediately changed the subject because to him it seemed to be the best thing for him to do. "Go on and tell us what the Secret Party of our own is to do. We are forgetting all about it." He whispered.

The Rattlesnake boy, took up his well planned scene and plot with a renewed keenness. It was a plot or scheme which caused an immense attraction to him, because by it his imagination and also his purpose was worked up. And also it held all his boy scouts are spell bound besides plunging his own self into the war and all his strategy. We are preparing in our most desperate efforts to help the besieging army. Rise in their night (fighting strength) and crush Vivian Wickey." he said. "The blow must come soon, and the besiegers have waited too long already. General Marston is preparing all his batteries for a general storm. Glandelinians who oppose us so long are reported to have used up all their strength. Now is our time to strike the final blow."

He stopped and thought for a few moments staring vacantly into space. He then began again to bite his finger nails, and and and and then he said again. "At the right time the signal must be given by our flags." Then he stopped again, and of all of the boys within his hearing held its breath, and even pressed nearer with a soft shuffling sound. "Every day from now on two of us very secret ones will be chosen by lot and sent forth to do their bit." he went on, and at his very accent some of the boys in the squads nearest to him broke into useless cheers, and only just succeeded in stopping themselves on time. "And they must be chosen by lot." he Rattlesnake boy repeated looking carefully from one face to another. It will be dangerous work to perform, exceeding dangerous indeed, and each one who is chosen will surely take his life in his hands when he goes forth. If possible he may face a greater danger than dying a thousand deaths a day, but for the sake of his country's cause he must go. He must when ordered not only expose himself to the enemy's fire when signalling to his general, but must steal in silence from one part of the country to another, and from one rebel camp to another. And who so ever there is one of the secret members of the Gemini, whether he is hidden in a cave, forest, mountain, hovel or in the ranks, or on a throne, the daring messengers must go to him in dark ness and stealth, and give him the secret sign. It will mean the hour for Vivian Wickey's fall has come. God save Abbie-annia and help her crush the wicked Rebellion of her fallen away country."

"God Save Abbie-annia." whispered all of the boy scouts, with exulted feelings. And they saw Penrod raise his head to his forehead, and every one followed his action and saluted. They then began to all whisper at once; "Let's all draw lots now. Let's draw lots Rattlesnake, let's not do any waiting."

For a moment the Rattlesnake boy looked about like that kind of reptile is wont to do before striking. Then he seemed to be examining the sky. "The darkness is beginning to abate." He whispered. "I'm sure that late midnight has passed and that the dawn of day will soon arrive upon us. As any one of the boys had some black and white paper, and Penrod had a pair of shears which could be used to clip the papers into pieces. This the Rattlesnake boy did himself, when he shut his eyes, and mixed the pieces, and then held his hand ready for the drawing.

"The secret person who draws the largest black piece is the one chosen, the Secret Person who draws the smallest piece is also chosen but to go later." He said.

Indeed the drawing was more solemn than his tone. Each of the leading boy scouts wanted to draw either the longest or the shortest piece. The heart of each boy thumped somewhat loudly as he drew his piece of paper. Each showed his lot when the drawing came to an end. The Rattlesnake had drawn the smallest piece of white paper, and Penrod had drawn the largest piece of black paper.

"Goodbye," said the Rattlesnake boy taking him by the hand. "We two will be danger and death together."

"God save Abbie-annia." answered Penrod.

And if the German chief, who knew the whole secret, the Angelinian chief, who knew the whole secret, and did not mind how fiercely the wind was blowing or how thickly the snow was coming down, the Rattlesnake boys plan of coming to help the Angelinian armies in their general rising against vivian victory was more than a giants game of plots. And indeed how more natural it would be that some time perhaps in the shortest while, there would be the Angelinian armies shouting triumph in the very streets of "Lillian Victory." Surely this could happen very soon, for the besieging armies had by this time grown very strong, and that weapons and cannons and ammunition of all kinds had reached the bel besiegers, that by the continual cannonading he heard day and night like a perpetual thunderstorm of violent character without the rain great preparations were being made for a probable final assault, during all these days and nights of the siege so far, even hidden work and preparations had been going on incessantly, even though it seemed to be a preparation for some unknown day, and a strong Secret society which had lasted so long, and which had always passed its oath from generation to generation must be indeed of a most determined and deadly determination, and also the same with the armies, and what might the besieging armies have made ready in their teeny chains of siege batteries, fortifications, fortified works, deep rifle pits, hardened snow breastworks and forts, and the like. Penrod longed to reach General great hearts headquarters and tell the great general at once all he had already heard but the boisterous storm hindered his speed through the deep fallen fresh snow. All that had been told him by the Rattlesnake boy he recalled to his mind, and even all that he had added in the same because, well because that was so complete and real too, so real that it would actually be very useful to all the generals, and the army.

On several accounts of the ship's were out of the water.

CHAPTER TWELVE.

GENERAL GREATHART CHARGES PENROD, WITH AN IMPORTANT MISSION.
PENROD TRIES TO SKEW THE FACTS OF VIOLET, AND HER SISTERS... ..

BUT when he reached his own part of the lines, and entered general greatharts headquarters, he found that some general and many others of vastly higher rank very much absorbed in some unusually important work. The doors of every entrance into the building were well looked and guarded by many sentries, three to six sentries per door when he came, his shoulders and hat covered white with snow. One guard knocked twice, and as soon as Penrod entered the door after shaking himself free of the snow, the door was securely locked again. The generals were all seated at a big oblong table on which there were many important papers, Geographies, and other books, and evidently they were studying them or holding some sort of a council. Many of the papers had maps of Vivian wick, and her fortifications, and also of her sea boards. Some were maps of the divided sections of Vivian wick, and others were street maps and sketches of the important river's mouths, and the series of Lenses Cedernine fortifications, guarding them and still others maps of important buildings, and arsenals and the places where the landelinians had their own submarines and fleets of warships and some of the extended Lucille Icksen portific fortifications, but they were all important maps of places in Vivian wick, and outside and inside of her.

All of these were usually kept hidden in a large strong entrance of the building were always kept locked to be examined or studied the spies, and Secret Service Agents. As soon as all the generals were gone and before the morning mess call came these were all returned to the strong iron safe which was pushed into a secret room and locked in.

"When his Majesty arrives," Penrod heard general greathart say to the last one to go. "We can show him most clearly what has already been planned. He will be able to see for himself."

During the entire meal general greathart scarcely spoke at all and Penrod Penrod did not have the habit of speaking at any time unless first spoken to, yet this morning it seemed that the boy scout colonel looked more than usual unusually silent, and more silent than the general had ever observed him to be before. No doubt the y were both thinking anxiously of deep and serious things. Penrod felt that the story of the strangers that had come to see the Rattlesnake boy must be for some reason not to be told as yet. But y just the same the story was of a kind that would surely keep. The great general greathart did not say anything at all until the orderlies had removed the dishes from the meal table and made the generals' council room look as neat as possible. While the orderly was at this work the general sat with his forehead resting on his hands as if he was absorbed in some deep thoughts. Then suddenly he made a gesture to Penrod.

"Come here, friend and Penrod," he said.

Penrod immediately went up to him and saluted.

"My comrade, sometime to night, no matter how fiercely it storms and great and high personage will come to talk with me, and many other great generals about most grave and important things," he said. "Of course I'm not quite sure but I think he will come when he comes. It is most important that he will find me quite alone before all the other generals arrive. He is coming at a most late hour and at my command one of my sentries will open the rear door quietly that no one may hear or see. It is most important also that no one not even the Angelinian soldiers should see him. Some certain person must go and ride quietly on his horse on the opposite side of Company Street of Battery D. and watch until our great Christian makes his appearance. Then the one who goes to meet him and give the warning signal must cross the Company Street before him first, back and forth, then ride toward him, salute, and signal with his flashlight. The coast is clear!" and then at once turn and ride quietly, and swiftly away as if nothing unusual had happened.

Indeed what boy or girl scout heart would not have leaped and beat wildly with joy and awe at the very mystery of this. Even any common and dull boyscout or girl scout, who knew nothing of the Glendian Abbeismian war would have surely felt jerky so great was the thrill of his feeling, that Penrod's voice almost shook as he said:

"How shall I know the great general Your Excellency?"

He asked this question because he knew without needing to inquire that he surely was the "some one" to go on this errand.

"As you told me you have seen him twice before," General Greathart answered. "He is the one you saw in splendid uniform ride at the head of all the generals of the highest rank. He is the Emperor Robert Angelio Vivian."

"I shall therefore know him," said Penrod saluting again. "When shall I go?"

"Not until it is half past ten or eleven o'clock. Go to bed immediately, and sleep all the day and until that time to night until one of my aide-camps calls you. You have been out all night on boy scout duty and need some sleep." Then he suddenly added "Look well at his uniform and face before you speak or signal to him. At this time he will not be dressed as an Angelinian but as an private Abbeismian soldier and will appear differently uniformed in hat and clothes than when he was when you first saw him, and keep shy of exploding shells as there may be a terrific cannonading this afternoon and during a part of the night."

Penrod obeyed. He immediately retired into one of his rooms and went to bed as he had been advised, and went to sleep as he was very tired. But early in the afternoon he was suddenly awakened by what he had at first thought to be one of the most terrific thunderstorms he had ever heard in his life. The way everything still seemed so light, and the way the snow was falling outside he knew that only a blizzard storm was raging, and also it was too near winter and too cold for such a thunderstorm to be raging. He heard excited commands and the rattling and roaring of swiftly moving wagons, artillery caissons, terrific crashes far in the distance, and a tumult which it only took to hear to explain.

Unusually such din never kept him awake because he had slept through many great cannonades, and even the rattle and roar of terrific battles not to be accustomed to noise. But this crash and din was unusually loud, and rolled like many drums but louder than the worst thunder clap ever heard, and once it had awakened him he found it hard to go to sleep again.

And now it seemed to him as he lay there, and looked out of the window at the heavy snow he heard every great cannon made in the world going off in rolling thunderous crashes, and every shell that exploded in sharper detonations.

And he could not help thinking of the myriads of gunners of both sides who would lose their lives during that artillery storm, and of the fresh batteries of big cannons that were being hurried toward the point of firing on huge all sleighs and of the swiftly moving gun caissons, ammunition and supply sleighs that were hastily dashing along in the snow and through it and the Company streets outside his headquarters. Then as he lay listening to all the confusion of sound he wondered what all outsiders would think if they knew things connected with the battles they read of in the daily papers were going on to day within the Christian encampments they scarcely gave a glance to as they went by them.

Then while listening still to the artillery fire he thought again of his important errand. It must be connected or something connected with the terrific artillery duel if a general who is to be a great diplomat and companion of war kings like Emperor Vivian came in secret to talk along with an Angelinian general who was something more than a patriot. Whatever his friend general Greathart was doing, was for the good of the headlong arms of Vivian victory, and perhaps the Secret society knew he was doing it. And while Penrod lay listening on this lumpy mattress on his cot, thinking it over his heart almost beat aloud. He knew he must look well and carefully at the one mentioned before he even moved toward him. And he must be absolutely sure that he was the right man, and not some one else even if it was an Angelinian, because all wearing purple uniforms are not Angelinians. The plan he and the gang of boy scouts had amuz amused themselves with so long that night in the barracks, the game of trying to remember maps, pictures, people, and fortifications, and other places clearly, and in detail had been a wonderful and marvelous thing. He had learned to draw pictures and maps, and also could make an accurate and quick sketch of the most keen eyed clever aquiline face of any one with the well out and delicately closed mouth which looked as if it always had been shut upon secrets.

If he had only the time to draw he would try and make a sketch of the girls as he imagined they looked, he found himself saying over and over again. Very often he had amused himself by making countless sketches of all things he wished to ask important questions about. Even like a good artist, he had sketched and drawn faces of some great generals he knew, and general Greathart had declared the boy had an unusual gift for so rapidly catching a persons of the faces of the Vivian girls, and also their fathers, which would show general Greathart that he knew and could recognize at least Emperor Vivian. He decided to make this attempt because he felt sure he could not sleep because of the din of the tremendous cannonade. He therefore rose up, jumped from his cot, and went to a small table near the window. He drew from the drawer a pencil, and a tablet of writing paper without lines.

The blizzard outside seemed now to be at its worst, and a the wind was occasionally throwing great quantities of snow against the window pane, and the blinding snow sheet outside on hiding objects for a hundred feet made it lighter. By this he could see to do his drawing. He drew up his small chair, sat by the table and began his drawing. He drew up his small

For about thirty minutes he worked steadily and succeeded on the face of Emperor Vivian, but tore up five or six sketches of the Vivian girls, that proved very unsatisfactory. The hasty sketching would not matter to Penrod if he could catch their beautiful, queenly, subtle and innocent half frightened look, and a look which was not vanity, slyness, but something more pretty, holy lovable, dignified and important.

Often he got the marked aristocratic features or outlines of the features, which he absolutely knew were not there, despite their rank. Any ordinary person, man or woman or child who have less pronounced profile, would have been to Penrod's idea, less or more easy to draw or sketch, and he did his best, his level best to recall to his mind every detail of them which had come so often to his memory through its well trained habit. Soon to his relief he observed that he was drawing the likeness to a clearer point but gradually.

And it was not long before the features were clear enough to strike him surely. "AS WELL DONE!" and also that of Emperor Vivian. He then with a sigh of satisfaction arose and drew a long and joyful breath. Penrod did not think of stopping to put on his overcoat despite the storm outside, but left the headquarters without making a sound, and seeing his boy scout lieutenant approaching ordered him to bring his horse.

The steed was brought without protest while Penrod then was putting on his overcoat and heavier shoes. He then mounted the horse, and rode slowly toward the headquarters of the Battle snake boyscout leader. His horses going slowly through deep snow made no sound whatever while on the slow gallop. The officers in charge of this section of the camp had gone to direct the artillery fire, and so had the other commanders. All of the inactive batteries had been moved out of the camp except the one belonging to Battery D.

When he had first joined the boy scouts he had been thought to make a special sign or signal when he wished to speak personally to any leader of a boy scout Company or his officer.

he reached the small building which he knew was the rattlesnake boys headquarters, and dismounting and thetoring his horse but placing a large army blue blanket over him he strode up to the door of the building, stood still and made the signal. It was three low knocks. A boy scout opened the door, and seeing Penrod looked troubled.

"Do you wish to see some one sir?" he asked.

"I wish to see the rattlesnake," answered Penrod. "I must show something to him."

The boy scout let him in, and being awakened because he also had been asleep the rattlesnake boy scout arose from his cot and looked at Penrod questioningly. Penrod first saluted, and then strode forward, and laid the so on sketches down on the cot before him.

"Look at them rattlesnakes," he said. "I had such memories of the vivian girls in my mind that I decided to make sketches of them. I remembered them enough to draw them like this. And I thought of them all at once that I could make some sort of pictures of them. Do you think they are like them?"

The rattlesnake boy scout examined them closely.

"I cannot say whether they are like them or not for I have not seen them, even a picture," he hastily answered. "but they are nevertheless very much like their character. By doing this you make me feel quite safe, entirely safe. Thanks comrade. It was a very good idea indeed."

In the grip that the rattlesnake boy gave Penrod's hand there was evident relief, and Penrod turned away with an exultant feeling. Just as he reached the door, and had opened it, the rattlesnake boy suddenly said to him:

"This is surely a great gift from god himself. It is the best gift of all. And it proves that it is absolutely true that your mind has gone good and perfect training. The more you draw, the better you'll be able to draw. Do the best you can, and draw everything you can lay your hands on."

After this when he returned to his own headquarters, neither the booming of so many cannon, or the crashing of shells, nor the noise of dashing horses or gun carriages and sleighs, commands of officers, shouts of men, nor the windstorm or blizzard, or his own thoughts kept Penrod awake when he went back to sleep. However Penrod gave himself certain orders before he so tilted himself upon his rough pillow. He had often heard general Greatheart say to his that the mind can control the body, when people are once find out that it can be done.

He had also read of this too. He had often made many experiments or tried themselves himself and finally found out some very curious things indeed.

The first one was that he had told himself to try and remember the distance between Vivian Wickay, and Angelina Agathia. At a certain time and he found out rightly enough enough that he did remember it. It was always that something in his brain seemed to remind him. The second experiment he had frequently tried was to tell himself to awaken at a certain minute or particular hour and he had found himself to awaken almost exactly at the moment by the clock.

"I will sleep until two thirty o'clock," he said to himself as he shut his eyes tightly. "and I hope to awaken and feel a very much refreshed. Then I shall not be sleepy at all."

Indeed Penrod was as good as his word. He slept as soundly as any very tired lad could have done and will sleep. All the loudest noise of the bombardment never aroused him once, but he exactly awakened at ten thirty, and noticed what appeared to be lightning display, but which was the flash of bursting shells high up in the sky. The snow already was very deep on the ground and the storm was still raging fiercely but the wind had abated and it was quiet and calm.

Once in a while one of the flashes would be much closer and brighter, and would throw the light of its reflection through the window. He knew it was half past ten because he had a cheap little time piece on the table by the window and he could see the face of the clock for every flash. He felt quite fresh, and not at all sleepy. Again his experiment had met with complete success.

On account of the snow of Vivian Wickay, all railroad communications were cut off. The snow was so deep that the trains could not run.

He got up hastily and put on his clothes. Then he left his headquarters, secured his army overcoat and warf, and not wishing to wake his horse or use it in the deep snow and storm, he decided to walk to general Greatheart's headquarters and secure one there. He walked down the Company street, without making any sound as thickly as if it had a mind to bury him. The snow was still coming down. And this time he carried his overshoe in his hands for he only meant to put them on, when he was to ride the horse, but seeing how deep the snow was he rapidly changed his mind and put them on right there. He reached general Greatheart's headquarters in two minutes. The thought it was only a block away, and made the same sign at the general's door as he had made at the rattlesnake's, and made the general himself who had opened it.

"Is it right, that I should go now?" Penrod asked with a salute.

"Yes you may ride my horse. And ride slowly to the other side of Company street of Batteries Band Detach. And ride slowly in every direction as much as the snow a round shroud with will let you. We do not know where or from what direction the signal will come. He will have a large company of generals with him dressed a little like the 'hooded terror.' After you have given him the signal or worded sign to them, go back to either your tent again or your own headquarters, which ever is nearest, and retire to bed for the rest of the night."

Again Penrod saluted as a soldier would have done on receiving an order. Then without delaying a second he passed out of the house in a noiseless manner. For several minutes general Greatheart then turned back into his own room and for several minutes stood in the center of it like the statue of some uniformed monarch. His hands were form to night looked particularly erect and stately, and his eyes were glowing as if something moved him deeply.

"Here is one of the best boy scouts for Abbie-annia," he said to his orderly who watched him. "God be praised. 'He'll make a great guardian of violet, and her sisters some day.'"

The orderly saluted quite reverently as he said in a low hoarse voice:

"Yes sir, your Excellency. God save Abbie-annia and the vivian girl Princesses."

"Yes indeed (you are in need)" Greatheart answered after a moment's hesitation. "then they are found."

And he went back to his table smiling his most beautiful smile. Fortunately for Penrod the cannonade at this section had suddenly ceased, it probably being either a lull or a suspension on account of the sudden increase of the thickening snow fall. The Company streets on account of the great blizzard were completely deserted, and all the roar of so many cannons, near distant, or far, had hushed, the very tumult of exploding shells, had ceased, and everything except the storm was at a rest.

Such a sudden silence was a thing almost unbelievable. It even surpassed the stillness of a mountain top or in a forest, and it was so still Penrod could actually hear the snow flakes fall. A few hours before, there had been the wildest tumult of cannons, and exploding shells, and howling of a windstorm, the noise of all kinds of military sleighs or the jingling of their many bells, the neighing of horses, the shouts of commands, and all tumult imaginable and now all was quiet, though probably in another hour or so it would break loose once more, especially if the snow fall lets up. And Penrod for that reason hoped it would not stop falling but would increase.

But now the Company streets were so clear of soldiers, and everything was so quiet, that even the very tramp tramp of the sentries in the deep snow was hushed, and so that the snapping of a twig, or the flapping of some tent cover had the most fearful and horrible sound, that Penrod had ever heard.

It seems worse even to Penrod than a haunted ground, as he crossed over to the other side near Battery D. He could hardly believe that the Company streets had ever been so clear of persons and so silent before. Was it so every night, storm or no storm, or whether the cannons were thundering or not.

closed for the remainder of the night.

When Penrod awakened the next morning he was summoned to general Grantharts headquarters right away when he got out of his tent he saw two feet of snow had fallen, but now the morning was clear, and the sun was rising and it was about six below zero so so cold but not colder as yet and the air was again still and quiet and when he arrived at general Grantharts headquarters he saw enormous columns moving forward toward the direction of Gwanggulin Grida.

Around here all was still and quiet, except the far distant roll of cannons which was unceasing when he stood before general Granthart, the latter did not say anything about what happened during the stormy night. He only said which was unseeing when he stood before General Overton's, no longer a man, but a woman, and she was not any thing about what happened during the stay night. He only said:

"My dear boy, you did your errand amazingly well, despite your long waiting out in the cold and storms. You were not even hurried and nervous though I myself felt somewhat impatient. The Emperor was exceedingly pleased with your calmness. You scared him at first though. He asked so in front of his horses before you gave the word that he thought you was one of his daughters in disguise. He had a good laugh over it. He wishes to see you in a week. And somewhere he told me you again saw the Indian girl last night, and they saw you, but you did not know it."

you, but you did not know it." After this no more was said. Penrod knew that the quiet mention of the Emperor's deeds had been merely as a sort of designation. So though nothing was said on the subject of the stormy night incident, it was plain by the sight he witnessed of the mobilizing of the forces that something very unusual was going on. General Greatheart and his generals, and other officers were also assembling their columns, and there was great excitement and emotion and also stirrings seen every- everywhere among the soldiers. Penrod wishing to find out what was going on, and why there was so much distant cannon firing went up to the top of one of the highest signal stations with the intention to spend part of the day in watching everything of interest no matter how cold it was. From that height, one hundred and thirty five feet he could see the north-western sections of the massive concrete massive breastwork like walls of the Thunderbluff fortress.

CHAPTER THIRTEEN

ALSO HE OBSERVES AN ARMY ATTACK, AND ITS RESULTS DURING THE BEGINNING OF THE BATTLE OF JEROME AVIAN, AT DELIGHTS JUNCTION.

IN THE direction of Kvangolmbi a Grania heights and far off elsewhere among large stretches of woods, he saw what appeared to be a white snail as of a far distant forest fire, and strange sounds came from that location. In viewing things this way he became intimate with scenery and strange incidents, which to most boys and girls and even people seemed only the unreal events. He saw what appeared to be big fires, cabin eruptions, and the sky was covered with a yellow haze. He could see the spires of the far distant Norma Catherine, and this again reminded him of the prisons and dumb dungeons, the : non-combatants had been confined in to be murdered, and where many had died in the end. He could see some of the powerful battlements, and outer works and rifle pits, and snow fortificant lots far in advance of Fortress Maya and Delightington, and their big fortress towns, the beautifully colored flags of the enemy fluttering in the winter breeze, and the towering cannon.

He was occasionally fired on or seemed to be by some rebel cannon but of no avail as the station being a former signal storm station was out of range. Some of the shells exploded high in the sky like the crash of a thousand thunderclaps at once but did no harm except cause him a little excitement. As everything soon became obscured in the queer smoke haze, and as he could see nothing further, and as he felt cold in that biting wind, he soon came down.

The column of troops were all in motion, there was the confused shouting of commands, the roll of many drums, the blare of bugles, and the snorting of horses added by the loud band music and the tumultuous threat of countless feet in the deep snow. One general who rode a horse that appeared to come from some cowboy was taking the lead, and he appeared to be good natured and evidently very fond of important talking. He was tall and very stoutly built with a large face with bull dog expression but somewhat nice looking too, and had merry but firm attractive blue eyes. He was rather like some old fashioned picture of the later Emperor of Rome. Now when Penrod remembered having seen so day he appeared to be an unusually talkative, when he was met by a column of handpicked uniformed officers, and he was a face like a young man, the right of England who had rode up to him and asked the reason for the mob molesting and movement of the troops.

"It is because Hanso Yvian wishes to take possession of the small villages of Jennia Yvian." He answered. "If general Constantin Aronburg the baron of Abysskille had failed in his purpose we'd have not got this far. Emperor Yvian is bound if it is possible to take the Lucille Riksen fortifications in the rear by storm. Also the St Dominus fortresses and the Evangelina Grania Heights. Hanso Yvian was clever enough to manage last night's conspiracy, and if he plans any successful attack he will have to do it with the aid of the traitors to be sure. These Ouarinus we are facing have done with better plans than they fight most savagely and most doggedly too, and with great tenacity."

"There was a big battle near Thumblin in somewhere yesterday," another officer who was close to Penrod said to the fierce general with the h bull dog like face. Millions of are killed on both sides it is rumored and our side was worsted it is rumored. I saw it in big letters on the bulletin this morning. This war is so fierce that we are just slaughtering each other that's what we are doing. And now we got to move our armies forward to storm the heights of Mt. Himalia. Grania as soon as everything is ready, I call it."

The general whose face had the bull dog expression looked at him keenly and said: "The Emergents have fallen in such uncountable numbers that they can't bury their dead fast enough until the battlefields are cleared. It is the same with out side. Before long there will be some dreadful plagues breaking out, and sweeping into the countries, nearest and all around us. And Vivian Wickey will be the center of it all. And I'll bet the plagues will continue so fiercely and incessantly that they'll spread all of over the world as others have done. Things will be so bad later on when the hot summer weather comes that all the civilized countries will have to jump in to bring the war to an end." "I'll be alive I'll tell you moral greathheart what I have heard."

Penrod thought: "It shows that everybody in the army is continually thinking and talking of the siege of Vivian Wickey, and the horrors of the war, and that even the generals and other officers know this war will result in some serious and most terrible consequences. This must be the right and proper time."

And what he meant was that now must be the time for, or in which the Secret Gemini and Emperor Vivian had so long and patiently waited for, the final effort to overthrow the Kingdom at Vivian Wickey. But just now General Greathheart had rode away with his own staff to direct the movements of his troops, and when Penrod went to the generals headquarters, he found the Aide-de-Camp alone, and he looked more silent than ever as he stood by the door. However as severe and an exciting the situation seemed to be, Penrod acted as if the war, and its horrors were as a difficult game.

"Any man can fight in a battle, and yet be a better battle gentleman," General Greathheart had said. "And it is as easy to form good habits, as it is to form bad ones. And if one is even brave enough to even feel ravenous for a battle, a man or soldier who has been well bred, will not allow himself to look upon any dog may do so, but a man may not."

In all perilous exciting adventures, and the like, Penrod kept himself in perfect ease and grace of boyish carriage. He always was self controlled, and very courteous under any conditions. And he always had the habit of holding his body perfectly well, and his head erect, and he always had a certain look of great distinction which though to others it seemed nothing, it nevertheless set him apart from all boys of the careless and awkward bearing.

"I have any report cards, or sheets that tell of you yesterday's great battle sir?" He asked of the Aide-de-Camp after he had finished eating the plain and scant food, and left the table.

"Yes Colonel Penrod," was the immediate answer. "The general said that you may have permission to read it if you so desire. But I believe the report is a black and dirty tale." He handed the boy scout the slip of paper.

It was however not a black tale. And as Penrod slowly read the accounts he suddenly felt as if he could scarcely bear it. The besieging fleets had bombarded Fortress Thumelina, while the troops from the hundreds of big transports, and from a portion of General M. A. Wansons army assaulted it by land. It was as if both sides for the whole day swarmed in oceans of blood.

At the outcome of the conflict the glandelinians had suffered almost a disasterous defeat. The Angelinian forces under General Jackson Evans and Nelson Pelight attacked the whole glandelinian front under General Handonia Turner. The whole christian attack at this point was so overwhelming, and so deadly and so irresistible as to break the main rebel line at once. By this time and within three hours afterwards the whole army defending the rifle pits and outer works was aroused, and countless wagons, sleighs, ambulances, and artillery were making for the rear. The whole battle field seemed dominated by scores of thousands of the most terrific explosions. The twenty fourth corps of the Scodder and Whitel Whinsie Turner's army abandoned all their works, but fought every inch of ground while slowly retreating. Soon half of the glandelinian army defending the works had been flying in dismay and so thick was the smoke of battle it hung like a dense fog. Then General Wilsenbell hurried upon the assaulting Abyssinian waves the 15th Corps of General Bright's corps and by heavy firing partially checked the terrible pressure of the christian attack, giving the Twenty fourth a chance to reform its lines.

But the outlook was still very gloomy, and the losses of the rebels had been terrific beyond comprehension, when at twelve thirty o'clock cheers echoed along the lines in the rear.

On arrival at the edge of the lake, all railroad communications were cut off, and the army then moved on to the lake. The rebels were completely isolated.

General Mc-Hollister Johnston who had ridden with his army of cavalry and infantry from Fort Mayn was approaching. His appearance created the wildest enthusiasm. He rode along the whole front of the rebel line moving his hat and calling to his men and uproarious cheers from hundreds of thousands of soldiers greeted him. The retreat along this quarter stopped in an instant. The broken lines were reformed and with one magnificent charge which was resistless the Angelinians themselves were swept back and their left turned and driven into confusion. In fact most of the line was driven into confusion. The christian general in a main command haste to the spot and found the forces had been driven back about half a mile. They took the affair in hand, quickly sent forward reinforcements and formed a compact line of battle miles longer. The attack upon the enemy was then resumed with the greatest vigor driving and routing back the three pieces of artillery, and many scores of thousands of prisoners. The number of the casualties of the enemy was not known but the rebel general Jackson was perhaps mortally wounded and a prisoner in the hands of the christians. Four christian generals were killed and ten wounded.

After the repulse of the enemy the christian forces reinforced again stormed the rebel works around Thumelina and the first really deadly decisive battle of the conflict was fought, with the glandelinians again the victors. The losses were heavy on both sides. General Siasmore was wounded and was not expected to live. The charge against the rebel line was led by General Winderline and Roswell Gustar Johnston and within the rifle pits and snow forts and other works of the enemy the most desperate hand to hand fight ever imagined raged for four hours, with nearly two hundred and twenty two thousand falling per hour on both sides singly.

The works even then would have been taken but the glandelinians in the main works of fortress Thumelina poured an irresistible torrent of grape and canister into the christian columns driving them out with dreadful loss and following up their triumph, cheering and singing suddenly general belights corps reinforced came upon a moment there was the wildest scrimmage. The Abyssinians gave the glandelinians a most terrific fire point blank into their faces, and then swung into them hand to hand past the rifle pits, and into and out of the snow forts, through the rebel trenches, went the panic stricken glandelinians, while the Abyssinians bayonet played indescribable havoc with their disordered ranks for miles. Never was there such slaughter, for even up to three o'clock on both sides singly over ten million two hundred and twenty thousand dead and wounded were left. The Abyssinians lost two million.

A correspondent says: After the battle there were found 2,544,666 dead glandelinians found in the gunnery Creek, many who may have been drowned during the rout. The Company streets streets of the rebel lines and encampments were strewn with dead as if corn mowed down by the tornado. The Angelinians had ordered to go through the rebel trenches and they did their best. Up to three o'clock probably five million five hundred thousand died in the battle attempt.

The glandelinians themselves died by the hundred and ten thousand per charge and made fifteen charges in all during the whole day. They filled two trenches a mile long with their own dead, and the living charged over it.

All the countries when they would hear of it, must stand aghast at the news of such a furious and cruel battle. Even the bombarding fleets, a thousand ships in all were repulsed with great loss of ships, 10,000 cannon thundering along the glandelinian front, and many more from the ships, and the land forces in the last attacks slaughtered in awful numbers of myriads, and the surviving columns driven back to the shelter of their own works which the enemy tried fiercely the rest of the day to take in vain. The christian army thus was cut and torn in pieces, and half the numbers from the transports wither out down or captured.

"Colonel Jentonia!" Perrod suddenly said spring to his feet in a frenzy and his eyes burning! "Something for God's sake must be done to stop such bloodshed. The besieging armies are strong enough to capture Vivian Wickey. Why don't they all move forward to the attack, and not only a portion? The time has come, for this has come. Why don't they strike! With the Rattlesnake boy scout was the Chief general!"

And the boy scout rapidly paced up and down the room almost in the same manner that general Greenheart did, because he was too excited to stand still. It was amazing indeed to see how the general's Aide-De-Camp watched the boy scout colonel, and there could also be seen in his own restrained face the overpowering feeling that was almost too strong to be overcome when he suddenly said:

"For air my lad, it does seem as if the time has come."

But he said nothing more. He immediately turned and went out leaving the building at one moment. The Aide-de-camp had decided that it was much wiser to go before he suddenly lost power over himself, and said more than he should. After this Perrod went over to the meeting place of the Rat Rattlesnake Company of boy scouts. Just as before the Rattlesnake boy was sitting among the highest of his followers, and he had received the morning paper, and was reading the contents to them, and especially the portion which contained the news of the disaster at Thumbelina. All of the Company of Boy Scouts had become Members of the Secret of Gemini, and to Perrod's delight every member of it was thrilled to the utmost with the spirit of dark and adventure. They all spoke spoke in the softest whispers.

"We cannot remain long in this section of the camp," the Rattlesnake said. "We are ordered out on signal duty this afternoon and to-morrow. We will have to crawl through bushes, and other shelter and behind snow drifts, and watch every wave of the battle that's coming to-morrow."

To the rest of the boys this was indeed exciting news but Perrod knew that what the Rattlesnake said was true. And yet though the Rattlesnake boy knew none of the things that Perrod knew he saw that the whole story about the disastrous ending of the assault on Thumbelina was a shocking thing. The violent and desperate struggles of the glandelinians and the Angelinians for the possession of Vivian Wickey had taken full possession of the Rattlesnake and his boy scouts.

His passion for soldering and warfare, and his curiously nature brain had led the Rattlesnake into following every detail of the glandelinian war he could lay hold of. He had listened to the conversation of many officers and general soldiers and had heard and learned many important things with the most remarkable results.

He remembered many things that many other boy scout leaders forgot after they had mentioned them. There was nothing he forgot. When Perrod had arrived he found that the Rattlesnake had drawn on the blackboard in his barracks another map of Vivian Wickey, and which Perrod saw was absolutely correct, and he also had made a good sketch of the Thumbelina fortress, and the actual divided battle line lines which had had such disastrous results.

"The fiercest fighters of all the glandelinians are in possession of fortress Thumbelina," he explained with the most feverish eagerness, "and the national forces attacked them there and from here!" pointing with his finger. "That was one of the worst mistakes of the siege. If I had been general Hanson I would have attacked the fortress and her outer works and snow forts from a place where the very glandelinian garrison would not have been expecting it. Their generals from the movements of the fleets that they observed expected an attack on that section of the fortress, and their forces were ready to defend them. For my part I believe that an overwhelming force of Angelinians and Angelinians could have easily stolen up in the darkness of the night during a blizzard storm and suddenly rushed in from the north."

After thinking it over Perrod believed it, or at least that the Rattlesnake boy scout leader was right. The strange looking Angelinian boy scout had made it all out, and had studied all portions of the city of Vivian Wickey as he would have done at an artist's or a puzzle. He was one of the cleverest boy scouts know so far, and as sharp as his queer face looked.

On motion of the committee of the city of Vivian Wickey, all railroad communications were cut off, over and over again, and the city was completely isolated from the outside world.

"I believe you would make a good general over the whole troop of boy scouts," declared Perrod. "If you have no objections I would like to have the permission to show your map to general Greenheart, and ask him if he does not think your idea of ideal strategem would have been a good one, for general Greenheart to follow."

General Greenheart knew much about Vivian Wickey, and her great fortifications. He asked the Rattlesnake boy scout:

"I suppose you should, as he written many things, and has many maps of Vivian Wickey," Perrod answered. "And everyone in the world is thinking and talking about the terrible war and the great sieges. I believe no one can help it. The chief interests of the nation is centered on Vivian Wickey and the siege."

The Rattlesnake boy scout quickly drew out of his inside coat pocket a dingy but large looking and now neatly folded piece of paper, and looked it over with an air of reflection.

"I'll make a sketch of a good map," he said. "I'll try to make one that will make the highest general proud to look at it, and say it is perfect. I can general learned me how to draw maps, and plans, and I always ask him many questions about Vivian Wickey and the strength of her fortifications. But he is so reckless that he'll be killed in some battle before long. He had a narrow escape from being wounded last night during the storm, while out on a scouting tour."

"Please tell us Rattlesnake that you and Colonel Perrod will soon have to be when Hanson's army concentrates along the banks of Gunkel Creek," said Perrod. "Your general has decided for us to do," suggested one of the boy scout Rattlesnakes.

He and the rest of the circle of boy scout officers draw closer, some sitting cross-legged, or their feet way out, and others hugging their knees with their arms.

"This is what he has commanded us to do," began the Rattlesnake boy scout, whispering like some one belonging to a strange secret society. "The hour will soon come for us all. Even all the Secret ones of the Gemini is being involved. And to all of us boy scouts and your whole Regiment too Perrod, and to all the very Angelinians belonging to the Secret and powerful Gemini in every nation in the world, the Signal must be carried, for their recall to Abbelemia and her states. And finally it must also be carried around Vivian Wickey by all those who would not and could not be suspected by the wisest and most watchful the of the insurgents. And if disguised properly who could suspect only a number of boy scouts and one of them disguised as a dirty Calvinian peasant girl. The best thing for all of us is that I can disguise properly as such a girl. And so can Perrod as he is so good looking. My general suggested who could also pass as a bunch of beggars. He says that in some cases as bad as they are the glandelinians will nearly always give a little money to beggars no what country they are of, as long as they don't suspect them as being opposed to their cause. We can pretend therefore to beg wherever we go, except within the Christian lands. And we also can do our part to help the Gemini locate the lost Vivian girls princesses. Perrod if he likes to a shall pretend to be my older sister or young brother, and to take care of me. I will pretend to be shy, and scared of rats and mice. I say speaking to Perrod with a change in his voice that was sudden. "Can you recite poetry or accomplish any good singing in Spanish or Angelinian? No matter how you do it, as long as you can."

"Yes I can sing but only in French and English," Perrod replied.

"Then Perrod will pretend his singing is in some strange foreign tongue to make straying persons give us alms. I'll get the make up to dress as a peasant girl, and also to pretend I'm a crippled cripple. I'll secure a lot of crutches somewhere, and part of the time I will make my way on crutches, and other times on some sleight sleigh or sledges. All those days while we are doing the work we will make our fake makeup as beggars and go wherever we are sent to. And I can go slowly past a man and give the signal and no one may be enemies will ever know the better. Sometimes Perrod can give it when soldiers and others are dropping coin into his cap. In case we are sent we can pass a with out the sword from one arm to another and make everyone do as they now in a wonder of the powerful goddesses that we will work and send our way into the enemy's lines, and we'll only be a dozen boys with one girl and girl, and no one will think we are doing anything. We'll go inside giving away, if any of the Gombi are hiding there. We'll go to bag in the streets, set on the high roads."

"We shall get the money and provisions to make the travels. We face great perils and some of the boys may lose nerve and show something like a white flag," said a sergeant.

"The quarter master sergeant will give us the necessary supplies, and we shall need such. But we must be careful just the same, and get help those who do show a white flag. It would be safer for us to travel by night, and sleep by day. We could sleep in corn fields, shed, cornfield, under bridges or even archways, or in dark woods and so on. I've done it many times, when my general sent me alone on long tours. If it is cold weather like what will come be coming on now it will be bad enough but in summer when the weather is fine fine and hot it's better sleeping on the outside than always sleeping in a mother's tent. Goodnight," said Penrod. "Are you really now?"

"Go anti Gombi as general Gombiheart says did, and for some good reason or other Penrod did not show any resentment because he was ready to do anything for Abbisimian. It was a part of the game of war, and it made them all comrades."

"You Gombi I'm really," Penrod answered him.

"We shall I hope be in giving away when the general fighting of the siege begins. The Rattle snake boy indeed carried on his story with excitement. We may see a part or all of the battle. We shall be ordered to do something to help. We will be sent by our general to signal to others, and carry messages and the like, under a rain of shot and shell, and a storm of bullets. We will do anything. For a few minutes he became so terribly excited that he forgot to speak in his ordinary whisper, and his voice certainly rang out clear as a bell."

"We boys have been in one big battle already. If luck go with us and, given away, is captured, we might then find the lost virgin girl princesses. I mean the found virgin girl princesses, and ask them to let us bring in their brigade of flower and brave boy and girl scouts along. And if this great war rages on in spite of the fall of given away, they could send us where they could not go the selves, or set bigger people or spies. And if I was ordered before their father, I could say to him: 'Your Excellency Majesty, I've called the Rattle snake' because I and my Gombi of boys can strike the enemy sudden blows from unexpected places, and start about, and escape just as suddenly. Order me or my followers into any danger whatever, and I and they will surely do as I would rather die like a coward if I can't serve him like a Rattle snake.' Then he with a sudden motion threw his contenance across his face and he was excitedly excited himself with the picture of daring deeds he thought of. And indeed he felt as if he saw the Abbisimian general, and the virgin girl princesses, who at last were found. Then he suddenly he uncovered his eyes. 'That's what we must do,' he said. Just that, if you wish to know and nothing else, and a lot more. And there's no end of the work then. So there we are. Goodnight."

At the conclusion of this put Penrod a thought in a bewildering whirl. It was more than an exciting war game to him. He was beginning to grow hot and a excited. I over, if either Emperor given or his grand little heroine daughters wanted to send only reliable messengers no one could ever think of suspecting who could be more harmless looking than two apparent vagabond children a boy and his crippled sister wandering about as make believe beggars, picking up the information that is necessary, and not meaning to belong to any one. And the Rattle snake boy besides being dressed as a girl would stand to be a cripple. Indeed it was true—yes it was more than true as the Rattle snake boy said, that his pretending to be a crippled girl, made his look and manner more harmless and safer than any one else. Penrod actually put his face in his own hand and pressed his temples.

"What's the matter, Homosick?" asked the Rattle snake boy.

"No," answered Penrod.

On modern account of the siege of Abbisimian, the Rattle snake boy was out of the picture, and the Abbisimian, the Rattle snake boy was out of the picture.

"Well then, what are you thinking about?"

"I'm thinking that a great general you'd make if you was a man. I'm thinking that our enemies are worthy of Emperor given's little girls. It might be something more serious than a conspiracy after all," said Penrod.

"It might be at that," the Rattle snake boy answered. "If I knew where the head of the Secret Society of the Gombi was, I'd only be too glad to go and tell them about it. I'm in that," he said and turned suddenly to king out of one of the windows of the barracks into the company street. "What's the officers and generals yelling out there in all the fierce confusion?"

All the boys turned to look. The streets were full of excited soldiers, and one of the nearest officers who had a most loud voice and particularly shrill was shouting orders at the top most power of his lungs. There and there dashed other officers among the crowds of soldiers rushing like a surging flood in all directions. The member of the boy scouts for those few minutes spoke of moved, so tense and excited were they. It was evident the troops were driven to panic and confusion the through some cause. The Rattle snake boy listened, Penrod listened, the whole squad of boy scout officers listened, and watched prinking up their ears evidently being suspicious of what was the cause.

"Startling news from the front," said Penrod. "The enemy under Hanley has struck us a sudden blow somewhere, and the Abbisimians are driving the troops back in confusion."

"Turn you confounded cowardly swine and face the foe. One of the officers was a shrilling at to his men. Turn the other way you God diveded jelly plagues. Face the foe and drive him off."

"Here's a chance for us to work," snapped the Rattle snake boy, and beginning to assemble the company of boyscouts in the arched passageway.

"I'll follow," answered Penrod, "forward with your flags unfurled. Told the Rattle snake boy. 'Let's go and signal to some general for help at once.'"

And he charged down the passageway of trees while the company of boys followed him in the formation of squads. Indeed the first battle that was to for Penrod to experience went this way. It was about twenty minutes after eight in the morning when the flag-ship of the Angolan batt fleet then passing down one of the deltas of the Great green river encountered one of the returning Abbisimian transport steamers whose very gallant captain cordially put in the sudden report that a full army of fierce Abbisimian marines under general Rickman Inner Mylotze had moved off for or from Hanley's extreme left near a small abandoned at ockade fortress called the Floristine Pal mende, and had posted itself behind newly erected works and fortifications at the Southwest Bend of the River called Delight Junction, and were steadily holding the position post ion in spite of one of the most desperate efforts of one hundred and thirty three Abbisimian warships and ninety six gunboats to dislodge them. The Abbisimian army had posted itself there with the purpose of making all navigation impossible for christian battleships and other craft. The matter was immediately reported to the Abbisimian general or admiral to whom however could hardly believe it was so but finally he became acquainted with the facts and ordered his whole fleet to be got underway and headed northward up the great river. At the approach of early noon the foremost of the Abbisimian fleet arrived near the southwest bend, where they found the Abbisimian fleets of various ships moving back and forth with big rolling clouds of smoke from their throats during thundering guns, and paying no attention to the perfect storm of shot and shell and high explosives which the concentrated Abbisimian batteries rained up upon them from behind their works. As soon as the advance guard of the Abbisimian fleets came within range a fresh battery of heavy Abbisimian artillery discharged and directed a tremendous volley of broadsides against them, but although their decks at this moment were crowded with men the fire being of too high and too long a range was without any effect whatever.

Through every ship rang sharply the sudden order: "A. All hands under cover!" and immediately the decks were deserted. All the crews in charge of the big guns of the warships were at once called to quarters. And as soon as the big nine inch guns were swung to port and pointed, volleys of eleven inch high explosives shell shells went shrieking into the sea, and upon some portions of the rebel works put unfort unately every one of the shells burst far beyond the rebel positions, and did no harm whatever, out of the shells, at least those on the rebel side I mean who were within hearing of those on the ships and back to the Angolinians a fainting laugh, and yell of defiance and also cries of derision, and the glendelinian bullets and shells fell faster than before.

When the glendelinian army had driven here, their engineers and trench sappers had formed on both sides of the great Horna Run river one of the most excellent breastworks and long snoutworks and rifle pits every ever made by any military achievement. It was evidently possible that only a brigade or two of the most determined men could have easily without any loss to themselves hold eight times their number at bay for weeks.

Only could they be driven out when extensive positions could be obtained where the rebel army could be brought under an inflicting fire of the greatest intensity. But at this section the for station of the river made it most impossible for any so much position to be taken and it could be seen by the very futile efforts of the Abbeonians fleets that it was evident that to face pace back and forth before the rebel works, and to attempt to dislodge them by the most heavy and continual fire of the guns was worse than useless, neither could they be driven back with the heaviest fire of grape and canister, for the enemy in the foremost works on both sides of Delight Junction were the most expert marksmen ever known in the world in bushwhacking. They hardly ever exposed even a small part of themselves, and not even the best marksmen of the Angolinians would ever have the slightest chance whatever of hitting one of the glendelinians, where fore if the rebels must be dislodged it was evident that more important and decisive steps must be taken.

These were the thoughts of the admiral while he paced up and down the main quarter decks of his flagship while the rear admiral was issuing excited commands with his usual strange coolness, each man working at a gun, the entire fleet all the while sending a perfect storm of shells upon Inner Myletze's positions making immense clouds of dirt, snow, wreckage and material of every description fly in every direction like a series of volcanic blasts by the hundreds. Seeing it was useless the order to cease firing was signalled by wireless. It was apparent that the admiral thought it was useless to think of driving the rebels from the works in this manner. The order to cease firing for the present was given, or repeated, and also came the reports to close ports and straighten or level guns, during this bombardment which raged way into the night, Emperor Yivian and many of his generals, and members of the Council met at general Greatheart's headquarters after Penrod had declared the coast clear and after a four hours consultation plans had been determined upon to move immense bodies of troops forward to attack Inner Myletze on all sides and capture his army before Manley could send to his relief any reinforcements.

Greatheart was to pretend to advance his forces upon Kwangolinia Grania to attract Manley's attention to him the next morning after the big blizzard had ceased, and taking advantage of the deep snow it being the 22th of December the signal was given throughout the lines. Hanson Yivian's purpose to support or he proposed to support Greatheart's demonstration, while general Nelson and Rickson and Jackson Evans was to proceed down toward the north section of the north and southward then when everything had been in readiness general Jack Jacob Baldwin rode up to his own quarters as soon as he had seen the signals obeyed and ordered them forward. Indeed at this section the first bloodiest battle of the war was to happen. General Hanson Yivian rode up with his 1st reserve Winkie Abyssinikilian and Abbeonians divisions and riding up to his brother said to him:

"A. Emperor Yivian's request I have ordered my whole army to make a demonstration toward Kwangolinia Grania and to concentrate general Concentinian Archon's whole army upon Jennie Yivian, and as sending forward as many guns as

On desolate account of the siege of Jennie Yivian, all railroad communications were cut off, even after the railroads were cut off, the Angolinians were completely isolated from the outside world.

as I can spare, while I am sending general Hanson's guns with his ninth corps corps to the rear of Inner Myletze's position at Lucy Lane with the purpose to cut them upon Bappa Kwan. If it is possible we can capture that in a insurgent insurgent division for the glendelinian army under Inner Myletze 21,000,000 strong in hindering Hanson's supplies by closing the rivers navigation. I shall also send my battalions of machine guns of which general Rickson will take command and I need not tell them to do their best, but be careful my dear brother and do not need needlessly expose yourself. This may turn out to be a hotter fight than we expect. But Inner Myletze must be got out of his position if possible, and at any cost."

Hanson then rode off and met general Robertson Yivian and ordered him to go with his Domobian and Concentinians to support Greatheart.

"Force your way into Jennie Yivian if possible," he said. The smoke from the thundering christian batteries made such a fog mantle that it completely concealed the movements of the army, and so confusing were they that neither any of the glendelinians generals had any idea what was going on. About six miles below was a point which completely concealed the movements from the view of Inner Myletze's army. Greatheart and Hanson moved with the other divisions under Yivian and Jackson Evans toward Jennie Yivian while the others commenced marching toward and through the wooded regions and toward the point where Inner Myletze's army was posted. Inner Myletze's army numbered ten million five hundred and fifty thousand men in infantry, and the other force making the total of twenty one million were cavalry and dragoons, and all were commanded by many high generals, and other officers, such as Counts, Dukes, Barons and all other titles. The Angolinian armies advancing against his position numbered twenty eight million of which eighteen million were Abbeonians, and were commanded in person by general Jack Ambrose Evans, and with his assistant Rickson Gale, the latter who although a very brave captain general and an excellent excellent soldier was new to his army, and knew nothing of the tactics of the rebel generals. The third in command was general Goss, an ensign belonging to the same division. He had never yet known what a small battle was, never pulled through a conflict without being wounded, and when he first entered the army he knew no more about the nature of the Angolinian rebels than a hen knows about the Geography of the Moon. His appointment had been obtained through some friends in the Abbeonian tribunals. At the beginning of the war he had served in a company of raw militia, and though they all fled before a charge of the goodlier Angolinians, he withstood the rebels single handed, and routed them, but was wounded severely himself. After that learning more about rebels he became the wisest, and now he was considered a great military genius. His own troops moved forward in long lines of battle with heavy skirmishes in front and on each flank, and general Baldwin with his batteries was in the center.

In this manner they advanced for about an hour and then a heavy and thunderous firing was heard rolling on far in the distance, mingled with a sound as if a world full of tigers and lions and millions of other kinds of wild beasts and loud screeching birds were suddenly letting loose all their loudest tumults.

A halt was ordered, and general Rickson with a party of officers, went forward to reconnoitre, while general Goss who was left in command ordered his men into the proper formation. One of the officers approached the general saluted him and said:

"I object to this formation sir. I think sir it may be much better to keep the men moving on for it is by no means certain that all the insurgent Angolinians we will be obliged to fight are to be in front of us."

"I believe you were put in command of your own company were sir," replied general Goss haughtily. "While I was left in charge of this division if the enemy attacked me while my troops are in motion, and a disaster occurred, I would be held responsible. I received my orders from general Rickson and am obeying only him or my superiors. I would thank you therefore to attend to your own affair, and I'll mind my own."

Very good air, very good air indeed." "Forward the colonel," and I did not can to offend you in any way air but merely to offer advice, but as I saw and the company of troops I intend to have it ready for any emergency, but loose the guns boys, and stand by them."

The sound of heavy firing in the distance had grown into the most greatest intensity, and also there was a sound in front that proved that the rebels under general Isner Myletze were keeping up a hot cannon fire directed against the attacking fleets. But still general Cosmo was not at all discouraged, he knew that to keep the troops moving when Rickson had halted his, would cause great disaster.

In case a force of the foe should come from the rear, generally were these very thoughts passing through his very mind, when suddenly there came a tremendous roll of musketry in the rear and nearly two thousand Angelinians fell dead, and ten thousand wounded at once. As general Cosmo had expected the rebel general had no doubt been informed of the movements of the nations Nationals and had sent a large division of his Scoundrels to flank the advancing Christian troops. Great confusion broke out at the suddenness of the rebel fire in the rear, and most of the men who survived only delivered a straggling and ineffectual musketry fire, and then began a hasty retreat through the deep snow, with the exception of the left of Cosmo's division, and more of the better and more braver of the men on the center.

The latter hundreds of thousands of them, suddenly threw themselves behind trees logs, snow drifts, rocks, bushes, and other objects of shelter, and returned in the fire of the rebels for two hours, while the artillery men who were old men at the guns and who had been accustomed to the strict discipline of the service stood at their pieces awaiting the order to fire. General Cosmo for a moment stood pale and trembling at the sight of the cowardice of the rest of his division, and then without waiting to give any orders to those who stood their ground disappeared and was soon upon the rest with the determination of rally them or die in the attempt.

Indeed general Cosmo was astonished when he witnessed this cowardly conduct of his best trained men, and he had to recover from his surprise and had rallied a part of the retreating forces, when the rebels being reinforced by the others who had followed immediately broke from cover with loud yells and curses, and charged toward the guns in long compact lines.

This brought general Cosmo to his senses at once. With the mere handful of men at hand succeeded in rallying he could at least cover the retreat of his timid troops. The strong battery was unharmed and the general shouted:

"Steady and cool there you boys. Aim low, fire."

The one hundred and fifty howitzers, and three hundred pathing guns at once opened a tremendous fire belching forth their contents like a river of destruction. General Cosmo's guns had taken the precaution to have all the guns loaded with shells, grape and canister, and as the glandelinians repeatedly rushed forward in the face of that fearful fire that tore the very drifts of snow from the ground in awful eruptions and waves the slaughter was terrific. The glandelinian columns of attack were repeatedly shot to pieces. The musketry of the hundreds of thousands of rallied troops also committed dreadful execution, and after the sixth charge the appalled glandelinians recalled unable to withstand the fearful and whole sale havoc so wantonly made in their columns.

General Cosmo who was a man always ready to take advantage of such an opportunity as this, gave the orders for an immediate countercharge, with a yell that filled the woods with a deafening echo the whole force at the word going all along the line sprang forward like the sudden appearance of an immense tidal wave upon the shore, and led in person by general Cosmo, Count De Giff, and other generals and officers threw themselves upon the columns of retreating glandelinians who after showing a few minutes dogged resistance fled precipitate leaving myriads of fresh slain and wounded on the snow covered fields, and in the woods. The artillery men themselves worked with a tremendously good will sending volley after volley of shells and solid shot into the direction in which the glandelinians had retreated with the purpose of giving them a good and plenty

On each account of the siege of Avila, all railroad communications were cut off, even soon after the siege began the bridge heads were torn up by the nationalists, who, however, were not able to do more than to cut off the communications between the two armies.

before they got out of their range. As soon as the flankers had disappeared, a loud roar of musketry, and a most tremendous thunder of cannon, and other wild volleys of sound at the front told them that they had many more stubborn glandelinians to deal with. While this severe and sanguinary rear guard action had been going on so fiercely and desperately, the rest of the Angelinian troops who had retreated were met by two generals, and other officers, and also by picked men who were returning from their reconnaissance and as soon as order could be restored among the panic stricken troops, and the other section of the division had been regathered, a fierce attack was made by the main army of rebels but repulsed after a hours most ferocious slaughter, and then the Abhiemians made an attack themselves on the whole glandelinian position under Isner Myletze the glandelinians being posted behind stronger looking works than what was suspected at the southwest bend. One battery through some cause or some cowardice of its new officer in command was pointed into the wrong direction and in a few minutes general Cosmo and Count De Giff came riding up and both addressed themselves thus to the commander of the guns:

"What in the world are you and your battery doing in this location air, firing into the wooded region, where you don't see any glandelinians? And why indeed are you not rearing your battery at the front where it belongs? And I must tell you my dear sir that if you are indeed afraid to go there, and meet the one enemy, you had better give up the command of your battery, and go to the rear."

All through the stormy fray general Cosmo thought it was a nice way for his well trusted troops under Cosmo to act and behave almost of them did a few hours before, but he took it all in without alarm, and ordered the guns belonging to the cowardly officer to be immediately secured, and the men therefore catching up the trail ropes commenced to drag and push and pull the battery through the snow toward the point where the hottest fight was now raging.
While general Cosmo went to the front. Indeed when general Cosmo arrived at the front he found that the enemy of Isner Myletze's army were still behind their long line of works, and land fortifications, where for their whole length, they were exposed to a most galling and destructive fire from the long lines of Christian infantry, who were concealed among trees, rocks, snow banks, and other objects of protection, preferring to run the risk of being driven out of their own works by the fierce fire of musketry than to brave the torrents of shells and high explosives from the main Christian batteries and from the fleets, which now began to fall into the woods before and behind them and burst bursting, throw immense columns of dirt, snow, and showers of branches and rocks in every which way about and upon them.

General Cosmo did not wait to receive orders but immediately placed his divisions in a more favorable and sheltered position, ran forward his batteries, and immediately opened upon the left wing of general Isner Myletze's army a furious fire of shot shell and canister. This fire was so severe and along such a long line that it was as if the very rebels were under a perfect shower bath of shot shell, grape and canister.

By all the desperate efforts and brave dogged exertions of other officers and generals all the rest of the panic stricken soldiers were collected, and while a new line was being formed for a headlong charge, general Cosmo was ordered to move his battery out of the woods into the open fields in order to get better range and order his infantry forward.

When he heard this unusual and rash order or command, general
Cosmo's blood ran cold, for though the attacking Angelinians outnumbered Isner Myletze's army, the glandelinians had the advantage of position, and all this while the Angelinian generals had been prevented from ordering a charge and recovering the glandelinians only through the fear of their own shells from the fleets, and also the glandelinians were sending a perfect hurricane of bullets and grape shot, and shell into the whole stretch of woods where Cosmo's infantry and artillery were stationed, and a thunderstorm of hell seemed to rage and crash.

Despite his present position of protection general Cosmo had lost the already a hundred and fifty thousand of his men in killed and wounded only, and now when he thought what an awful slaughter there would be, when he should move his troops and batteries out of his concealed position it made him shudder.

however he felt sure he had no alternative but to obey, for he had always been thought that only with the strictest discipline can success be obtained and if he was aggrieved he could surely seek satisfaction or redress afterwards but this without doubt was a very poor policy indeed, for what could in the world would it ever ever do to make of orders to objections to any such orders, after too many of his men had been so wantonly sacrificed to no avail. And indeed all the men of the division and of the artillery were also fully aware of the grave danger they were about to surely incur, but they did not hesitate a single moment, when general Gomo repeated the order to make the advance. At the command the whole division of troops at once rushed forward, while the long line of cannon were put out into the open ground and the effect was just as all had certainly feared. The attackers swept on with irresistible force and reached the very enemy works and rifle pits, but the whole fire of the rebel cannon and musketry was broadly directed in full force against them, and all those who reached the works, and many ranks behind or all of those also and many platoons further in the rear of the line of charge were shot down at once, while every volley of rifle balls, and grape and canister from the enemy left general Gomo with less number of battery gunners to handle his artillery. It was even soon becoming impossible to load the guns for as soon as a gunner picked up a rammer or a sponge they were shot dead. Men after men went to each gun but every time one approached he went to his death. General Gomo then turned to his assistant and said:

"General Gomo go and ask his Excellency general Pickens if I cannot be allowed to retreat back to my old position. I can do more execution there than here and also if we remain here, we'll all be dead men in less than two minutes..."

The officer thus addressed immediately bounded off to execute the order, and just then the general and two colonels and six captains of the battery were killed, and twenty other officers wounded. General Gomo immediately seized the priming wire which one of the fallen officers had dropped, and despite the protest and entreaty of his officers worked with the other gunners. Indeed the fear that had possessed general Gomo had now given place to probably the most reckless determination in his life, the purpose to do his duty at all costs despite what the consequences might be at the end, and any way if a disaster did occur no blame could be placed upon him.

However while he waited for the return of his officer he became very impatient, and his impatience increased ten fold worse, when word was brought to him that his artillery and his infantry were exhausting their last round of ammunition. The delay in the return of his general seemed very, very extraordinary and while general Gomo was still waiting, a general charge was ordered.

It was without the slightest doubt that the very "landolinian generals and their under officers had a good idea what was in purpose for a few minutes or so the order, for the rebel line had slackened the musketry fire considerably but as soon as the whole line of christian soldiers, belonging to general Pickens and other high commanders issued from the woods and other shelter they were met by a most terrific fire all along the line which shattered their advance completely and moved down three quarters of the whole assault. General Gomo's line though reduced to almost nothing held, but Pickens were thrown into great confusion, and began to disperse. Their general was killed. The survivors despite the orders and entreaties of their other officers refused to push on, some of the immense column of the Angolinians remaining in full view of the insurgents too panic to advance, and too bewildered to retreat while at every minute countless numbers of their own comrades were falling constantly round them.

Seeing the confusion among the waves of slowly retiring Angolinians the enemy finally rushed forward to make a counter charge, and most of the Nationals without waiting a moment to offer the slightest resistance broke with loud yells and fled in every direction like a swarm of frightened sheep. Only the few christians that remained firm was that only under general Gomo, and these Angolinians remained at their exposed position until they were badly and badly reduced still further, but the survivors soon discovered that they were deserted by the main columns, and were soon compelled to fall back into their main positions.

On account of the siege of Iviana, all railroad communications were cut off, even soon after the siege began, the telegraph having been torn up by the nationals, wire facilities, completely failed, and Iviana was completely isolated from the whole world. The situation was very serious.

The officers of the other columns exerted their utmost and managed to rally a portion of the line at the edge of the timber, and these men again bravely standing their ground met the landolinians with a most murderous fire than before. Before the battle and the shells and grape from the long range christian batteries which now began to burst in their midst like a torrent of death and destruction completed their own confusion, and they in turn were compelled to retreat to their own shelter after having sustained the most dreadful loss of the war yet. In an instant general Gomo and many of his infantry and artillery men sprang forward at the counter charge with the purpose to recapture one of the christian batteries which had been left between the lines by the retreating columns of pickens divisions, but they were all moved down and general Gomo mortally wounded. The other brave christian columns however springing up pushed on with irresistible fury yelling like a million wolves but the landolinians being on the watch everywhere shot all of them down also and after a loss of only thirty three thousand men in slain and fifty thousand in wounded rushed forward and general Gomo who took general Gomo's place was driven back and compelled to order a retreat. To attack the rebel position here meant annihilation.

All through that terrible morning the severe and undecided fight was continued the landolinians themselves making two more roaring charges in long surges of many miles long, but the few fresh Angolinian divisions coming up to the support of general Gomo repulsed them with great loss, tearing their lines to pieces, and each time the infantry of general Gomo's army made determined but unsuccessful attempts to recover that battery but as often were either all shot down, or those who survived were compelled to retreat leaving too great a number of his men on the field to his liking, and a great number of the men in the hands of the insurgents as prisoners. The battle raged now with inconceivable violence. The right of general Gomo's new line rested on the edge of the river between Delight junction and Lucy Lane Lane where a full view of the counter attacking landolinian columns could be easily obtained, and also also a view of the attacking christian fleets. The contest raged here all day long with such fury, that the country in this region was devastated, and no advantage was gained on either side, and the losses were simply terrific in the extreme.

The demonstration of general Gomo's command made upon the region along the Iviana line in the heights followed by the concentrated movements of general Iviana's army along the left region of Delight junction and upon Lucy Lane brought an assault upon general Gomo's forces made by general Gomo's landolinians that swept all before it, and half destroyed his army. The landolinian loss here however was frightful in regiments instead of men, and hundreds of officers fell, and the woods was scathed by the dreadful artillery storm of fire on both sides. Hanson's line held its position but met an assault, and no movements were either made upon general Iviana's troops by the Angolinian insurgents, and were able to send reinforcements to general Gomo's aid, and covered his retreat, tearing general Gomo's army to fragments. Hanley came to Gomo's aid and pressed the assault with redoubled violence and pushed on victoriously with the purpose to capture the christian camp it self.

General Concentinian Aronburg, and Hendro Gale met some severe disorder but it was only like the coming and passing of some storm with its fringe only touching them, or as if these christian divisions were struck by soft cream puffs. The attack upon general Concentinian Aronburg's line however caused the death of the landolinian general Bellingtonbell and two others were wounded, and half the rebel army captured.

The blow upon general Gomo's army however was like a railway engine hitting a small peddlers cart. He could not stop the total rout of his survivors fled for the rear like an army of scampering mice before a horde of bull-dogs. General Gale met the hard shock of the assault too but was able to hold, and repulse the attack along his line by slaughtering every charge and after three hours desperate fighting in which fearful numbers fell on both sides hurled every lance and lance-corn back column back. Greatheart's panic-stricken troops were heaving toward the unoccupied part of the camp, while the boy scouts perched and the Rattlesnakes were at their plotting, and within fifteen minutes after the confusion started the head of the column reached the camp within sight of the two boys and the Rattlesnakes' followers, who seeing what was up rushed down the passage of trees in time to see the whole thing. The boy scout who was quick-witted shouted their own "sir!" voices above the roar of entreaties, and commands of the officers.

"Meet the foe. Meet the foe," he, "Ivian" girls are somewhere near, and the y are in danger on account of your retreat...."

It however took more than two hours of tremendous effort to rally portions of the forces, and while these were preparing to make a stand on the edge of the camp and while the oncoming foe was visible in the distance like the onrushing of a huge gray tidal wave one of the officers who had succeeded in rallying a regiment reported that a hundred barracks were afire, and a thousand tents were going, and that already the enemy was in possession of a portion of the camp. This was true as an enormous cloud of smoke proved. At this moment while the tumult was like a screaming cyclone and thunderstorm in one a colonel reported that some distant station was making frantic signals.

General Augustine St. Clare who was the one, who by peroxide aid rallied part of Greatheart's shattered division immediately hurried along the left of the line calling out at the top of his voice:

"Lieutenant, General Gump. Where is my signal corps officer, Lieutenant general Zander."

For a few moments or so there was no answer but the continual of the wild volume of sound, and no one among the disconcerted troops had seen the signal officer or any of his staff since general Greatheart's forces had been so disgracefully and ingloriously defeated at the beginning of the fierce glandelinian onslaught.

"For the Love of Heaven some body pass along the line the call for Lieutenant general Zander Gump," shouted the general.

The order was obeyed and finally a faint voice from one of the soldiers replied: "Not here sir. He is badly wounded, and his entire staff is dead."

The general then saw a soldier among the Angolinians who was an Englishman and who had joined the Angolinians just for sight seeing.

"We'll wait in the name of Jupiter are you doing there sir?" demanded the general angrily. "You also belong to the signal corps, eh? In the world are you not at your post? Get out there with your signal flag and answer that signal station." And the general drew out his note book.

The foe forlunner who had no right to be in the Angolinian army at all, took a good look first at the long wave of advancing Scodder, glandelinians, then at the many big fires burning in the camp, then at the excited general, and then down at the flag, which he held in his hand, but did not make a single move. It indeed was a most dangerous undertaking. If he went out to answer the signals which were now still more frantic, he would be obliged to stand where there was not even a tree or bush to protect him, and where the advancing lungers would surely see him. And the rattling of countless numbers of rockets along the partly rallied Christian line, the answering fire of the fierce Scodders, the sharp cyclonic whistle and roar of the tempest of bullets as they flew thickly about the soldiers, and among the trees, and the roar of some far off portion of the conflict, and the yell of defiance from the enemy and their horrible blasphemies and imprecations, and cries of derision from the rallied Angolinians, and the pandemonium of confusion among the rest, so worked upon the cowardly instincts of the man, caused him to be thoroughly terrified, and as he had never heard such a tumult of sounds before, or saw such a fierce looking horde of glandelinians in all his life, or such a tremendous fire burning in the camp, the danger seemed a hundred fold worse than it was for real facts.

On account of the siege of Ivian, all railroad communications were cut off, even soon after the siege began, the tracks having been torn up by the nationalists, wire facilities, completely failed, and Ivian, being so completely isolated from the whole world, the first week of the war was completely cut off from the world.

Within a few moments general Biff came up and relieved general St. Clare and took charge of the situation himself and having made out the signal which was: "That is the cause of your retreat general Greatheart, now are you proceeding elsewhere?" and then exclaimed: "Mr. Englishman immediately make answer that general Greatheart has been crushed, that we are standing our ground on the edge of our burning camp of Greatheart's position, that the cause of the retreat is uncertain, that our ammunition is getting scarce and that—?" "Well why don't you start Mr. Johnnie Bull?" He roared angrily and spat an impatiently seeing that the Englishman did not even stir a foot from his post.

"Your Excellency, Yes sir, Your gracious Excellency," faltered the officer speaking in a voice that could hardly be heard. "I'm not allowed to do it sir as I am not of your country sir, sir, sir, and it would make me very glad sir, yes very happy sir, yes indeed Your Excellency, but sir I'm a foreigner, sir, but—"

"I don't care what your nationality is, but do as you are ordered sir this very instant."

"Really Your Gracious Lordship, Your Excellency Excellency, but you see that I—"

Phelapman could speak no further, but stood before the irate and impatient Count de Biff, trembling as if he had convulsions, and showing the utmost fear in his face. "You're a yamsucker, and a sneaking coward sir," shouted the Count in a terrible rage (for he hated cowards). "Mean contemptible coward. But his business had you to join us if you are like a Jelly fish."

"I know it sir, Your Excellency, Your lordship," replied the Englishman, frightened that he did not know a single word he was saying to the general.

"But Your Excellency, you know that the real truth is truth is—"

"GET OUT OF HERE, and go to the rear," shouted the general, and for my "and for my life, and the life of my army to the rear and remain there until I send for you," he boy scout. He continued turning to perod, who was standing by watching the scene with evident disgust. "Are you able to make those signals?"

"Yes Your Excellency I can," declared perod very promptly, however his face appeared to suddenly change its color for the first time in his life, for though he had witnessed the fiercest conflicts he had ever observed of believe it, and also was very much used to the noise and confusion of battle, and had gone through his hazardous experiences during the battle of Plegburg Landing, he knew only too well that there was very grave peril in the work he was ordered to undertake.

Whether he felt fear or not, his face showed unflinching determination and brightness instead of betraying terror of any kind. He had fear indeed, but his greater fear was of being a coward, after all he had talked of wanting to do and of the shame of being branded as one, and he knew that no matter what the results may be his duty must be accomplished, even if he died a thousand deaths. Without hesitation he hastily picked up the flag which the cowardly Englishman had dropped in his overpowering fright, and after giving him one last look, sprang quickly into view of the distant signal station, and started the flag waving in answer. The nearest of the rebels had observed the signal flag waving above a tall wall of jagged rocks covered with snow, and immediately directed the hottest fire upon it, its frail protection was riddled by a perfect hail of grape, besides bullets, shells and shrapnell, and great high explosives burst all around and above him making his perch a perfect inferno. At perod made the required signals and retreated in safety, just as a shell hit the rocks, and blew them up like an eruption.

Perod escaped unhurt, and reported to the general that more shells had been made ordering general Greatheart to abandon that section of the camp, now in a fierce conflagration, and if possible to make a retreat as he might to a stronger position of the lines. The word had already passed along the whole active portion of the Christian line to slowly fall back when Colonel Francis Smith approached Count de Biff, saluted and said:

"Your Excellency it is against my will to make a retreat without my battery of machine guns. Will it please you sir, to allow me two brigades of the fiercest men to help me recover it?"

"I cannot spare but one brigade sir," answered the general. "I cannot send to many men out there in that deadly ambush sir. It is certain destruction sir."

The colonel at this began to think within himself that the Count de St. Clare suddenly became either stingy or very careful of his own men, and therefore accepted the one brigade without reply, and hastened that force to the very spot his shattered regiment in retreating, had left the battery. Just as soon as he arrived he was overjoyed to find ten of his howitzers and four of his machine guns safely in the hands of those of his men who had rallied, and as he came galloping up in front of the brigade a number of shells and a broadside of grape and canister went crashing among the foremost of the rebel line mowing every rebel soldier down there, and followed by a triumphant tumult of shouts and yells from the gunners.....

The same men who had succeeded in recapturing the guns by throwing a rope around the trail wheels, were making desperate efforts to secure the others in the same manner.

A few of the attempts were unavailing, but finally they succeeded, and though under a hot fire every one of the remaining guns were pulled back safely to their proper places, and the rebels at this section repulsed by the heavy fire of the brigade. When the gunners under cover of this fire had succeeded in regaining the remainder of the ammunition, all of them that could caught up the trail ropes, and without a moment's delay they all recoiled, still covered by the fire of the brigade, and then took up a strong and new position in the center of the retreating main line. The victorious grand divisions with fierce yells followed the retreating remnants of general Greathart's divisions so closely that the covering artillery and brigade had to halt frequently and drive them back. During one of these desperate stands, general St. Clare, and Waldron Darger were wounded, and the Colonel of the covering battery killed. General Henry Darger then appeared on the scene with his division as if by magic, and without an instant's hesitation gave the command to the disordered troops of Greathart's divisions to fall back more rapidly, while he himself would cover the retreat. His own divisions then formed, and gave the enemy a good reception while at length before the recoiling troops reached the main portion of the camp, the ammunition for the batteries being exhausted one of their leading officers who survived the disaster immediately made the request for the permission to make the retreat of the artillery much more rapidly, and get the guns safely to the rear.

On account of the edge of Vivian's bay, all railroad communications were cut off, even soon after the siege began, the troops having been taken up to the national wire facilities, completely failed, and Vivian's bay was completely isolated from the main world. The first week of the war was the most complete and solid for the nation and the world. The war was the most complete and solid for the nation and the world.

CHAPTER FOURTEEN.....
THE RESULT OF THE BATTLE OF DELIGHT JUNCTION.
WHAT WILL HAPPEN TO THE COWARDLY ENGLISHMAN.
SOME OF MORE DOINGS OF PENROD AND HIS FRIENDS....

THE permission was readily granted and the artillery men succeeded in getting their artillery to the rear without the loss of another man. A few minutes after general Greathart's men came pouring into their impregnable shelter, while the batteries in the fortified works commenced shelling the slowly advancing Indian forces. While general Greathart's forces were succeeding in holding the enemy, general Greathart rode up and signalled for general Greathart's division had been reformed, the countless number of men covered with dust and gore, and their faces begrimed with powder, stood at attention in their place in the snow, while a portion of general Greathart's division formed in line directly opposite, and regarded their comrades with sorrow depicted on their sunburned faces. General Greathart knew that the battle of Delight Junction had been most desperate and bloody one for the numbers engaged, and that he had suffered most severe loss, but he could scarcely believe his eyes that when he discovered that out of forty thousand brave artillery men, who had started out with him in the morning, but fifteen hundred were only remaining, that all the rest had been left dead on the battlefield, or prisoners in the hands of the voice was hardly audible when he called the roll of his once so splendid division and his captives increased, when at almost every name he called out with the assistance of officers and men came the answer: "Not here sir."

A few minutes Emperor Avian himself appeared. The reports he received about every point of the battle was very unfavorable, and the great rulers face looking white and sad, wore a look that betokened trouble for some one. Hastily running his eyes over the list of those missing in common division, and others, and over the small lines of dust and bloody men who stood before him and Greathart he said in a very low voice as if he was speaking to himself:

"Only fifteen hundred gunners left, and half of general Greathart's division destroyed, and after my council and plans so secretly held last night, could I afford to lose so many men, you may go to your quarters lads. I'll send doctors to see that the best care is taken of the countless wounded." After he delivered this order the emperor who was very ill at ease turned and slowly away. As soon as the immense body of soldiers had gradually disappeared to their own quarters, general Greathart with an aching heart, repaired to his headquarters to call his surviving officers, and some of his Gemini staff an investigation as to the cause of the disastrous defeat. While he was waiting for them to appear he thought of the horrible incidents of the day and gently he was heard to repeat to himself:

"Only fifteen hundred left of my artillery men, fifteen hundred out of twenty thousand, and my division, lost six million, some two, and the others lost a loss indeed in one day. Eighteen million, when all killed and wounded, may more prisoners, some one blundered." What a tremendous and whole sale slaughter it had been—a useless slaughter beyond measure there had been all along the line, the attack upon Kletze's position also had been a bloody failure, and some was killed as assistant and many other officers and generals under him wounded even death, and as it was believed that the disaster had been caused by the

and most inexcusable ignorance of some of the commanding generals on Greatheart's right, they were reported to have instead of making the proposed demonstration, drew by some infernal blunder a violent and overwhelming attack upon Greatheart's army by the whole of Marley's army, and which was delivered with such force that nothing could withstand it, and had the general's position which his army had first been in the result would have been different, and how had the boy scout penrod gone out into the exposed ground with his signal flag, and escaped without a single scratch? He had stood besides the soldiers in the thickest of the fight freely exposing himself, and then rendering himself extremely conspicuous by the flag and his uniform, and had answered the distant Christian signal, and the flag had been riddled and torn by bullets, but not a shot had touched him. It seemed to every one but little short of some tremendous miracle that in the face of that dreadful masonry and artillery fire he had come where so many when so many thousands had fallen round him and all killed too, unscathed, while he still waited for the coming of the officers, General Greatheart in the report he received from Count De Giff, angrily dashed off the following note:

TO HIS MAJESTY ROBERT ANGELIC VIVIAN!

Having received reports from his godship Count De Giff, and also from some of my officers in command of the demonstration with the purpose of helping General Jackson dislodge a force of rebels posted in works at North Bend near Delight Junction, that one Englishman in my command was a coward and disrespectful to my officers, and for causing the reckless exposure of my boy scout and foster son to the worse fire of the rebels of the battle, and finding out that these reports are true, I respectfully request that the highest Court of Inquiry may be convened to examine into that Englishman's behavior while under the enemy's fire, and of his cowardice.

Your obedient servant;
General Richard Haldon
Greatheart
Lieutenant General of Right Grand Division.

General Greatheart slowly paced up and down in an excited manner while awaiting the coming of his generals, and during the coming of the first listening carefully to the low conversation of those present, and especially to General Jello Marce Penlign, who sat in General Greatheart's chair, and talked and smoked in a cool manner, soon all were assembled and the consultation began. Penrod was the first called upon.

"Go on don't be afraid to tell us anything," said General Penlign. "I want to hear all of it. He was a coward and shall be shot if found guilty. You noted him a fine lad indeed."

Penrod then told the facts of his visit to the rattlesnake boy-scout (third visit) secret enclosure beyond the archway of trees, and of their quick work when they saw the approach of the retreating Christians. He began at the very start, and all the generals listened with a deep excited interest. All this day would never pass from him throughout his life. He would always be able to call back such a memory—the wild fury of the conflict, the panic and confusion of the Greatheart divisions, the rally and stand of a portion, the cowardly act of the cowardly act of the Englishman, his own daring, and even now the strange erect bearing and actual beauty of the tall form of General Greatheart, which even the great men's sorrow and anger could not hide or dim.

On such an account of the siege of Vivian, all railroad communications were cut off, even after the siege began, the troops having been torn up by the patriots, wire facilities, completely failed, and Vivian, today was completely isolated from the whole world. The first week of February, the most stormy and cold for the besiegers and besieged, for a whole week blizzards raged every day accompanied by the heaviest snowstorms, at falling at the rate of two inches an hour, and a foot an hour at their worse. On account of the snow storms everything had come to a stand still, even sleigh traffic was impossible as the horses could not plow through the deep snow. During one of the worse blizzard storms the wind increased to a terrific typhoon, increasing in velocity with such rapidity that thousands of houses per minute were torn to fragments, and their wreckage scattered far and wide, and the whole Christian camp was swept clear of all tents and barracks, while the snow raged at the rate of a foot an hour for whole days was driving before it in blinding clouds so that no objects could be seen five feet away, and then the night drew on with dreaded apprehension seen on the faces of every one under better shelter as the violence of the cyclone increased. Hundreds of thousands of thousands of wailing soldiers at the beginning of the storm bravely struggled against the madly swirling snow sheet and fierce screaming howling wind in their efforts to reach places of refuge, especially in dugouts. All the soldiers of the besieging armies who remained within their barracks crowded to their utmost were injured and killed by the thousands as their shelter was shattered to fragments.

As the storm increased darkness settled on the besieged wind raked city and vast encampments of both sides like a pall while the wind ever increasing shrieked with frightful velocity, and the snow fell heavier than ever threatening to bury the encampments under the white sheet, and worse for both sides and worse for the Christians preceding the blizzard, and after the blizzard when all was partially reestablished once more came a most heavy artillery fire. Barracks in the glaciolite encampments and also those of the Christians that had hitherto withstood this cyclonic blizzard tumbled and crashed before the explosions of so many shells, carrying death and destruction to thousands. Roofs were sent whirling through the air by great explosions, windows were driven in with a crash by the concussion, or shattered by flying shell fragments.

Telegraph, telephone, and electric light poles with their masses of wire were cut down, or snapped off like pipe stems by the explosions, and their concussion, every point within the region of the siege, had become a mass of wires, all water communications were being broken, a king water and food very difficult to obtain during storm and colder weather.

That fecuity the von bombardment attained a few hours after it started was purely a matter of speculation—the heavy detonations of falling barracks buildings and the piercing cries of the wounded broke the air, and the rear of the artillery storm. Dead bodies of the gunners slain on both sides lay like leaves fallen from the trees, and the whole region looked like the Valley of Ten Thousand Smokes.

All this heavy artillery fire made a harrowing day that may never be obliterated from the memories of the survivors. Thus raged and passed one of the most frightful and destructive artillery duels which ever devastated the besieging and besieged lines in the history of the siege so far. The cities of Glaciolite and Angolite encampments were filled that night with wounded by legions, bereft of shelter and shelterless soldiers, while the visit of the batteries would have shown by the fitful glare of lanterns and flashlights right in death, hundreds of artillery men lying in all postures and half buried in the deep snow.

Indeed whole companies of artillery men when picked up were placed aside by the officers to the privates. Men and officers on the verge of despair were searching for their beloved comrades amid the deep snow near the batteries and under the bad debris of their recently happy homes. Nearly every one who dared face the terrible cold were engaged in the gruesome work of searching for the wounded, while many thousands of others were bordering on the verge of insanity over the appalling bereavement that had suddenly come upon them.

Colonel Samuel Marcus, artillery officer, and also a military telegraph operator, despite all his efforts to save them by trying to make them lost his three best guns and all their gunners by two great explosions and no one could locate their bodies in their deep snow. When speaking of the matter he trembled like an aspen leaf. General Lewis, Jr., another artillery officer, also found one third one third of the number of his gunners lying in the deep snow by the guns.

Captain James Trippler's Signal station was torn down by an enemy shell and every one on top of it was killed. Major Jessie Winterfront, another artillery officer lost his entire battery crew.

The telegraph offices of the christian lines are in a plight beyond comprehension. The wires are down in every direction for fifty six miles. There was only one wire out of Jennie Arvin town, the night before the great artillery fire and that was in use by the many army generals. It went down at Two Thirty o'clock in the afternoon. Gangs of soldiers were put to work until a force of fully forty thousand men were at work, even under sniping rebel fire, straightening up poles, and stringing wires. The following night the Western Union at Jennie Arvin had three wires out via by way of Litchburg, ending, and the main christian lines.

Ten thousand christian officers tried to get telegrams out to the section of the besieging armies at Jennie Arvin, and expressed themselves in various ways when they found they could not. In another night without disturbance from the enemy, the conditions had been improved, as to wires, and both sections of the army could again resume business with each other, but only north and south, and not east and west. A large number of news paper men came to the army from Angelina, Jethia and Corrothy Gale and Ossa town and each one of them had from thirty two, to two hundred and fifty messages of advices in his pockets from government officials from or in these cities, and other places, on the outside. Later on gasbont came up the ice a chooked river of Norma Run and this brought more than twenty two hundred thousand messages and letters giving advice, as if the soldiers and they had not enough trouble and work already. It looked as if half the country of California were trying to send advices by telegrams to the besieging christian armies, and as quick as a fire was reported in shape it was quaded and soldier telegrams were put to work, getting messages, out and receiving them. Even the very war correspondents of outside, and National newspaper men were piling matters up sky high, and within another day the abbeisnapper postal offices refused to rel received any more special.

The Western Union telegraph of Jennie Avian town continued to handle them, subject to much delay. At five o'clock at another Morning some of them were still hanging on the books. At every military telegraph office extra men had been put on until there was no room for them to work more. The advice messages continued to pile up and many correspondents were already filling matters h up which was to be sent in answer as soon as possible.

All the other wires were being put into position with remarkable quickness despite the efforts of the enemy to frustrate the workers, and it was possible that military "specials" would be landed in the futir future with greater ease. Every person arriving from Gorthy Gale, or Angelina Agathia brought illter, messages to generals and other officers, some of the messages we re urgent advices and or a orders. The official news came more slowly, and more than confirmed the wildest and most alarming first dispatches. General Whille-Bon gump chief of the signal stations, declared that the siege of Avian city, was which had developed into an enormous investment of a most gigantic city, was central at the gorma gatherine and Jo-Whirther Janet sections and was rapidly increasing in its vise like grip, the battles at Jennie Avian and gorma possinia being the bloodiest conflicts of the siege so far.....

It probably willis and vor wol would have if true, passed into any history as being one of the most stubborn, disinterested, tenacious, destructive bloody as well as most peculiar signs on record. On the gammy general jump deduced that it was a matter of years before "vian" liokey fell.

VIVIAN STURKEY

"First news from main line just received by wireless, that great conflict raged with artillery of over two hundred thousand guns, only a few days ago, and the deep snow covered ground of both sides is strewn with shell scattered debris, and countless dead bodies. Two large batteries of general Baldwin's command, was silenced, and overmounted. Nothing at that time could be seen of Ivan Jokay as there was too much smoke from the burning of a hundred Glendolfinian camps. Loss of life from the artillery duel, and also loss of artillery and military property was undoubtedly a most appalling. Weather clear and bright here with strong north westerly winds. Extremely cold. Fourteen below zero here.

Colonel general,
J.B. Lorette & Co., 1110

His first look of life reported during the artillery duel was that of Battery B, under Col. Colonel, latter near company 1, where three of his most prominent and best beloved officers, and twenty men of the battery lost their lives, and where many others were maimed and imprisoned and frozen to death under their disabled guns; the dead officers were Major Galbra, 2nd Lt. Captain Peter LeBaron, and David Killjoy a Lieutenant. They were commanding the retreat of the battery to a safer range, and although the danger from the enemy's shell fire jealously killed them, and from others that they would stay within full range of the enemy's shell fired from the consequences.

suddenly close to them or about forty yards there was a terrific and stupendous eruption of smoke, coarth, and snow to a terrifically great height, followed by a terrific crash that shook down barracks by the score from the concussion, and a number of guns about fifty were killed into the air like stones thrown by a strong man, the three officers being killed. One of these guns in descending fell strong men, the three floors being killed and the three guns in descending fall through the roofs of barracks, killing all within, and others fell here and there among the companies of men or into the company streets. From the concussion of the explosion the roof of a number of barracks a mile away caved in with a crash every soldier in the upper rooms being killed, and all came down with a deafening roar of killing and wounding all of them in the rooms below. But many of those in the lower part of the building escaped with their lives in a most miraculous manner.

The falling roof caved in the flooring with an ear-splitting uproar of crashes all of which debris were caught on an enormous bar and balcony many soldiers standing near it dodging and resting under the debris. At the same time a soldier who had been sent for an army sergeant was killed by the fragment of this gang gun shell though he was more than twelve company streets away from the scene of the explosion. At another portion of the same battery every battery gunners were imprisoned under broken guns, and shattered gun carriages, and frozen to death in the deep snow. The living ones were rescued by a party of soldiers headed by Captain Phillips. Many of them were badly hurt but still living and half frozen. He spoke of the explosion hung over the scene in thick dense clouds for half an hour and approaching to one of the company streets, where the barracks had been raised to the ground by the concussion of the crash near the battery, by climbing over piles of debris which had once been barracks fourteen thousand bodies were observed in a space of four hundred yards, and seven hundred in one of the ruined barracks while as many as six thousand bodies were to be seen lying singly and in groups in the space of a line of works where forty more guns had been tossed into the air like rubber balls by the same explosion and all from this one explosion. Notable among the sufferers of this same disaster was General Stanek Keefern who had for years been an expert artillery man and known to every Argentinian army. As this general came trudging along toward the rear he was lamenting the loss of his whole battery one of one hundred guns and every gunner he had in his command, and where his headquarters stood on the river bank facing the Vivian wharf there was not a vestige of a building to be seen. The pagoda and remnants of tents and barracks had been destroyed by the same concussion and followed camp Olympia. There were many more killed here than at the site where the rescuers were.

 hundreds were in sight from the snow after the snow began to pour down during the outbreak the snow after the snow began to pour down during the outbreak of a winter storm, the wind growing and leaving the dead to be buried by the snow compelled a return to the line and leave the dead to be buried by the snow and recover them when the storm was over. The misery of the poor soldiers now without shelter, thousands mangled and hurt pressing even in the snow at one to the base hospitals for medical attention was a great augmented by the fierce wind and blizzard storm pressing at one of the best base hospitals with the purpose to avoid the storm injured. The food and also the found it packed to overcrowding with seriously injured. The food and also the medical provisions in this base hospital had been almost exhausted. The food and also the and there was nothing for the numerous patients who came hungry, cold and three, hurt her down the company street a large army winter caisson which had been partially demolished by shell fire was serving out soggy snow covered food and bread and bread and shoes to the hungry crowds of the many shelterless soldiers. And that was all that was left. Much of the snow had gotten upon the food and made it wet and soggy and the soldiers who were fortunate enough to get these provisions were cold and hungry and made no complaint. All other barracks had been selected as places of refuge by a large number of the homeless men. In windows in the buildings and portions of their walls in the damaged camps had been blown in by terrific explosions and during the artillery duel the occupants had expected every moment to be their last. It was impossible for about the buildings shells had been exploding so rapidly that to go outside meant destruction.
 a hundred thousand tents had been burned down, and the soldiers had to live through deep snow nearly five feet on the level a mile to find shelter. And so far as can be learned up to eleven o'clock on the night of February eleventh approximately eight thousand bodies of slain soldiers had been piled up in what can be properly termed the Vivian Wilkey Artillery duel pits. Five thousand and hundred of these bodies of dead soldiers were gathered up by the medical relief forces operating along the battle front of the siege for the distance of twenty miles between the Wilkey Artillery junction.

Bulletins received in Gorthy Gals railroad headquarters reported that advanced troops of relief parties penetrated across the Gorny Run and across and sent couriers back to the Christian lines. These army couriers reported that six thousand, six hundred sixty three bodies of dead soldiers were found in one company street for the distance of two blocks, and that sixteen thousand six hundred corpses were at one place in the outskirts of the camp, and four thousand, four hundred in another.

under complete martial law until order could be restored to the Thase.
And the situation two days after the Artillery duel was that on account of the extreme into city of the cold all attempts at burying the dead soldiers and artillery men had been abandoned and when possible bodies of all were being and disposed of in the swiftest manner known. Thousands of them were burned, and many over thousands were taken to the Gorma gun river and with weights on them were thrown into the deepest waters, especially where the water had not from frozen over the safety of the whole besieging army was a very paramount question indeed and nothing that would tend to prevent an outbreak of an awful pestilence the coming summer being being neglected.

This was indeed awful work in such deep snow and such cold weather, and few soldiers were found with sufficiently strong nerves, or ability to stand the terrific cold to last at it more than forty minutes at a time. It was forty three below zero.

Major general "Incensinian" Glendora reported his assertion that the number of victims of the enemy's gas was 150,000. The enemy's artillery fire would reach fifty thousand and many of the enemy's estimates were as high as one hundred and ten thousand. The enemy estimated that one one hundred and seventy signal stations operators and one hundred and seventy signal stations themselves only three escaped death and destruction during the gas artillery duel. The terrible cold, as well as the too deep snow and windy hurricane like winds, and the conditions of the many frozen bodies, and carcasses of artillery horses as well as from the wreckage left by the explosions of shells, and the dense smoke of thousands of fire burning every day since the artillery fight, made the work among the dead, a most fearful task and a hard and difficult one.

artillery was always active every day, at some point or another inflammable boat loads of highly inflammable materials, and other inflammable were brought in and used where most needed to burn dead bodies. The deep snow and the were cut down by the thousands, and made into funeral pyres. The thought it at many in inability of the horses to even pl pull sleighs at times through it at many places was a serious feature of the situation, as better progress could have been been in hauling off the dead had the snow been less deep, and the cold were less severe, and the signal weather reports were "The worst cold wave of the winter is coming. Fifty nine below to morrow!"
The cheerful news indeed. All attempts to identify the dead were abandoned. The majority of the bodies were mangled, torn, and beyond recognition, so except when some article in the pockets gave the name the body was burned or thrown into the river where it was not frozen over on account of the swift current, without without being recorded.

And these g Kind of glandelinian spies had becoming extremely bold do doing every thing possible to obtain whatever they were after, at no matter what the risk or cost .what a blessing it would have been if these very spies worked for a more holy and worthy cause.One spy who had been shot and killed had in his pockets twenty eight important letters being sent to gorothy Gale by various generals.One of these letters was a report to government headquarters at Angelina Agathia advising the abandoning of all works or unmissed works at Jermie Avian or their tr strengthening, which ever was the best and safest safest

He said in his opinion, the city of Jemima, given by the desperate battles about her, was destroyed beyond its ability to recover, never this it did not dissuade local authorities for the city declared that after the war the city would be built anew in spite of its losses.

The night scene and local war correspondents, and those who were not in the army or who did not come to offer any help were refused admittance within the territory of the great siege as there were already too much danger, and one quarter of the army was shelterless everywhere throughout the whole size of the siege siege a million so shell explosions occurred every two weeks. At this time every effort was made to find out the actual loss in life and army property. One suggestion was a new census or roll call of the section of the army in the region of the great artillery fire. It was believed that in no other way could anything like an accurate estimate of the casualties be made.

All kinds of relief corps of examination had arrived, and as usual they were too large in numbers, and to a certain extent in the way of the soldiers of the siege and a great impediment to the prompt relief which they themselves were as desirous of offering.

Some of the relief expeditions had committees so large and large enough to consume forty per cent of the very provisions they brought.

The relief sent from Calcutta (Calcutta) twenty miles north of Vivian was arrived within a day after the disaster, and was distributed as fast as possible. It consisted of two immense train loads of provisions, and some by way of the goodie and Sacramento railroad. The great trouble seemed to be that these people or soldiers who were in greatest need though no fault of those in charge of the distribution but on account of the intense cold and deep snow were the least to receive the aid. Many of the injured soldiers were so badly maimed and wounded that on account of the severe cold weather they were even unable to apply to even the relief committees, and these committees were so overwhelmed by direct applications that they were unable to send out any of their messengers.

Contributions were coming in for the soldiers as rapidly as possible, it being reported that over $300,000,000 was already in the hands of the army committees. The countless numbers of wounded in the army at every point needed the attention of army physicians sorely, and despite every effort it was feared as an unaccountable number of them would die because of the sheer physical impossibility to afford them the aid necessary to save their lives. Every officer in the besieging armies able to command was engaged in the work of relief with all the energy of which he was capable.

But despite their utmost endeavors they could not keep up with the increase of the miserable conditions which surrounded them. The river close to the shore and other streams were so terribly frozen that water could be obtained by able bodied soldiers but with the most greatest difficulty, and was even most difficult to obtain. One of the generals who was busy in the relief work declared to general Vivian after a while that there were one million three hundred thousand at St. Camp Mary without water and very little fuel. They had either been receiving or making coffee of snow and melted ice, and using that as their only beverage.

Indeed the most sharp and painful contorts in human nature were brought out by the duties which devolved upon the stricken sections of the Christian lines. General Francisco Vergal was the most noted officers of the besiegers.

Lieutenant April was his aide-de-camp, and a great favorite of his men. These two officers were among those who put lime and other disinfectants upon themselves, and went into the fields, and despite the intense cold, and wind and deep snow worked for hours in the most dangerous task of all handling away of the mangled and shell torn corpses.

Indeed it was work from which the stoutest hearted shrank. Yet many soldiers who lived always in the northern part of California and where it was coldest volunteered for it. The whole army being living in a whole death heroic heroically with their greatest emergency.

Receptions were withheld, forbidden, some exercise of force was deemed necessary in the hours of confusion which followed this greatest disaster of the siege. The army it was found out had a considerable number of foreigners, such as Germans, English, French, Italians, Dutch, and Spanish, and Turks, and many Mexicans and Negroes and others.

When the officers organized for the burial of the many dead soldiers some of these foreign foreigners saw a number of spies rush from their headquarters each belonging to general Grant, General Vivian, and his brother, and some also from Emperor Hanson.

"Stop you dirty Vandals, we want you," some of them cried out to the spies.

"We don't have to come back," was the reply.

A number of well aimed shots rang out from the very foreigners. A little later the spies were found dead. Almost everybody except a very few of the foreign foreigners proved themselves loyal to Abhimania, and when called upon took up the duty assigned to him. In some of these foreigners were worse to the enemy than the Angelinians or Abhimanians were, especially the Mexicans.

At a meeting of the generals, reports were received from various points. Every general called for armed men to assist in getting all the men possible to dispose of the dead, and clear the wreckage, and arrangements were made to supply the demand. There were countless volunteers for this service but an insufficiency of those able to withstand the terrible cold and wet and the committee of army officers did all they could to clothe these army soldiers sufficiently.

It being decided to clothe soldiers who were only impressed into the service, and issuing orders for extra rations to only those who did their full line of duty, and those who were wounded. Survivors told of getting out of their barracks just in the nick of time, when fire. They told of soldiers or seeing soldiers struck by shells fragments, or by showers of earth and flying timbers and snow hurled thousands of feet all around by great explosions by the score every minute and crushed to death in the wreckage of barracks before their eyes. One lieutenant was cut off from his company just as he thought he had them out of range of the enemy's fire, and saw fifteen hundred men killed at one time by a terrific explosion of a gang-gang-shell.

He turned in to rescue others who were in peril. One soldier fled toward a refuge carrying a five year old child slave set free in his arms, only to see a heavy iron beam hurled by an explosion in five hundred yards away, strike the child on the head, crushing her skull and simultaneously knocking out every intestine in her body. He suffered a broken arm, bruised leg, and probable internal injury. The crash of this explosion was equally as terrific as that which blew so many cannons into the air, but it blasted two barracks of buildings to smithereens and dug a crater in the ground forty feet deep and five hundred feet wide. Trees were prostrated by the thousand, and the eruption of smoke earth and snow shot upward to the height of seven hundred feet. The same explosion shattered a vast canteen a hundred feet from where it occurred. Fifteen hundred or so soldiers were caught in this company canteen and it was presumed that all were lost as many had been reported dead who were known to have been in this army store which had been blown or via pieces from the air waves and concussion than by the mere blast itself. The rescuers buried one hundred and fifteen of these souls of one company street.

The graves of these soldiers made under the deep hardened snow crust were marked with rude wooden crosses. Colonel Francis Lovegood an officer of an Abyssinian squadron who lived in Angelina Agathia before the war reached raced all the way across a shell swept plain to reach his men whom he found to have escaped the disaster. He raced from meadow to meadow and not a shell injured him or his horse.

In the enormous winter signal station which stands one hundred eighty feet high, on Belliver junction, about twenty five signal men were at their duty during the tremendous artillery duel.

Most of those whose own tents had been swept away by a fierce conflagration were there. Among them was the signal corps officer general Keyo sunia. This officer stated that when he reached the signal station two days before the artillery duel that he sent his men up to the top to get it prepared for use. During the artillery duel they all spent an awful day on the top of the structure but nevertheless stuck to their post. Their work was a success in a way, but they received a great demonstration of remarkable incidents as to the force of the great explosions. The river was fifty yards away. One great gang-gang-shell exploding in the bay covered river shot a roaring sheet of water and shattered ice skyward to the height of eight hundred and thirty feet with the roar of a water rapet and tornado and thundering crash at the same time, and the men were soon showered as if with a torrent of rain and hail. A number of pails on the platform were filled to the brim. Another explosion sent a blizzard of snow rocks and earth upon them. A tree vaulted into the air by the concussion splintered its branches into the frame work of the structure. Many other freaks such as actual tornadoes occurred. Yet no one was hurt.

SUFFERING OF SURVIVORS.
CONFLICTING ESTIMATES AS TO THE LOSSES.
VANDALISM OF REBEL SPIES. HORROR UPON HORROR.

ALONG THE WHOLE LINE OF THIS tremendous battle of artillery, after the wicked glandelinian rebel army had struck their blow to the artillery of the besiegers a smashing blow, the bright moonlight of a cold winter night enabled the rebel forces to continue by night in spite of the fierce cold their work of recovering and reloading the many remaining injured and also to recover the bodies of the remaining dead still lying by the crippled batteries.

So great was the loss that no one for a time could make any reliable estimate as to the number of killed and injured christian artillery men alone, and also of those killed in the barracks and outer works by the hundreds of thousands of explosions. Yet an accurate estimate of the number of missing was believed to be one hundred and fifty thousand to one million in all along or all alone.

Many bodies were buried deep in the snow and those thrown into the river by the terrific explosions were probably carried out to sea by the swift current never to be recovered.

While the search along the region that was devastated by the enemy's artillery was swept by the rebels artillery shell fire for a length of sixteen miles was kept up, it would never be known how many artillery men lost their lives owing to the fact that there was such a large territory or river shore line and small swept and snow covered country to be gone over. All night long the searching parties walked and combed the battle field in search of bodies and recovered many, but they were not identified. A day or so later a dispatch was sent from one of the generals in command of a division at Vivian, Wiskey, via-Jennie's former containing this shocking information:

"Twenty seven glandelinian spies acting more like vile ghouls, eight of them officers, and the rest privates were caught within the christian lines, after robbing the headquarters of the general's packages, maps, and other things were found in their pockets. These rebels had been promptly shot down because they had refused to give themselves up but made desperate attempts to escape. In all about one hundred and fifty of these glandelinian ghouls all disposers of some general's headquarters, have been shot down and another spy who attached some officers had been killed. Strict strict martial law reigns within the christian lines. Friends who like buzzards thrive at such a horrible time as this are given no chance to escape from the lives and we are under orders to shoot them down like dogs, and these orders are obeyed very willingly.

A herd of glandelinian spies in attempting to make an escape attacked a squad of Abyssinians soldiers guarding general Evans headquarters. Hundreds of shots were fired in a minutes time, and sixty of the glandelinians were killed, and a number wounded mortally, and the rest escaped. Every hour during that cold wintry night other shooting of glandelinian spies were reported at general Vivian's headquarters. Even on a morning following the disaster, a Goodie soldier glandelinian attacked an Angolan officer who was a colonel and with the purpose of securing an important plan murdered him in the most brutal manner.

After a long hard chase of seven miles through the deep snow and intense cold and failing to catch him a number of the soldiers opened fire and blew him head off. Reports of many cases similar to this had reached army headquarters.

The Angolians were never used to terrible crimes. This reports moved them to instant action. Eighteen other desperate murderers caught looting army quarters, and attacking child scouts in the same day were killed by the soldiers of these glandelinian spies being fully determined that their cause should win have become desperately bold doing everything, facing any peril to secure what they were after."

On a

On another day this dispatch came from the scene of the horrible siege:

"The glandelinian spy vandals were holding a perfect orgy in their purpose to secure what they were after. The greater number of these glandelinians are Goodies but there are also Gammannians, who take part in the desperate and dangerous spy work.

some of these also were Gammannians and some of these entered the christian lines under the disguise of being escaped Angolan refugees from the enemy's camp. Not only did they rob a general's headquarters, and murder some officers, but they set fire to the structure of the camp, or even a whole camp of tents to cover up their escape or in order to secure what they were after, taking advantage of the fact that the snow was too deep for the military fire department to get to the scene of the fire on time to prevent a conflagration. A party of twenty glandelinian spies were seen running from a general's headquarters. It appeared they had stripped the building of all valuables, in papers, lost letters, plans, and maps, and the pocket a of some of these glandelinian looters were fairly bulging out with most important documents.

Increased at this discretion of a general's headquarters and also the mutilation of an officer, the looters not being able to be captured were shot down to death like dogs during the pursuit, and it had been determined that all such glandelinians caught in the act, and since they were too desperate and dangerous to be captured, shall be shot in summary fashion, purging the robbing of a general's headquarters not only were important papers stolen, but huge military maps were carried off, and also geographicals in order to secure information of great value to the rebel armies.

Even on a moon account of this extra troops patrolled the company streets. Even boyscouts have also endeavored to prevent the robbing of a general's headquarters, and on many occasions have also killed the spies. It is said that at one time eighteen or were killed and at another time fourteen among the many incidents during the night was the daring work of four hundred and fifty glandelinian spies, besieging a regiment guarding the headquarters of the Vivian Irish. They were surrounded by a large horde of Gammannian Goodies. One thousand seven hundred and ninety six shots were exchanged, Colonel Griffiths killed fourteen with his rifle, and about eighty were killed by the soldiers. A force of Abyssinians came to the rescue and after a spirited conflict lasting half an hour in which forty thousand shots were exchanged with incessant rapidity out down and routed the survivors. But their own loss was heavy, every minute during the night a fresh shooting of a spy was reported at headquarters. It even became evident that to bury the dead would soon have to be abandoned unless the cold discontinued. The cold on the morning was just as the weather reports said, and so intense that the bodies fairly froze to the ground, and had to be dug loose with pick and shovel before they were taken from the snow.

Instead of burying the dead soldiers, as that was now impossible on account of the cold the order was given to burn them, the reason being too many to waste time on to bury especially in the intense cold, and therefore that day wherever the dead bodies could be found in the deep snow or found in the snow filled ruins of the barracks, torches were lightened, and terrific columns of flames soon consumed up these dead bodies.

Thousands upon thousands of soldiers were seen at these spots in that day of most terrific cold, many stamping their feet and waving their arms like insane men to keep warm while waiting for quick transportation to other parts of the christian lines, some for day to break as so as to permit the burial of the corpses of which there were still countless numbers scattered upon and down the line of battle, and over all the field and prairie for the distance of probably ten or twenty miles. Countless other soldiers were waiting for a first chance to get as far away as possible from this terrible scene, and very scarce this day were the soldiers and men found who were either willing or who could stand the frightful air like temperature to work in collecting up the dead in such deep snow, and most of the soldiers who had lived in northern parts, and who were willing to work and could stand the cold, had a desire to boss each other, and which did not improve matters in the least.

An organized force of considerable proportion should be sent to the stricken artillery positions at once. Glandelinian spies, felons, vandals, child kidnappers, and fire bugs have been robbing the headquarters of general officers, and others and murdering and pillaging. One glandelinian spy was trapped in the middle of the night, but shot himself but they got him.

When the pockets of the dead spy were searched a general's letter to Governor Vivian was found with a picture of Jennie Vivian, one of the Vivian Irish in the envelope. From the branches of many trees, tangled the bullet riddled bodies of glandelinian spies and fiends who even rifled the bodies of the dead soldiers, and officers. On one of the company streets was seen lying a row of bodies, Goodies and Gammannians shot down, while trying to make an escape after robbing some officers headquarters of papers containing valuable information. Major general Pholans great committee of vigilantism caught these fiends at their work. They had been shot down while trying in vain to make their escape. There the bodies lie frozen stiff in the intense cold, for as yet there were no provisions to burning or burying this class of dead. One spy was seen struggling with an officer near general Hanson Vivian's tent. He was shot down, and then strung up to the nearest tree. Then sixteen men in two squads, pumped his full of bullets. At the Virginia Junction across from the creek, where the killed and injured lay the thickest was the main harvest of the landelinian ghoulies. Whatever was of value to a rebel officer was taken. There were twenty thousand bodies lying here. All efforts of the officer could not stay the awful work of the landelinian vandals. Many of the bodies seemed dead soldiers, were fairly stripped naked by the soldiers of the enemy, of the dead soldiers, were fairly stripped naked by the soldiers of the enemy, in their efforts to secure what ever they were after. No effort was ever made to take whatever valuables were saved inside the lining of a coat, vest, shirt or pants, the clothing was taken even. There was nothing among the surviving work of dissection. Colds and winter fevers was appearing among the surviving soldiers, and the medical staff was unable to cope with it. There was hardly any water to be obtained as everything was now frozen, and the little water that was obtained was max from melting snow or melted snow and clean ice. And the winter diseases as well known was spreading. It appeared that nothing could stop it, but the arrival of more doctors and supplies. Friends and soldiers were sternly warned to keep away from the location of the artillery battle, and long barreled rifles and bayonets backed up the warning.

But this was done in a christian spirit, and not with the intention to be brutal. The safety of the thirty six million soldiers still living made this a necessity, for every day the enemy's shells were always exploding in this location five per hour or more, and the terrible cold was already overcoming many of the workers. This whole region was a vast charnel hell.

So scores of thousands of dead sleighs hurrying from place to place filling with the awful cargo and then sped away into the river where the bodies were dumped into large scoops and towed out into deeper unfrozen water of the swift current. The waters of this river where it was not frozen over floated the bodies for a few minutes, and then swallowed them up.

There were short services, a few prayers, and then a "splash" "splash" as the corpses were thrown to their last resting place, then the military funeral cortege of big scoops returned to the lines for other loads.

The many guards quelled the resentment which rose in the breast of heart broken soldiers, as other bodies were thrown into the many dead wagons. It was done all by the order of the officers who said: "It is possible and must be so that the living must be protected from disease when the summer months come." The whole christian camp is a perfect harvest for "landelinian ghoulies." In the quarter masters stores of the camps are millions of dollars worth of goods, which are always in danger of being set on fire or carried away by these very vandals. These wicked landelinian vultures looted whenever they can, and the staring eyes of the countless dead have no terrors for them. One man an Angelinian who was of excellent standing and intelligence told a war correspondent on the way to Angelinia Agat his a day after the disaster following the artillery duel that the officer of the guards did not place enough sentinels to prevent these outrages committed by the landelinian ghoulies.

He had been in and out of that section of the christian lines several times, and was also on the relief committee. It is no doubt he had no reason to tell an untruth, nor was it probable he had any intentions of telling an untruth. Yet his statement was entirely without foundation. The officers of the guards at all parts of the line had placed guards at all points of the points to be guarded. Go with millions of other stories. The disposition to jump at conclusions to repeat rumors as facts is a most common failing. But so enormous was the calamity that no story of escape or tale of horror seemed impossible.

During this same terrific artillery duel which lasted full twenty four hours the entire country of Abbie annia and other states were shocked beyond comprehending, and saddened beyond measure by the news paper reports circulated all over by the Angelinia Agathia daily. News that many women and children and especially child slaves, and even child scouts had been killed or burned to death when the explosion of a fire shell tore their shelter to pieces and set afoot the ruins on fire. The siege of Avia, Wickey however had and was so tight, and the regions around the rear of the siege so remote on account of the danger of approach of rebel armies that at first the reports of the terrific bombardments and its horrible effects had been necessarily meager and even up to now while the dead and wounded had been still picked up there had been very few details of the terrible happenings that turned that one terrible cold day into one of the first and probable most heart rending tragedies of the war. Here for the first time since the terrible artillery duel happened the story was told as best as possible by an foreign newspaper man and war correspondent.

The day of the artillery duel fell cold and clear at the region of Delight's junction. In the company street in this location had been taken all the child slaves, women and children and refugees and others including boys and girl scouts from many miles around, and despite the thundering artillery duel without the place was decorated with wreaths and garlands of the celebration of some recent victory past, and big twisted red ropes and made of bright red and green papers like that used for decorating at Christmas time. Outside since the recent heavy snowstorm the trees of evergreen kind were almost hidden and burdened down with their weight of decorative snow. In front of the barracks stood the Angelinian National flag the most beautiful flag of all, and near it stood a general's big tent made of heavy canvas, and its top decorated with what appeared to be a golden star. At this section of the nature of the artillery storm most of the women and children were being sent here by the soldiers believing these places would be out of range of the enemy's fire. Most of the refugees had come that day from as far as more than fifty miles to this big barracks, bringing with them their families, even from old grand mothers and so on to the babies in arms. The child scouts had also come here with the purpose to keep them in order. For weeks and weeks these child scouts had been drilled in the best military style, and now the girl scouts in their best uniforms and the boys, did all they could to keep the refugees in good cheer and prevent anything like panic and confusion, each of them a quiver for what in expectancy of what may yet come. In these barracks were over five hundred souls either in seats or standing, but fearful facesome with dread and waiting with as much hope and expectancy as the children for the terrible sound of cannons and shell explosions to cease.

Some sang and some sang hymns. Just at this moment one of the christian officers came into the doorway in his full uniform and at that instant there was a crash above the barracks like thunder but a hundred times louder and at that moment there was a gasp from some of the refugees.

"Look!" cried some one and pointed out the window.

A great explosion only a few hundred yards from the barracks had hurled a dozen trees up into the air and shattered others, while one was split in two and the top part bending slowly over as if ready to fall. Before any one could realize what was happening it had fallen, then there was another crash close to the barracks and a shell exploded on the roof tearing it asunder and making plastering and timbers come down. The stove was upset by the timbers and the wreckage flashed up like powder. Other wreckage fell upon the burning pile and half a dozen more of inflammable pieces burst into flames. And in another instant a shell tore out a whole wall, the upper part of the barracks became a torch of fire the wooden woodwork flaring and the burning pieces dropping through the heart of the mass and setting more of the wreckage ablaze.

The children nearest the conflagration arose screaming like mad and scrambled pell mell over the wreckage. Then there was a sudden rush from all quarters as fathers and mothers and child slaves tried to get to them. In one single breath the room that had been so quiet became a pit of panic filled with struggling, fighting screaming men, women and children. The pile of wreckage burned even more brightly and fiercely, fire began to dart up the east wall, and the scene became like an inferno. And high above the turmoil came some notes of a hymn. Some of the girl scouts who had kept their heads had leaped upon some table and stood there hands uplifted pouring out their notes they knew best, with the desperate hope to bring the panic stricken crowds to its senses.

If any one did hear they heeded it not. As the struggling groups continued on a big piece of timber fell from the blazing roof and struck the table, and hurled the girl scouts from it. These brave girls went down to be crushed to death under the feet of this milling crowd. Six doorways led from the schoolhouse or barracks I mean, some opening inward, and some outward. However there was no escape in those locations for those within the room and especially for those who were closer even as wreckage also barred the doors. And now the heat of the fire had set or started to set fire to their clothes. One yet strove frantically to get out the door ways, but the wreckage kept them firmly closed, and men women and children fighting to get out failed to do so.

Then came a shout "the windows, the windows!" Men therefore doubled their fists and smashed out the panes. But if there was any escape out by the windows death lurked outside. Shells were exploding outside by the score per minute. And now the rushing air fanned the flaming roof, wreckage and wall. The flames from the wreckage darted to the unruined part of the ceiling and to the decorations. The ceiling was of heavy pressed paper and wood, and large pieces of this loosened and fell, blazing on the heads of the crouched throng below. Thousands of wreaths and paper ropes scattered another rain and sparks of fire upon them. Their clothing was set on fire, the burning cardboards of the barracks ceiling dropped upon the very hair of their heads, and tongues of flames licked about their faces while dense clouds of smoke almost choked them. Hard muscled men continued to tear away at the wreckage barring the doorways, and frantic mothers and child slaves clawed and scratched at the jagged pieces out and tore their hands. But at last one door was freed, and one after another the terrified children began to be handed out.

Ten child scouts the first of the heroines a lay dead, trampled and now buried under a portion of the ceiling which fell. The other heroines were three girl slaves who were soon to die. When the cry of "explosions" and then "fire" had been first heard, they had been sitting on a bench in the rear of the room. Some of the boys tried to force them to go to the doors before the wreckage fell. They struggled free, ran to the front of the room, and began to huddle together many of the younger slaves, and in the outstretched hands of men and women women they handed as many of them as they could. When the one doorway was at last cleared of the wreckage one of the boy scouts had again readed them.

"This way out," he cried to them.

"Go take these young children," one of them answered, and began pushing and dragging the little ones toward that one open doorway. The boy scout passed them out. Suddenly a crowd of panic-stricken others closed in on them. The boy scout was separated from these girls, and carried to the rear. And these brave girls each of them having an arm about a baby of three to four, when they were trying to shield them from the fiery rain were swept off their feet, crushed to the floor still holding the children, and there their lives were trampled out of them.

James Andrews, a young lieutenant and his pretty girl scout assistant, had tried also by their efforts and songs to still the terror. Before the outbreak of this confusion they had sat clasping their hands on a rear seat of the barracks. The next day as they had proposed, they were to be married. It was a romance that had started at the very outbreak of the war.

"Hold tight to me my dear sweetheart," he whispered. "I'll get you out of this scrap alright."

"I know you will," said the girl, and clung desperately to him. At the mass of panic-stricken refugees soon forced them apart. The poor girl was pressed to the floor and trampled. She died bravely there, while her lover was swept out through the now open doorway into the open. It was ten of the boy scouts who had succeeded in opening that door. By some miracle of strength and courage they had managed to get to it. They had pushed and beat back with clubbed pistols and rifles those who had tried to reach it first after they succeeded in clearing the wreckage. Then they managed to clear a space sufficient to pull it open.

When like sheep being squeezed out of the narrow neck of a corral the burning people began to come out of it. How indeed was their progress for among them indeed there were many who did not want to get out by that doorway. They wanted to get back into the blazing rooms of the barracks and pluck it from it wives, and children and child slaves, sweethearts and mothers and other relatives.

They fought desperately to get back, closing the way to the others. And now the supreme horror happened and at once. Slowly one of the blazing walls began to topple. An irresistible rush of the immense crowd had forced those against it on its skirts and those nearest the wreckage against it. Children and grownups stumbled and rolled about the base of the wall, which already eaten through was disturbing its balance. A wall of wreckage and fire, the wall first bent slowly inward, and then fell crashing, pouring sparks and immense tongues of flames upon the heads of those within its range. The masses of thundering wreckage fell children by the score, and then pinned them up in a seething sea of fire. The children beat at that mass of blazing wreckage with their little hands, and tried to crawl from under it with the flames fairly searing their faces. Men and men and child slaves tore at the wreckage most desperately and most determinedly trying to drag the little ones out. Many indeed died within that inferno of fire. When a shell again exploded smashing the rest of the roof to save in, further the fall of the roof and wall had cut off the one open doorway and all but one window. Now it was this one window or nothing, and out of that seething furnace through that one single window those pressed who were still living, and those who dropped either through faintness or the pressure of the crowd were trampled to death. At last all those who had been able to finally escape were out in the biting cold of the forty below zero day. From the time that the first shell tore open the barracks, over to the time that the last scorched survivors had gone out the door only ten minutes or less had really elapsed.

There was one scene of great nerve racking means. After this tragedy there had been a checking up of all those who were missing. Many women were weeping for their little children. It is supposed that they were in the burned barracks. Then later some of these mothers felt a tug at their skirts and saw their children had escaped. It was all of a full day before the fire burned out or was put out by the army fire department sufficiently to allow these heart-broken people and soldiers waiting in the bitter cold to search through the burned wreckage for what was left of their loved ones. Three hundred of those who had escaped had been taken to other parts of the camp seven miles away, where they could receive medical aid.

Of these had been taken to unoccupied tents and army houses. Still many others burned, bruised, and in some cases, with broken hands, arms and legs refused to go. They would not leave their own dead. At last when the fire men got out the last dying ember the tragic search began. They found many pitiful groups who had come or been brought here from many miles. One man had brought with him his wife and his two small children. There were those who had seen the four of them standing at the last, clasping each other in the very center of the blazing barracks, with every means of escape cut off, and there after the fire burned down the barracks, their blackened bodies were found, arms of husband and wife still around each other, and what was left of the two children still clinging to them. They found to the bodies of the dead a child scout. Recovery of all the bodies on account of a fierce blizzard and colder weather was very difficult. And in so many instances only enough of the bodies snow covered now were only recovered that twenty eight of the dead could be buried in one grave. There was no way whatever of establishing what part of the body had belonged to any boy or girl. Bits of bone and scorched flesh and charred garments were gathered reverently, and placed in the graves. Two days later nearly a hundred died in the Base hospital, and forty more in another, and probably all the rest will carry to their graves the disfiguring scars of injuries and burns. Others will be life long cripples. And for all this it will be said when the proper time comes the Angelians will retaliate.

During this great artillery duel a great fire was said to have broken out in the "Lillian" city. Over the city could be observed what appeared at first to be a bright pile of snowy colored smoke clouds perring above the western heights of "Lillian" city. It was succeeded by another and still another roll of such clouds each seeming to push upward the other and towering with dazzling brilliancy in the deep blue winter atmosphere atmosphere, while all the while in the direction of the "Lillian" batteries rattling palls of rolling cannon thunders were plainly heard. The clouds of smoke were now rolling in immense volumes over the top of the city, the summits of the snowy clouds still bright and dazzling, but the lower parts of an inky blackness. The lightning flashes from cannon volleys and shell explosions seemed to leap from work to work and streamed quivering along the ground. The thunder of bursting shells crashed in thousands of tremendous explosions, the peals were echoed from work to work and wood to wood. The shells crashed upon the Christian lines, and then their echoes rolled up the long defile of rebel fortifications, each fortification making a new echo until every point seemed to hallow back the tremendous noise.

For a time the smoke from so much firing hid even the snowy landscape from complete sight. There was indeed a fearful pall illuminated still more fiercely by the streams of flashes which glittered from the cannon volleys and shell explosions. Never could have any one ever witnessed such a warring of cannons it seemed as if the shells of both sides were rending their way through the defiles of the fortifications and fortified camps of both sides, and had brought all the artillery in the world into swift and intolerable action.

When the war correspondents entered the Christian lines the thing was too vast to make an attempt to investigate each conflicting story, the features of each barracks building wrecked by the enemy's fire and every separate happening about or probably an million happenings. They were forced to use their own judgment about whatever excited soldier was ready to tell.

Indecision: every prolix soldier they interviewed was a loss of time. They asked many hurried questions. They did not even have time to compare one soldier's story with another's. The result soon came that the barracks and other buildings which were far out of reach of the bombardment during the battle of Delight's "unction" or which were not harmed or captured by the enemy, were reported burned or wrecked, or looted by vandals, and torn and shattered by the artillery fire of the "Lillian" lines. ....

Hundreds of thousands of soldiers, nay millions, who were never within sight of the artillery battle, or who had not joined in general vivians assaults upon Inner Myriads at Delight's "unction" were said to have been killed, and many other millions wounded. Thousands of shooting affairs that never happened were accepted as having occurred. It was even reported that from fright and horror the "Lillian" army had even committed suicide when they were still walking around the company streets of their own part of the lines as if nothing happened.

Supplementing this great exaggeration by soldiers of high degree, by officials, by militia officers, and the reports of generals even who believed so many soldiers were dead because they had not seen them came the great constitutional liar. The culpability at general vivians battles (his batteries were not even in the battle) was the turning loose of this liar, he burst his chains and as it is said the devil will do in the last days of the world, and for several days ran riot in that stricken portion of the Christian lines. ....

Yet the most fantastical efforts of the spinners of yarns could not beat the truth. It was simply a lying about details, where the disaster happened, not the results, while the general facts were almost beyond exaggeration, except by general Charles Brown who reported truthfully to anxious enquirers two days after the artillery duel and his serious repulse of general Lyvian assaults upon Inner Myletze at Delights Junction in monotonous one this very information, Christian batteries under general Luckwick Baldwin covering attacks of christian troops upon Inner Myletze wiped out, one hundred and fourteen thousand artillery men and infantry in ruined barracks killed. Artillery men in total alone 10,000 in killed and total artillery men in loss as far as one hundred ten thousand in killed and wounded, christian loss of infantry battle eighteen million in killed and wounded, christian forces reported defeated and Greathearts camps captured. Kindermine saved the day and prevented the whole christian line from being broken. Great fires raging. No one just now allowed to go visiting in that location. The countless numbers of survivors of the infantry battle are being cared for and fresh batteries are being placed in position and general Lyvian taking Baldwin's place the latter having been seriously wounded. All wounded must leave that portion of the christian lines day after to morrow as the region may again be shelled by the landelinian batteries....."

Curiously enough however the stories of horror were the chief delights of the exaggerators. He did not tell joyfully that everybody in a barracks had been saved but that they were all buried in the ruins, and that fire consumed them and the wreckage. A One man in uniform went about the worse places, and boasted and babbled to all the soldiers that he was a commissioned war correspondent by profess profession who happened to stop within the christian lines on war business, saw only the great artillery duel of the battle, he had formed a corps of fourteen hundred reporters (when in fact he had only formed two) and was cabling 449,000 words to the Angelina Agathia News, and had already compiled a list of 514,999 in identified dead artillery men alone, a alone and a million wounded. If he had really cabled these numbers he must have done so as it can not be understood where ever it was a cable ran underground from Lyvian wick to Angelina Agathia.

It is also most probable that if this beautiful liar told the soldiers that he was cabling nineteen billion words, and had a list of nine hundred million dead artillery men, and a hundred million wounded, and a thousand million disabled, and that Baldwin would have lost a hundred million cannon and had seen the whole city of Lyvian wick burn up at the same time, and the christian lines blow up into the air, they would have been foolish enough to believe him.

When it came to the stories of the wicked landelinian ghouls robbing an officer's headquarters, the favorite yarn was that a well dressed landelinian officer or soldier had been caught with the most important papers in his possession, and that some one else had put it in his pockets to avoid detection. In each instant a soldier with unsavory aim shot the wretch to death. If you don't believe it ask him!! These stories were belied by all who repeated them. Yet no one ever found the soldiers of a christian general or gln landelinian vandals did loot some headquarters of a christian general or of some other officer, and these looters were shot in attempting to escape, but the real storioes of how, or when and why, were lost in the stupendous background of death and destruction...

Illustrating the human weakness for exaggeration: the man who insisted the dead artillery men numbered more than five hundred thousand, was the very same man who asserted that in three hundred and fifty years, Lyvian wick would not fall, though besieged by one hundred billion men, and bombarded by one million cannons. Even two days after the terrific artillery storm and battle of Delights Junction came this news received at Angelina Agathia!!!!

"The burial of the dead soldiers goes steadily on. The cold wave is more intense than ever being sixty eight below zero, all the corpses, in the open along the shore near the frozen river, or near and among the snow covered wreckage have been sunk into the river where it is not frozen, or buried in the ground or burnt by fire. Twenty thousand men who could stand the intense cold were put to work, and in sixty minutes fifteen hundred frozen corpses were found within a space of three hundred yards square. And the labor of clearing away the debris of wrecked barracks in the search of the bodies of the dead soldiers began at Company A. One of the worse wrecked parts of the whole of Baldwin's wrecked camps, whole regiments lay dead, piled up in the most indescribable confusion... old soldiers and young torn by shell fire or crushed by falling timbers, were by hundreds dragged from piles of snow clogged debris or dug from snow drifts mingled with debris six to twenty feet deep. Aged officers were lying among more robust forms rescued, but now dead and frozen stiff dead child slaves were still clinging to the soldiers. Young girl scouts with their arms around brother scouts, and so on. These were the melancholy sights seen by those digging among the ruins of the barracks or snow banks.

In hundreds, the bodies were turned up by pick and shovel, rakes and ax, and even explosives, the soldiers working and freezing together in the cold weather. Away to the left the wreckage stretched two miles to Company Street of Company L, and to the left a mile and a half toward Delights Junction, and south of it.

Popular sentiment insisted that the north end be set on fire and burned but the generals hesitated to give the order for fear the conflagrations would spread to the encampments that had not been damaged by the great battle. Three days had wrought surpassing changes in conditions at this portion of the christian lines. Each day had been a big chapter in itself. The day after the artillery battle and infantry action was complete paralysis. It had had been complicated by a terrific snow storm and eye lons. On the following day came the beginning of realization. The third day might have been called the crisis period, and the crisis was passed safely. What had been accomplished since the turning point on that day was amazing.....

It was almost an incredible measure of the effects of this visitation were without precedent. On the day after the artillery duel and battle, the confused soldiers did little, but go about dazed, and bewildered, gathering only a few hundred of the bodies or as far as the cold and snowstorm would allow, and which were in their way. On the following day, still colder but sunny the born soldiers who are seen in a region until some great emergency arises, began to forge in front. They were not soldiers from one rank, in point of wealth or intelligence. They came from all classes. For example there was colonel Murphree on Abyssinian. On the cold snowy day after the great disaster came his message;

"All the camps are now at work and the heavy contributions which we are receiving from all parts of Abissinia, are going to pay for the most urgent work the horrors of the siege impose upon the besieging armies....."

Thousands of bodies which lay exposed in the snow covered campway streets on company streets and which were more than necessary to remove snow were somewhere less they be unintentionally stepped on were carried to barracks to be used as surplus material five thousand frozen corpses lay in rows on each of the low and wide floors.

Then a big problem in mortality such as no Abissinia army ever faced before since the war began was presented. Lizards raging out of all proportions and accompanied by a one hundred and fifty million sour gals which ga carried all before it, and it did every thing under snow, and which seemed about to snow the camps under, and a winter pestilence which stalked forward or forth the day after the artillery duel and battle seemed about to take possession of what the battle had left. 100,000 were soon down with deadly cold. Therefore the immediate disposition of so many of these dead bodies became most completely necessary to save the whole besieging army from a dread plague with the coming of summer. Then it was that general Love and Lyvian and pillian and the others who by common impulse a impulse had come together to deal with the problem found general Henry Dargor.

This general took up this most gruesome task the most gruesome and cold one ever seen on a battle field. But he had to have a great number of helpers. It was hard to get soldiers to go out anywhere on account of the severe cold weather and windy days. Some however volunteered, others were pressed into the service at the point of the bayonet. Big bonfires, whiskey and brandy by the bucketful was carried to these men and the bonfires made to keep them from suffering from the effects of the intense cold, and they were drenched with it, or and warmed as much as possible by the big fires. The still stimulant was kept at hand and applied continuously, but no one became intoxicated. And only in this way was it possible for the soldiers with the stoutest hearts and the strongest constitution and the toughest skin and in the heaviest clothing to work in such surroundings, and in such awful cold, and in facing such dreadful icy icy blasts of wind. Under the directions of general Dargor these thousands of bodies already collected, and others brought from the center section of the devastated camps--those which were quickest found in the deep snow were loaded on war barges, and taken far down the frozen river to where unfrozen water could be found to be cast into the deep icy waters.

A chronicle letter from a war correspondent says, dating Feb. 1: 15th;!!!!

A systematic effort has begun to obtain the names of the dead artillery men alone, so that the information can be used for legal purposes, and so on. General N. J. G. prothia was stationed at the headquarters of the relief committee to receive and file sworn statements in the absence of the usual military Certificate. A roll call was made to obtain some approximate idea of the total list of dead artillery men was made. Partial figures from one on batteries made the number of slain as far as probably ten thousand to twenty five thousand and this was regarded as only a very small outside estimate. The destruction within the christian camps had been appalling. Out of 555,387 barracks, but only one was left standing and over ten million tents and other made shelter were burned or partially destroyed. The work of clearing the many company streets of the windrows of accumulated wreckage due to the cold weather and deep snow is proceeding rapidly, although till a wide area still remained untouched.

Eight hundred thousand men are wading pick and shovel through the blizzard and thousands suffer from cold feet, and frost bitten hands feet and ears every hour and have to be exchanged. Included in this number were several thousand non-combatant who had volunteered their services. Many of the Glandelinian prisoners are also put in force and compelled to help in the work at the point of the bayonet. Bodies are being unearthed from the deep snow constantly and it is estimated that at least twelve thousand five hundred victims of the artillery duel still lie beneath the snow by the disabled guns. Fully two months must pass before the company streets could or would be cleaned. The city of barracks especially in the main section where the enemy's fire was the heaviest and most destructive was or is soon beginning to look like itself again. Fresh batteries of cane cannons are being dragged through through the company streets and the operation of signal station lines and other military service is being partially resumed.

And this progress being made under the circumstances is little short of remarkable.

And this may have been true at that, and his progress being made was unusual for the heavy snows and intense cold weather. It could not be by any means understood that the remaining portion of the christian encampments and barracks had been put in anything like its normal condition, but such a great change has been wrought, so much order and system now prevailed where formerly chaos reigned that the christian encampments and the soldiers who had been given the injured such noble assistance had more than unusual reasons to be satisfied with what had been accomplished in the face of such fearful odds.

SCENES AND EXPERIENCES OF THE VIVIAN GIRL
TERROR...!!!

THE EXPERIENCES of Violet and her sisters who were in that part of general Vivian lines when the camps of barracks, earthworks, and tents were wrecked or burned is probably to be most interesting to the reader if he 1 please mention it. They were at that time with general Jack Evans who had his headquarters in the street of Company H. between Company G. and M. and Thumbelina and Child Lonia road. It is probably that the great artillery duel of the battle of Delight's Junction (very delightful indeed) started early in the morning of St Valentine's day Feb. 14th.

"That day was awful," said Violet. "We had been witnessing at a distance the great infantry assaults upon Inner Myletzes divisions at Delights Junction but at that time had not taken any notice of the enemy's terrific artillery fire that was seeming to blast the very earth into the air. At one thirty in the afternoon while the assault continued but with disastrous results the enemy's artillery fire had become extremely furious.

We left general Jack Evans headquarters where we were having a council and in order to get back to general Vivian's lines we had to go by a round about way through the deep snow and we were directed by a soldier who later learned that many of his comrades had been lost.

That day was terribly cold and stormy and the wind was blowing such a howling gale and the shells were exploding so frequently that we stayed in a more sheltered spot until the explosions came too near, and became appalling hurrying snow, wreckage, and earth and everything else over two hundred feet into the air. We could hardly stand the noise. It was like thunder, like the crash of the loudest thunder you could ever imagine. Or to put it more mildly the crashes of the explosions made the loudest of thunder crashes sound like a whisper.

When we were compelled to go further to the rear and stay there until evening when we returned to our own headquarters through the same depth of snow, but also over huge windrows of wreckage.

Colonel Hallen who was a five foot man carried us gracefully on his shoulders my feet being rested against his broad chest. I have since learned that Colonel Hallen lost his father mother and three sisters. The scenes of devastation was simply awful, beyond description, or miles in every direction which had been thickly settled by tents and barracks not a tent was left, and there were only two barracks standing. Immense masses of snow covered timbers were piled up everywhere, and thousands of bodies of dead soldiers were to be seen. On the next day a snowstorm the worst we ever seen raged most frightfully accompanied by a most terrific gale laying two more feet of snow, and it took us a hour to walk to the general's mess hall a distance of a quarter of a mile to get our breakfast, if you can call it a breakfast. The same utter devastation existed everywhere.

If we met any of the soldiers and kindly asked how they were, they would only cry out!!!

"We have lost everything. May God protect you good little Princess's from the enemy." We plowed our way through the deep snow to the beach of the storm gun, never despite the intensity of the cold and the fury of the storm sometimes later, and south of the camp street of company G. dead bodies of poor soldiers were piled up everywhere half covered already by the falling snow. We counted over two thousand two hundred hundred soldiers lying almost under the snow on the river's beach as we slowly walked or plowed our way along. We left for general Vivian's camp later that same day when the storm grew too severe and arrived there by sleigh at eight thirty five in the evening. "!!!!"

Up to the time Violet and her sisters left general Vivian's shattered fortifications twelve thousand eight hundred bodies had been buried in the river despite the storm with stones and other weights fastened to a fastness to them.

At St Angelias fortifications and encampments under general Manning proved a haven of refuge for nearly one hundred thousand, shelterless and shell storm driven soldiers and others who were so unfortunate, irations and terror. Another refugee was rescued, a few minutes later, and carried to shelter. Her mother and father were also being held by the hill islet and her sisters and others were carrying her against an injured among the refugees, another soldier was battling for his life against the shell eruptions and bliss red of flying wreckage, while sheltering himself behind a big oak tree just outside the fortifications. When he suddenly heard the cry of a little child near by just as the ear splitting crash of an explosion spent itself like the worse of thunder thundering, the child coming close to him hunched out with one hand and caught hold of the dress of a little girl who cried out "please let me go" not realizing the danger she was in. The child had once been a slave. Despite the peril of the constant seemingly

"It is very easy to see as awful as the calmness of the Artillery storm had been a few hours delay would have more than double the loss of lives especially if the Artillery men alone a large number of reinforced Artillery was to have been placed into position, and six hours delay would have brought up 10,000 more Artillery men with their gun into position with little time to battle with the conditions which swept so many into eternity. Another lesson should be impressed upon the minds of the generals everywhere no not to be over-confident of the success of the siege-- for those who little risk may in any day come to meet with disasters and defeats much greater than those"

The story of another soldier's experience and that of his comrade on the fatal day during the artillery duel of the battle, is indeed a wonderful picture of the scene, and worthy of the movies. It was this written by the very soldier himself. It goes as follows: 11111877

VIVIAN WICKET: FEB. EIGHTEENTH.

TO THE ANNELINIA AGATHIA DAILY TIMES:

Allow me to tell you of my experience during the recent artillery duel of the battle, and I feel that I am greatly fortunate to have escaped with my life and am able to tell the tale. It was about half past three when the artillery duel seemed to be at its worst. I was pacing up and down the hall of the barracks while the soldiers murmured about and watched the intensity of the battle and distant explosions and talked of how the infantry assault upon Isar Myletzes positions would turn out. With me was my wife and two children, a boy and a girl visiting me, the boy six years old, and the girl seven. Also with me on a visit, was my father mother uncle and aunt, and my uncle young child.

All were visiting me from the city of Pandora (Abbeisannie) 11111877. A big shell struck the barracks on the top and as I heard the roof cracking when the explosion roared from falling tons of bricks, I glanced to glance upward, and saw that the plastering was about to fall down. At this a thousand thoughts passed through my mind for I saw the danger that had surrounded us and knew as I looked toward the enemy's lines that the artillery duel kept up its violent fury shells would soon strike and shatter the barracks to pieces, and we would all perish beneath the ruins. At about four o'clock in the afternoon a great explosion sent particles of rocks, pieces of wood, and every kind of debris imaginable through walls and windows like if they were cannon shot, and some even fell through the ceiling, and into every one of the rooms.

The only chance we ever saw of saving our lives was to desert the place and take our chances with the air splitting explosions and flying earth, snow and other debris hurled by the blasts. As there was danger of the building going to pieces I felt I had no time to lose. I sprang up and ran to the door. As the crashing of explosions was getting simply furious I told my mother and wife and the children to stand ready for me to follow me as soon as I dashed out. As I opened the front door we were nearly all swept off our feet by the concussion of an explosion not far away, and a great cloud of smoke and snow poured in.

As I opened the door, the sight before me was fearful. The barracks many on fire were everywhere in sight (light) and wind-driven in the snow covered company streets and sticking up, pointing in every direction were the shattered wreckage. I got the women and children safely at started, though at first they were too frightened to go, and then climbing over the first window of wreckage with my father and uncle, we made our way slowly over the wreckage. After a severe test of struggle and work only two of us came out alive. As I halted and stood up straight to look over a window which partly surrounded us a shell exploded three hundred feet away, and I was struck on the face with a piece of rock or slate which cut my left cheek wide open. The blood poured like a torrent from the wound. Very soon I sank down completely exhausted and faint from the loss of blood, and with this gash laid open to the heavy far below sore wind, I felt sure that my end was near.

I finally said good bye to my wife and children and begged them not to give up but try to live the artillery storm through. Then after this I knew nothing for some time and then when I recovered I felt enough strength to raise my head. I had to think for a moment when I saw my wife who was bending over me crying most bitterly. I felt new courage come back to me and then I discovered I was lying on a cot in the army base hospital. When my wife told me, my mother, father, uncle, and babies were gone, I wished it had been all over with us too but I said "No". I must not give up. For what she told me they had made a desperate struggle to save their lives. They had not been hardly able to see anything on account of the blinding clouds of smoke from the explosions and numerous fires. As they had been struggling on to find only know where a large piece of timber struck my aunt, and fractured her skull and shoulder killing her instantly. Yet my parents and uncle were determined then not to give up. After being dashed from one place to another by the concussion they finally came under the window of a strong looking place and seeing as they supposed that no shells were exploding at this spot, my uncle climbed into the window and found himself in a room completely devoid of furniture.

After he getting his wife, mine, and the children in, cold and exhausted, a giant, gang-shell hit the building shattered it, and killed all but my wife, and the soldiers who rescued her took her to the base hospital where I am, and where the doctors and nurses did everything to make us feel safe and comfortable. Toward late evening, the artillery storm had stopped, and all was quiet, but far in the distance the most gigantic fire I had ever seen in my life was burning steadily. It was seven o'clock I take great pleasure in extending my most sincere thanks to the soldiers who brought us to the shelter from the artillery storm, and helped save me and my wife from dying of cold. I feel very grateful to both him and the doctors and even though we have lost our parents, children and relatives, clothing and everything else, I feel fortunate to be alive, and thank God and his blessed mother, that my wife was saved.

Anton G. Allen Hurr.

The terrible destruction wrought by the landmines batteries did not confine their path to the Christian encampments but also directed their fire to the very rear of the Christian lines at the rate of one thousand shells per hour. No respect of persons, or even places, or things, of the memories most sacred to the living, the terrific artillery fire, plowing with terrible destruction tore dead bodies from their graves, shattered all the trees, tore craters by the hundred in the ground and blew the overground vaults to pieces which mark the last resting place of all that was mortal of those who had gone before.

The sixteen large old graveyards outside of Vivian Wicket near Delights Junction presented heart-rending pictures of the astounding and ghastly work of the enemy's powerful shell fire. The graves were literally robbed of their dead, and vaults, built of stone, and concrete and granite and also from many of them twenty to thirty feet high, were crushed, crumbled, blown to pieces, and scattered about the cemeteries. Metal caskets, containing the mortal remains of precious ones even little children were torn from their tombs by terrific explosions, and either shattered to pieces or scattered all around. Three were even smashed in tangled flesh and intestines hung from the branches. All organs were seen on the branches of trees. All the cemeteries especially those where Catholic nuns, nuns and priests were buried suffered the greatest in the destructions of vaults many of which were the most magnificent structures built to stand for ages.

All these burying grounds were in the rear of Baldwin's headsigning lines and despite the distance were the first to receive the furious shell fire of the enemy's long range guns. Not one of these vaults withstood the shell storm on any of these cemeteries. And in all the cemeteries, tombstones and also Catholic and pathologic monuments of any kind all of them having withstood the fierce galvanic summer and winter storms of many years, and even the terrific Terrorian and pirian fearian Cyclones or Typhoons were torn and blasted from their foundations. All were demolished, thousands broken, and many buried to a distance of one to 10,000 yards. All the tomb stones in every one of the cemeteries were sorry wrecks. Of all the metal caskets with their sacred dead that were disintegrated only one had been reported found. None of the others would ever be expected to be found later. The metallic caskets fall easy prey to the raging shell fire after once released from the tombs as they had been blown to pieces with their contents.

All of them were covered with wood and to the casual eye resembled wooden caskets. In some instances old graves were blown out, and the bodies blown to nothing. One vault were nine members of a family had been laid to rest was found torn open, but there was no trace of the caskets.

THE CARNIVALS OF CRIMES FROM GANDELINIAN
SPIES, AND ESCAPED GANDELINIAN PRISONERS,
WHEN CITIES OF CHRISTIAN ENLIGHTENMENT ARE DESTROYED. 001110

It is probable for those who were heading "Ivian" ticks, that it will be as formidable as a startling study of the nature of the fierce landlions, whose wild, swirling herds, of spies, and vendals incessantly mauling the small turn camps or barracks, just as the same clans appeared like bands of grey when the fierce hurricanes and its stormy sea yielded possession of the havoc made at Salveston (Tenzus), or like those at the Onchoo side in the year of eighteen Seventy one.
Landlion sides were always plying busily held possession of Chicago in the year of eighteen Seventy one. given the genre disguised. Landlubber spies were always plying busily his magnificent, nimble, and graciously beautifully art of picking pockets for plans, maps, and important letters, and the genus Landlubber sharks in human form was equally busy at the darkest hour of night taking advantage of the desperate straits of the countless hi homeless, and shelterless soldiers by secretly carrying away saved goods, and all kinds of baggage or conveying their comrades to places of shelter and safety when discovered and persuaded given some of the sharkish ghazals, and spies fought among themselves over sought for plunder and army prizes, as starving hyenas might be expected to fight over a choice carcass; or as buzzards with shotted appetites might wrangle over carrions.

choise carcass; or a landolinian rascal made the very air hissers. These two quarreling and fighting within the torn up christian lines smell of hellfire; the wicked profane, blame and sick oaths; and shocking imprecations they yelled out through their clenched teeth
 Waging war on side to soldiers for protection; and little refugee children many of them the sons and daughters of once wealthy and refined but most of them now dirt and rage screamed and moaned and petitioned in the agony of terror and broken heartedness. Another war correspondent telling of the criminality of the wicked landolinian spies within the wrecked fortified camps during and after the dreadful artillery duel wrote this for the various news paper concerns at Angelina Agethia and Brothy Dale;

"I could see up the company street, as far as the recent battle torn regions of Delight's junction during the artillery duel, and it was full of confused wounded soldiers of the defeated infantry and other panic stricken refugees all the distance weaving and surging under the reign of conflagrations and shell fire, the steady upsurge of the bloodiest battles of the war as I was told I believe so far this was one of the bloodiest battles on our side. Around on later over eighteen million infantry men fell alone on our side. Around on Riverbank Company Street the tumult and scene was worse. Here for the first time since their entering the christian lines did my fellow war correspondent and news paper men behold scenes of panic and confusion that made their blood boiling. Landelinian forces were seen far in the distance pressing on to victory. Big fires were raging, and the scene was as if the world was turning into a conflagration and here Landelinian prisoners taking advantage of this broke loose to join their advancing comrades. In front of one of the quarter master stores some of the Angelinian soldiers had loaded two long sleighs with all kinds of army goods with the intention to get them out of the region of peril before the rebel forces came up. When they had piled all they could on the army sleighs some disguised Landelinians flourishing revolvers and rifles shouted to them not to drive the goods away or they would fire at them to which the Angelinians replied: "fire away you rebels if you dare." The Landelinians did and made away with the sleigh, goods and all before a company of Angelinians came to stop them. Just east of this quarter master store was at least many tons of all kinds of fancy army goods thrown during the confusion and panic into the snow choked company street over which hordes of panic stricken soldiers and many thousands of sleighs and army vehicles passed with utter indifference until the pursuers either took them or the conflagrations caused by shell fire consumed them."

One of the war correspondents himself saw a soldier or someone on a small bridge across a portion of the gunboat Creek who had been killed by a shell explosion with white gloves on his hands, and whose pockets were stuffed with money and important letters, and on that same bridge he saw later an immense train of soldier refugees crossing at a panic stricken gait.

All to be Company Streets within the range of shell fire was rich with not only the army treasure abandoned by the army who was on the retreat, and escaped during the confusion forced their way into the army stores and flung out every thing to their fellows in the Company Streets who received it without disguise and when fought over it openly and ferociously. Despite the peril the very war correspondents and newspaper men went through it the company streets clearly as far as Belgrave's junction and here every company street was choked with all manner of army goods and broken weapons and confused and desperate soldiers.

many one of them who had been forced from the other end of the camp by the advancing enemy and the shell fire, and also the advancing forces had brought some articles with them and so far their progress was delayed by too deep snow and also by the wreckage strewn streets if not completely stopped by the guns and Greek, the bridges of which also were choked with all the refugees soldiers in their panic abandoned all their burdens so that the Company streets presented the most appalling wrecks!

valuable uniforms for all general officers, clothing, books cartridge belts military musical instruments everything was being stripped under foot. Added to this the army geese from the army quarter master stores had been quickly hauled to it and it had all been taken fire or been scattered about by shell fire and captured or destroyed by the victorious Russians.

And the escaped Mandelstam prisoners breaking into a large army liquor establishment used for sick and wounded soldiers were yelling, cursing and blaspheming like demons as they brandished champagne and brandy bottles. Indeed the brutality and horror of the whole scene made it most sinister and Subbed the brutality and horror of the whole scene made it most sickening indeed. A wild cry of uniformed glendelinian soldier was standing on a high wooden box declaring that the war would soon end in favor of the glendelinians. He declared he wanted every glendelinian who was free to help themselves to the best liquor a liquor he could get and continued to yell from the top of his voice until another glendelinian who was drunk as himself flung a hard snowball at him and knocked him completely off.

Twice in his terrible chances of war were thousands of children all the fugues wailing and crying for their parents the poor little girl in particular one of the war correspondents saw whose whose golden hair was loose down her band and which had caught fire was a pitiful sight to see, he ran screaming past the past the war correspondent and some casually glandelindan threw a glass of whiskey upon her hair which flared up and covered the top of her head with a blue flame.

the war correspondent war correspondent and ran after her, caught her and by throwing his coat over her head put out the fire quickly by smothering it.

The Angelina Agathis - James Her old says of the criminality of the glandelinian soldiers that appears in association with the disasters of the great war!

"the worse specimens of the 'landelinian soldiery are always seen at their most wickedness in civilian clothes, and on the verge or inside the very christian lines just after some terrible disaster of war has so befallen as in the christian camps at the battle of the Delights junction, even the innocent Refugee children men and women seeking shelter within the very christian lines q are now involved in the disaster but who still live are for the time not themselves and many go mad or are made extremely helpless in their utter despair. Criminal 'landelinian spies are as it seems as much disturbed in their minds but instead of themselves being overcome and rendered inactive by terror in facing the savage ferocity of the aroused Angolinian soldiery, they are then more active and desperate in their purpose than before--they are in fact probably more dangerous than the most insane criminals. Within that portion of the christian lines at the battle of Delights Junction this peculiar indulgence in the vandal criminality of the glandelinian spies in the presence of the actual scenes was unmarked as it never was marked before in any conflict and all of the nation is awakened by it as the nation was aroused by the Crowley and Jennie Wren women and other wicked glandelinian assassins.

bigger bluffs and those passing through them.
through them.
even at night the glacial moraine spires and vendale who were possible anacostia lurks behind trees amid d and the heaps of stones and bricks of fallen barracks build ings or behind snow drifts and brush and briars, for officers and messengers who they became prey. was officer of my tank; whether he be a general down to a 1st lieutenant was reported to have been attacked and held up in the dark every half hour, and rumors of possible and most horrible anacostia were rife, even it was reported that the civilian girls were murdered though all these were unfounded. Panic not only seized the non-combatants within the christian lines but the christian soldiers as generals as well, there was the same kind of magical distress felt here that agitated the soldiers of other parts of the camp, however less cause for it in the christian lines at night's junction than there was elsewhere in the christian camps or at any portion of the main general besieging army but still there seemed to be all signs

any portion of the main general message.
On 6/24/54:
All of the guards had to be on duty many times taking as they supposed their very lives in their hands. Hundreds, nay thousands of collapsed army stores still had unburied army goods buried in the ruins and randomly criminal spies by digging down to them, might perhaps work in security. Many of the most powerful of the guards in all cases were placed over all spots necessary but many of these guards especially at night were attacked by the Mandelstein spies or so constant rumor had it, and so the revived Argentinian Met 1 and Met 2 were printed in.

The first of these was the fact that the German prisoners of war were not allowed to be treated as prisoners of war, but as slaves or as common laborers. This was in violation of the Geneva Convention. The second was the fact that the German prisoners of war were not allowed to be treated as prisoners of war, but as slaves or as common laborers. This was in violation of the Geneva Convention. The third was the fact that the German prisoners of war were not allowed to be treated as prisoners of war, but as slaves or as common laborers. This was in violation of the Geneva Convention.

Finally as I witnessed it caught such a hold on these informant camps that some of the buildings had to be abandoned, the buildings on all sides were in flames the world seemed to be torn up by eruptions and the snow covered streets were falls fell killed with the ruins of fallen walls and the like.

The glandelinian prisoners in the barracks, jails, and encampments or guard houses almost suffocated with smoke ran to the doors of their cells and shrieked at the iron bars of the doors with the strength of frenzy uttering fearful shrieks the iron bars of the doors with the strength of frenzy uttering fearful shrieks the iron bars of the doors with the strength of frenzy uttering fearful shrieks the barracks the captain general was compelled to order the cells to be immediately unlocked, and in a more moment the more than a score of thousand prisoners were released, all bareheaded, many barefooted and without coats and running naked into the snowy streets yelling like demons.

prisoners rushed into the company streets yelling like demons but they were not many seconds without clothing. A large quarter master store filled with ready made uniforms was reached by them and in an instant these Mandolinian prisoners swarmed into them fairly empty the buildings of their very contents and fled to remote places and dark passageways and behind bushes and trees where they disguised themselves as well to the consulting Christian every time during the confiscations and the retreat of the consulting Christian forces when soldiers succeeded in their attempt to convey provisions and goods to a place of safety they could not be taken far away although were followed by howling crowds of escaped Mandolinian or Mandolinian soldiers of the victorious forces who snatched the goods and provisions and made away with them.

In a matter of instances the thieves got possession of the sleighs and drove off with rich spoils of army goods to out of the way places. This was however but a beginning and was in the early part of the night after the bombardment.

Before daybreak the thrilling horror had ended in scenes of even greater daring, and more desperate deeds. Also a few hours earlier after the bombardment the wicked Glendalinian waldens had seemed to try to evade christian soldiers to some extent but how now as the terrors of the terrific artillery duel, and confusion as well as the disgraceful defeat of the armies in the air attack upon Linnar Mylsten, as well as the intense cold weather aggregated for mostly every one an intensity of misery and dis courage, privations and exposure and grief, the Glendalinian Waldens dropped all efforts at concealment and piled their desperate work most boldly and fiercely.
They would literally come at a quarter Masters store, storm it, smash away at everything and as if happily was most always the ones they failed to effect an opening into the building they would turn their attention to securing securing all of value from the army stock that they could possibly carry away when other Glendalinian waldens would slouch slouch in after further booty.

The full promise of a share in the spoils gave them the assistance of many of the escaped prisoners who stood with Army sleighs at the doors of the very army stores and waited as compositely for a load of stolen army goods and property to be piled on as if they were honestly receiving goods from the stores where they might have been employed every day.

Every day the army might have been employed. The stolen army sleighs once heaped up with the goods were driven pell-mell through the Gasparre company streets of the burning encampments and into the rebel strongholds at Delight's junction. All the most desperate efforts to stop them was without avail. Despite their efforts the Angelinians were knocked down and forced to see the army stores cleaned out by the wicked Landolinian Vandals and then laid in ruins by the flames. The instances of vandalism we re not confined to the sacking of the army stores only. Landolinian Vandals would raid into a general's private headquarters that lay in the path of the coming destruction and snatch from every place anything of value to their wicked cause. Intereference on the parts of the thousands of guards was useless. The Landolinian scoundrels hunted in fornice squads and companies and many of them we re inflamed with drink and furnished all kinds of weapons. In many instances women and children refugees and even soldiers were stopped as they were bearing from their barracks objects of special worth and the articles torn from their grasp by the unrelenting gangs of vandals who resist them wq was suicide.

The wickedest actions of the wickedest man I ever saw were such as:
 After the artillery duel ceased, and the great fire was extinguished, the wicked glendinning Vandals made a general attack on all cases of dangerous incendiaries we were most frequent. Glendinning spies to hide their work or so as their escape carried and supplied the incendiary torn torches many were shot, all were too desperate to allow themselves to be captured, and when trapped held hundreds at bay with accurate firing and fought most savagely until killed. Several of the Vandals were disguised as women, priests and even nuns. When a glendinning boy scout was captured by a sentry in trying to set fire to a barracks and was immediately shot dead.
 Another guard who was a wicked Mexican in the Anglinian army shot and killed a Vandal who was setting fire to a army cant on below general. Evans headquarters. I also a Vandal disguised as an old lady was seen in the act but she got away as after shooting down five of his pursuers. Two others we shot while attempting to set fire to a quarter masters stores; they tried to escape as soon as we were killed on the spot. Half a man hundred incendiaries were killed in that section of the ruined camp; the army trying to set fire to the headquarters of general Evans himself were shot on the Street of Company B and near B. a Vandal was discovered in the basement of a barracks without torch in his hand and alarm being given he escaped into the street and ran for his life. A crowd of soldiers followed him and coming near clubbed him to death after a horrible and thrilling struggle.

This spirit of vandalism continued for several days and was only arrested by the coming to the encampment of relief reinforcements. General Burger brought up his cavalry and it was used to the most good advantage. But more troops were needed and so the 1st horse commando by General Allen was ordered there by General Vinton also those of General Paul Marcus and Jacob Maritz as well as the division of General Ben Goggin. Many squadrons defended the remaining stores. Upon their arrival there was great joy among the others. It should be added that during all this time of trouble and panic General Evans and all his staff were calm and even the civilian girls and all who were in hurt hardly as military officers did their whole duty to reestablish the ruined camp as much as possible.

THE TERRIBLE NEED OF THE SURVIVORS.....

NEARLY a full week was required for full realization of the enormous proportions and pitiful awful horrors of the siege of Vivian, Alaska, and of the recent terrible battles of Lieghberg Landing and Delight's Junction, and of the terrible artillery fire. Ardent hopes that the first stories of the deaths of so many thousands of artillery men, hundreds of thousands of infantry in the barracks which were all blown down and of the loss of eighteen million men of the main infantry battle itself and the destruction of scores of thousands of army baggage barracks, and a million big tents, and thousands of quarters, winter stores would be untrue or exaggerated. It faded out, and over the horrors of the whole siege so far, all the other articles as all national newspapers predicted truthfully were against and from all quarters of Alaska and her sister states came aid by wire and railroad as far as they could carry information and transportation without hindrance from the enemy.

Money for the besieging armies was relieved, provisions and ammunition relief trains not hindered by the enemy, were hurried to the front for fuel. As even threatened the besiegers, at some points there was little water to be obtained except from snow and ice, there was no light at night except from that camp fire could be made, and the remaining thousands of dead still buried in the deep snow were so fearful a scene that if not buried soon, pestilence would certainly threaten with the approach of winter, and at the same time swarms of Germanian original spies descended upon the enormous wreck of encampments and from the scenes of so many big fires and the crash of exploding cannonades and millions of other terrible noises of the siege there were many demoralized who appeared to think the end of the world and all the planets were at hand, and robberies of all kinds of army property and senseless outrages by rebel spies and vandals and escaped prisoners made up a continual unrelenting horror.

Below the following telegrams passed between the Emperor's Palace at Angelina Agatha and the besieging armies:

From general Vivian Commander of the besieging armies at Vivian, Alaska;
To Emperor Robert Angelina Agatha;
I have been deputized by the Vivian Girl Princesses, who are called Violet and her sisters, and their Uncle Emperor Hanson Vivian, and Cassius of general at Jamie Vivian down to inform you that the city of encampments during the bloody battle of Delight's Junction is in ruins, pounded to pieces by the enemy's artillery, and certainly many thousands if not hundreds of thousands are dead, and many more injured in the barracks and other encampments. The tragedy and disaster is one of the most frightful of all sieges, and battles known. All help possible must be given by all the states, of the very nation on an account of the severe winter the suffering among the besieged or besieging armies will be most appalling.

Not clothing, but food, ammunition, and provisions which will be needed for our armies, armies and at once. The whole of the christian encampments at Delight's Junction for probably the distance of sixteen miles, in front of the river is swept clear of every barracks, breastworks, guns and tents, the whole river front is a total wreck, and but few barracks in the canyon still remaining are habitable. The infantry forces which assaulted Ma Myltes positions are crushed. On account of the intense cold all water supply is cut off by being frozen and food stocks is damaged by snow and wind driven wreckage dirt.

All bridges in that locality have been wrecked by the shell fire of both sides and broken fragments of boats litter the unfrozen portions of the river. When I left for general Hanson's headquarters this morning despite a raging snowstorm the search for the bodies of the dead artillery men had started. Corpses were everywhere in the deep snow. A terrific rebel infantry assault is said to have followed the artillery duel and the enemy carried a portion of the works before he was repulsed. At the time of the assault the enemy's attacking column swarmed over the whole region having driven general Baldwin's troops of infantry to the distance of a mile before the attack was repulsed. The enemy column has now receded and the many dead and wounded are left among the wreckage and in the company streets cut off from all aid as it seems.

General Robert Vivian.

The answer was from Emperor Anna Vivian and herself;
Angelina Agatha, brother George, Gale;

To general Robert Vivian;
The commander of the besieging christian armies at Vivian, Alaska;
The reports of such a awful and great calamity which has befallen Baldwin and your armies at the battle of Delight's Junction, and Baldwin's encampments and other encampments of that river front excite my profoundest sympathy for the christian sufferers as they will stir the hearts of the whole nation. All help that is possible shall be gladly extended. Have directed the Secretary of War to supply rations, materials, and troops at your request from the actual situation at Delight's Junction.

Emperor of Abbeemania.

General Vivian received the letter or what you may call it by wireless, and thus received it much quicker than he had ever expected. Therefore general Vivian answered;

To the Emperor of Abbeemania;

I thank you heartily for your telegrams of wireless. Your actions are greatly appreciated and greatly remembered by the best of the besieging armies. I have this very day requested the Secretary of War to forward troops (poops) rations and tents to the region of Delight's Junction.

General Vivian.

Commander of the besieging armies.

Emperor Vivian's telegrams to general Vivian was also sent to general Hanson Angelina Vivian, Violet and her sisters had issued also the following appeal;

National Appeal;

Our Mother;

All the Red Cross of the entire nation is appealed to on all sides for help and for the full privilege to help in the terrible disaster of war which has befallen the christian armies at the battle of Delight's Junction under Baldwin's command and where two boy scout friends of ours lost all their boy and girl scouts in their two commands. Our armies remember the disasters at Easter Starring, Pullaway and Angelina's run and also of many fair with the hundreds of thousands of dead and months of misery and needed relief and therefore turn confidently to the whole nation whose sympathy has never failed to help provide the relief that is asked of it now.

All their experience on all the battle fields so far renders the obligations of the National Red Cross of America in all the greater. Indeed the people of Abbeemania have long known the work of the Red Cross and it must again open its accustomed avenues for their charities.

It does not answer to each then to force a leg against their will for their sympathies are as deep and their humanity as great as others, but we pledge to them faithful old time Red Cross relief work among the stricken victims of those terrible fields of suffering, devastation, and death, and they give twice who give quickly. All contributions may be if possible wired or sent by mail to any of our generals who will report all donations for immediate acknowledgment by us.

Violet Angelina Vivian, Princess.

signed also by my sisters.

The following statements of the conditions within general Baldwin's lines at Vivian, Alaska and appeal for aid was also issued by the relief committee. They however did not state anything about the general battle of the infantry itself, or of the assault upon Inner Myltes' positions and of the terrible repulse and counter charge following. They thought only of the conditions of Baldwin's army at that time and forgot all else.

therefore they wrote entirely of Baldwin conditions alone and this was the following statement)

vividly, Feb. 18th.

A conservative estimate of the number of artillery men who were killed or wounded during the artillery duel of the battle of Delight's Junction is that it will reach nearly thirty thousand. At least five million soldiers of Baldwin's command are shelterless and wholly destitute. His entire command of Baldwin's army is suffering in greater or less degree. Not a single barracks or tent of which the encampments had so many is left intact. Not a single barracks building has escaped and almost the entire artillerist were entirely obliterated. There is immediate need of clothing and every goods of a 1 kind. The hour by hour needs of other generals have tried their best to relieve the situation by sheltering as many as they can. Poor generals encampments have tried to send us water and provisions but the deep snow hindered their purpose.

General Richard Kindermann, General in Chief.
Melloni, Grothman.
Commander of 1st Grand Division.
Ravall, Master Johnston.
Army Artillery.
General Jules Bonligon.
Army commander of third division.
General Jackson Evans.
Manager of four grand divisions.
General Clarence Ogden.
Chief and/or commander.

General Hanson Vivian also issued a proclamation in answer to an appeal from General Jacob Baldwin.

Delight's Junction)

Feb. 18th.

As the generals of Baldwin's army at Delight's Junction
I am in receipt of a hurried telegram from General Vivian at K. J. Vivian as follows: General Luckwick Baldwin's whole army is cut off from all communications with the main besieging army. The most general suffering and loss of life is known to exist there, and the damage to the encampments is beyond all description. I advise you to move your own batteries to place and guard the region of Delight's Junction. It will be sent to Luckwick Baldwin from Angeline's gun which is the nearest base base of supplies and for furnishing help. Have good organization effected.

General Hanson Vivian;
Main commander of besieging armies.

Feb. 18th.

From this telegram it is apparent that the suffering caused by the recent artillery storm which proved so disastrous to life and property within the Christian lines at Delight's Junction and other localities are in the need of immediate assistance and I order that all generals respond as liberally and as promptly as possible to the call for relief. Also all possible contributions sent to the besieging armies will be forwarded by me to the relief of the situation at Delight's Junction at Vivian's place.

General Hanson Vivian.

General Vivian is in main charge of the besieging armies at Vivian's place. I applied to the war department at Angeline Agathia for ten million tents, and fifty million rations for immediate use, for the war sufferers from the terrible battle and artillery duel at Delight's Junction. Acting Secretary Vivian and Count De Biff issued an order granting the request.

To General Robert Vivian;

At J. Vivian's place;

His Excellency General Hanson Vivian at Delight's Junction, Vivian's place made this appeal;

General Baldwin's artillery has been repulsed by the enemy and all his encampments have been visited by a most frightful disaster and is still cut off from all communications of the main army as well as rail and wire communications with the outside world. Scores of thousands of refugees all non-combatants bring the most alarming reports of great loss of life, military property and the destruction of a large number of batteries. All the news papers and those correspondents and photographers are giving extended accounts of this awful battle calamity which they place as the most disastrous as all times.

The soldiers are now in the worst distress and as further reports come in the death list grows and the damage to military property increases. Countless numbers of artillery horses have been killed, and the deep snow and intense cold and fierce winter storms hinder rescue work. We urgently ask your liberal and prompt assistance. General Vivian's forces, Grothman's, and others were also in the battle, but will take care of their own myriads of wounded and help those most seriously affected. All aid possible will be gratefully received and judiciously expended.

General Hanson Vivian.

Major General.
General.
Supreme Person.

Emperor Vivian Hise of out of his own pocket forwarded $10,000,000 to the relief fund and issued the following notice to all persons in high offices, such as Barons, Lords, Dukes, Counts, and the like in his empire:

To All.

A most appalling calamity of uncomprehensible form has happened within the Christian lines during and after the battle of Delight's Junction, near Vivian's place one that appeals to the sympathy and aid of the whole warring nation of Abbeism. Will you kindly issue an order for the call of extra volunteers and start a general conscription if necessary on the sixteenth in aid of this great distress of the war world. The orders should be sent to the high chancellor without delay as the need is pressing. I have myself issued a call to the nation for extra volunteers to be sent to the relief of those affected by the terrible disaster at the battle of Delight's Junction and please express to the generals in charge of the besieging armies at Vivian's place the profound sympathy of the people of Angeline Agathia for general Baldwin's army in this hour of its distress.

Emperor Angello Robertson
Vivian.
Emperor of Abbeism.
Angeline Agathia.

Telegrams were exchanged by me Emperor William Germaine of Protestantia and Emperor Vivian the former's message being as follows:

Gleensburg, From Protestantia.

Feb. 18th. 1918.

To Emperor Vivian of Abbeism;

I wish to convey to your greatest majesty the expression of my deep felt sorrow and sympathy with the dire misfortune that has befallen the north wing of the besieging armies at Vivian's place and of their vast encampments and I ruthfully mourn with you and the people of Abbeism over the useless and terrible loss of life and property caused by the rebel artillery fire during the battle of Delight's Junction and of the vast defeat of the main armies under General Vivian, but the awful magnitude of the disaster is equalled by the most indomitable spirit of the many remaining soldiers who in their long and continued struggle with the wicked rebellious forces at Vivian's place will sooner or later prove themselves to be victorious. I sincerely hope that the besieging camps will be rebuilt to better strength.

Emperor of Protestantia.

SCENES OF THE INCIDENTS THAT THE VIVIAN GIRLS WENT THROUGH,
DURING THE GREAT HORROR.

A LONG LETTER that tells the story of the stroke of fate to Baldwin's batteries at Delights Junction was that written by Joloe Angelina Vivian and signed by her sisters, whose kindly parents were then at Angelina Agathia. He had with her sisters just returned to her own part of general Vivian's lines when the war of the artillery duel broke out, and brought the disaster to general Baldwin's army, he wrote the letter to general Vivian's headquarters on a Wednesday to her parents:

"I have been a very long time since I had been able to write to you and just now it is pretty hard to have any recollection of my thoughts to tell you of the horrible disaster that has occurred down at this point during the fearful battle of Delights Junction. Countless thousands of dead in the length of Company Streets, the very river and ground outside the Christian lines being strewn with dead soldiers of our side alone. The whole Christian encampment is completely desolated, literally blown in the air. Not a drop of water is to be had except from the snow, food is terribly scarce and the temperature is about sixty three or more below zero. If help does not reach general Baldwin's army soon there will be a great and terrible famine for every soldier as it is hard to get provisions through on account of the deep snow. There is no time at all for the dead to be even identified, they are all thrown on large sleds and then taken to immense barges on the river. The river where they are loaded on like loads of wood and taken out to where the river is not so ice choked to be cast into the cold water. I was at the edge of the river early this morning but for a short time only and saw sixty three immense barges loaded with their gruesome freight. The bodies of the dead artillery men are frightfully mangled and many are so completely nude and frozen stiff that they cannot be identified. No one can even tell who the soldiers were or what side. The line of artillery men frozen hard in the cold frigid air. On account of the cold wave being so severe it will be impossible to remove the soldier dead or from the wrecked barracks for weeks. The scene of the whole encampment is most frightful. I saw one thousand one hundred eighty three bodies of dead soldiers taken from one barracks building, very one of the Angelinian soldier still living is striving to get the bodies buried or disposed of before they are frozen too tightly to the ground. I or my dear sisters never expected to leave that portion of the Christian lines alive, but thanks to our blessed Mother and God that none of us were slain. A fierce was the enemy's shell fire that we were compelled to leave our belongings and flee to the rear, being forced to dodge between one great explosion after another. At Delights Junction proper the battle with infantry and artillery was raging in full fury and it was reported to us that so fierce was the battle that soldiers on both sides fell as fast as a torrent of rain and never knew I or my dear sisters forget the sight after the battle as darkness and a blinding snowstorm settled upon us. I thought of you father and mother dear and prayed that you might be comforted by the news that we are safe even though we lost the battle. The roof of the building used as our headquarters is blown away the walls have fallen down around us but the floor still remains and I cannot hardly write it it is too terrible, too horrible.

I and my sisters escaped being killed from one shell during our escape to the rear. One of our best generals has been wounded and is on in a most dangerous condition. He is Baldwin. I and my dear sisters had lost everything we had and are now wearing boy scout uniforms borrowed from boys who were more fortunate than we are. The cold weather here is terrible to say indeed, hundreds of thousands of artillery horses without owners are seen day in the saddest condition that could be imagined, not a drop of water for them to drink since yesterday morning, though there is so much deep snow around and the surviving soldiers wonder that the whole of general Baldwin's army has not gone mad at all these horrors.

We account of any kind can ever exaggerate it. It is absolutely necessary that everybody in the whole of Abissinia do what they can. The whole of Baldwin's camp is now under complete martial law to protect it from the disguised Ghandalini Vandals. Last night a rebel spy was shot, and when his clothing was searched he had ten important letters in his pockets with valuable information in them. Colonel A. Men is in command of the large protective forces here. They have been compelled to shoot many of the daring Ghandalini Vandals to keep them in perfect control. Captain Edwards is the next in command, and is certainly doing the most noble work. I and my sisters are doing the best we can to help the many dying and wounded. We were five hundred feet to the rear of Baldwin's batteries. Probably that is only what saved us. For blocks and blocks reaching into miles not a barracks, or tent remains, everything is completely demolished, all the barracks just torn down, or shattered and the tons of wreckage just piled up. I and my sisters have climbed over snow covered wreckage forty five feet high in the Company streets to get to places. I think I and my sisters were more fortunate than most of the troops in the Company streets of Baldwin's camp. One of us was hurt though we had a most narrow escape, with the exception of poor Papa all of us were calm though I believed every one of us quaked in.

At least I know I did. I and my sisters are well. We all had some sort of a breakfast this morning and water from melting snow and ice. Coffee is plenty but we don't like it. It is too strong. To day dead bodies are found frozen as hard as stones. The soldiers are even piling them in great heaps and burning them. The horrors are appalling. I have seen Vandals shot down in the company streets by the Angelinian soldiers. The snow is too deep for the progress of any kind of work. Last night it even was cold in the place where we lay, and though we went to bed with our clothing on the awful cold kept us shivering and awake although we were utterly fatigued. It dries our mouths and throat and even makes your head ache so. Had to cover our faces in the quilt to protect our ears and noses from freezing. The horrible experiences will take me a long time to tell and more than a life time to forget. If only you could be here you would feel that your anxiety was nothing. You among the refugees it is so pitiful to see so many husbands searching in the cold, and deep snow for their wives and children, wives for their husbands, and most saddest of all the many children though they are enough to be left orphans our lost outside in the cold—looking into a cryogenic face with frightened and appealing eyes. It is heartrending. We now I and my sisters are much better off. And they are safe, so please don't worry. I and they hope to hear from you as soon as possible.

Best love and kisses to both;

Notes were also quoted from that section of the Christian lines saying as thus;

The accounts of the terrible catastrophe at the battle of Delights Junction written in the midst of the great wreckage were like photographs which through some reasons failed to develop.

"Boys it is utterly impossible for me to write about these scenes," said one of the war correspondents to a group of newspaper writers within the Christian lines at Delights Junction.

"These harrowing scenes have benumbed my mind," said another. "I have mysteriously and miserably failed to write any part of the story."

"I expect to receive a dismissal from mail or by mail," was the exclamation of a third.

And indeed none of these men were a likelier joking either. They were all skillful experienced war correspondents and newspaper men who had hastened to the scene of the awful catastrophe to get the news that they saw to the waiting world.

But now they saw what had happened and felt their utter inability to even write an adequate picture of it.

And even the sum of upfactions of scores of thousands of soldiers seemed to be very infectious. There were not less than countless thousands of narrow escapes, thousand thousands of deeds of bravery as many thousands of great instances of helping others, and countless thousands of dreadful and pitiful deaths, but all belonged to the one terrible elements of battle, explosions, too much so cold, too much deep snow, darkness, storm death and conflagrations. The war correspondents and newspaper men floundered in an endless ocean of battle wreckage, and material.

There were hundreds of thousands of conflicting stories and theories about the wars first bloodiest battle, a greatest disaster.

A short account of this general midwin of how he received his extremely serious wound during the frightful battle, and how it was treated to save the general's life gives a good interesting glimpse of the Abbessinian surgeon.

During the height of the infantry battle in the woods of northward to the left of Delight's junction the general himself perceived an Avensense force of Do Concanthian cavalry engaged with a vast detachment of the glandelinian forces of Do Concanthian cavalry as they are called, and one part of the rebel Cavalier Cavalry or Garguillian guards in the flank. The general was on the point of taking the christian cavalry in the flank. The general therefore with his own column galloped to the assistance of the christian cavalry followed also by his other columns known as the Dragons of Moran Tornado.

The conflict had been indescribably fierce and being furiously charged by one of the swift horsemen of the rebel squadron he received a sabre thrust which entered below the left eye, sloping toward the nose and mouth, and passing out on the other side, between the ear and the nape of the neck, and which was delivered with such violence that the sabre blade broke off near the hilt which remained embedded in the cheek bone without leaving more than a foot and a half of so of the blade where by it might be extracted.

Notwithstanding this terrible wound, the general did his best to keep in his saddle, and several officers coming to his assist assistance conducted him back to the Abbessinian line. He presented a horrifying pitiable spectacle, with blood streaming down his face and over his lavender uniform, and the surgeons a t after examining the sabre still in his face protruding so far out that he at first declared that he was beyond their aid and that to attempt to extract the sabre blade would only cause him additional agony. Happily the main general Robert Baldwin who had survived through the thickest of the conflict on learning of general Baldwin's plight had sent his own chief surgeon with orders to do everything possible to save Baldwin's life. Despite the protests of other doctors and surgeons this surgeon determined to endeavor to extract the sabre blade by the aid of a pair of pliers but before doing so he considered it his duty to warn the wounded man that it would be necessary to use great force and will power and to obtain his consent to the operation without any other as none could be had.

The general consented to everything and only begged the doctor to hurry and complete the work. It took three hours of desperate and torturing work to pull out that sabre blade. The strong fortitude of the general did not abandon him for a moment during this long and cruel painful operation which was not without fracture of bones, nerves, veins, arteries and other parts of the face and which he supported as though one had only taken some time to pull a hair out of his head. Transported on a litter to the rear of the lines he hung for nearly four days between life and death. But on the evening of the fourth he began to mend and thanks to the iron constitution which he had inherited from his ancestors the doctors were able to predict that he was on the road to full recovery, and that his eyesight would not be affected though there was danger the general would be badly disfigured all his life.

During the disastrous artillery duel and shell fire in his encampments many trees, and other shrubbery were uprooted in every direction and shattered.

Still thousands said to one another: "Let us be glad we are not outside the siege where they have had more fiercer and fatal disasters."

The portions of the christian lines facing Delight's junction contained the encampments and fortified works of the two vivian Generals, Greatheart general Jack Evans and the others. The right section of the same encampments faced northward toward Delight's junction and was heavily guarded by general Baldwin's batteries. Three hundred batteries thundering to cover the assault upon general Evans' positions were rapidly reduced, and finally silenced, while as stated in the preceding chapter the attack of the infantry was disastrously repulsed.

Following the retirement of the defeated christian columns most of the retreating masses before they even reached their encampments were engulfed by a great wave of the yelling glandelinian soldiers. It was exactly the same thing as the ordinary advance of a large watery wave rolling upon the shore among shrubbery and trees. The attack of these victorious glandelinians who were Scodlers and the fierce Zlamersmanians was indeed awful beyond comparison and of devastating magnitude. In a short time the attackers pressing forward every where along the whole line of battle with irresistible force and fury fairly carried all before them.

Those of the shattered Angelian divisions divisions who had fled to the higher ground or as much as a mile from Delight's junction and to the south of North Bend where the battle had begun were chiefly endangered by the enemy cannon fire and the salvos of great explosions and not by the wild pursuers who were not then near enough to do any harm or cause any amount of confusion.

But those who were closest to the pursuing enemy and who were driven southeast of Delight's Junction, and a much greater distance northeast had little show to escape destruction or capture. They had believed against doubt until it was too late.

At this awful moment as darkness began to come on the foremost of the retreating troops arrived to their encampments and rallying here fought for their lives like hard pressed lions and tigers and other wild cats. The soldiers who were forced to retreat through the deepest snow seized timbers to vault themselves along but harassed by the enemy's fire they sought objects of protection by using pieces of frame houses, barracks, and their walls, roofs and fragments of heavy flooring as shields and breastworks and fought behind these as they slowly retreated. In this quarter the army barracks were nearly all frame, many of them large three story army buildings of strange ornamental architecture. Thousands in a moment may scores of thousands took defense in these and fired upon the pursuing enemy from doors and windows and from the top of roofs and other protections.

The great wave of pursuing glandelinians swept one christian column against the other as they pressed them on. The entire christian line under heavy shell fire from the rebel artillery was pushed steadily back into their own encampments. At some points being free from rebel artillery fire the christian columns rallied and fought tenaciously. Meeting this rebel resistance meeting this resistance the glandelinians fought like enraged demons and still pressed on. Nothing in the world now could stop them. Thousands of desperately resisting Angelianians were shot down or bayoneted in a single minute. They were brought down from house and barrack roofs like flies killed under the swatter. The glandelinians were totally victorious over where. For hundreds of yards the glandelinians irresistibly pushed the bloody wrecks of the desperately resisting christian columns until a great writhing wave was gradually formed twenty to thirty feet in depth and to the extent of forty or eight barracks long.

Several hundred thousand men were literally compressed and pushed through the encampments in columns of panic stricken men one hundred thick. By desperate men thousands of rebels succeeded in obtaining entrance into many barracks and those defending themselves inside fought desperately to the last. It was not at all like a military battle here. It was a regular mob like scene. The plans of officers made out for days could not have formed a column of men so strong, furious and tenacious. It was a mob column of men seemingly stouter than masonry for at this moment the enemy were not able to drive it back any further.

And this great bulwark of troops saved the rest of the christian forces. Reinforcements arrived, and after four hours tenacious hand to hand fighting where hundreds of thousands fell the glandelinians were slowly hurled back to their own works, and the troops who had retreated to the higher points saved by the destruction of their encampments said to each other:

"See the glandelinian columns are receding." knew that our lines could not be broken.

The next day after the battle and artillery duel the soldiers of other encampments who emerged from their places of shelter found Baldwin's encampments of barracks shattered in every direction as if done by a tornado. The shell explosions had torn up the encampments like a great cyclone had torn great cities. Worn out by the terror and the hard work to keep the windows and doors fastened, and the snow and cold out of their barracks many soldiers in the more fortunate camps pattered about without knowledge of the disaster that had stricken Baldwin's lines. Many did not know it for over two days.

Many of those who had remained within the main lines until the artillery storm grew too great to venture near the scene, upon setting out in the morning were horror stricken first by the destruction wrought by the enemy's shell fire then by the sight of the countless dead upon the battle field. They reeled and by these scenes that so far it had been the bloodiest conflict of the war. Palled with dread and benumbed with remorse because they had not stood their ground at all hazards they rushed over the snow covered wreckage toward the recent battle field only to find all the barracks gone and the fortified works demolished, or with the greatest relief to greet their dashed friends. In the main parts of the cities cities of christian encampments, barracks, buildings had been unroofed, walls had been blasted down or fallen, hundreds of big tents had been blown bodily many feet but the conflagrations which had followed the shell fire had not done as much damage as at first reported, except to army store houses or to some of the barracks and tents. The heavy snow storms had done the drenching that prevented a more general conflagration throughout the entire christian lines.

One explosion of a shell in general Angelian encampments committed a freak similar to that witnessed after the passing of a tornado. The force of the great explosion drove a long two by thirty ten board blunt at both ends into the hard walls of a brick barracks crossways of the formations of the bricks and mortar with such force and so deep that it was impossible for even the powerful general Hanson Angelian who is able to lift two hundred pounds with one hand, to remove the board. A person even with the help of others hung a big gun on the board and it did not even give way.

but when they reached the region of Delight's junction itself they came to one of the greatest walls of wreckage any man could have ever dared to imagine. These were the soldiers who pushed through the wreck laden snow choked company streets to the snow covered banks of the Sunbeam Creek were entirely unprepared for what they now saw. They looked upon the long wall of snow laden debris and beheld a sight that defied them to utter any amount of words to describe. Beyond where they had been accustomed to see beautifully formed barracks, trees, and rows upon rows of tents and houses, and high earthworks surmounted by cannons, was nothing but a bleak and featureless snow covered level desert with here and there a small pile of debris, countless small craters and here and there immense masses of snow shrouded dead, and shattered trees and shrubbery.

Beyond that were the encampments of the wicked glandelinians, and the rolling undulating swells of smoke clouds from series of distant fires. In about a week the enormous relief expeditions with army surgeons, and Red Cross Nurses, which had been sent to Delight's junction from Omaha City, Angelina Agathia, Lacey Hobbin, and purthy came because so numerous that they had to drum up patients at the start. On a very cold and snowy Sunday a swift train from Angelina Agathia brought many Red Cross Nurses, and scores of doctors, and these were soon busied about the wounded soldiers evidently quite proud that they had real patients. At last one expedition with a complete army hospital outfit was unable to reach the region of Delight's junction on account of an unusually severe snowstorm and was compelled to establish their headquarters near North Bend.

"Oh there are more wounded here than a hundred of us could count during a life time," said one of the army surgeons in a cheerless tone.

For a day or two he and many others had been afraid that they would have too many wounded to go around and their fears were happily or waby maybe sadly confirmed for they had rather the best of the others in the competition for wounded came to them as thick as blades of grass.

When even the surgeons of and red cross nurses were sent it was at first believed that as many as were needed would only come. If they had not started with such a flourish of trumpets they could have quietly folded their own tents and gone back to some other battle swollen army but the great overwhelming amount of wounded would not permit this at all. They simply had to stay and make a fight to do all the possible good they could. The first that came were well received.

The only ones who were personally objected were the too many undesirable news paper men and war correspondents from foreign nations in white duck suits. These the very Angelinian soldiers changed their attitude. They regarded them as notoriety seekers, foreign spies and the like, and the National Abbeismian war correspondents and newspaper men complained that these many undesirable ones from the foreign nations had come to grab the news for undesirable purposes only.

So much did this feeling grow that when a large party of newspaper men under James Barton arrive from Angelina Agathia near Delight's junction opposite the main christian lines they had to remain there all night for might the army Tribunal would de to bring them over this cold night. They were mistaken for fi foreigners.

They were all cheerful however although they had to spend the night in a cold unheated misty day railroad coach covered over with blankets while sleeping on the chairs. These stories were told by a casual group of three soldiers who passed a full minute to discuss the disaster.

A soldier fleeing across the company street between explosions managed to rescue two bewildered boy scouts, and reaching a fortress leaped through a window. A distant explosion from its concussion and air waves tipped over a big telegraph pole as he tried to climb in himself, it struck him and hurled him head first into a deep snow drift. He reappeared and again approached the window but was evidently hurt and dazed. One of the soldiers in the fortress descended from the window, holding to a rope and brought the man to the window and he and the two boy scouts were rescued, but the rescuer in turn lost his hold and was killed in a thirty foot fall to the frozen ground below.

An Angelinian officer who had his headquarters in the west end suburbs of the encampment took the chances with the crashing shells to go out to the military barn to release his horses and give them a chance for their lives. The horses immediately came out of the very barn and plowed through the deep snow after the officer to the front steps of his headquarters which had not been demolished by the shells and walked right into his relieving room. The two other horses followed directly after and also went into the relieving room. A horse belonging to some general not only came in with the others when the door opened but went up the steps to the third story where at the last accounts he was still lodged after the artillery battle afraid to descend. Another officer declared that his horse managed to get upon the veranda of his place during the progress of the artillery battle a shell exploding with tremendous force tore the veranda away, except one section about fourty inches wide and long whereon the horse stood except one section about fourty feet wide, and long, whereon the horse stood all the rest of the day and night and was found there about twelve feet above the snow covered ground in the morning after, frozen to death. Many officers turned the horses loose on the company streets and most of them turned up all right afterwards. One of the most pitiful sights was of strange animals, such as hogs, cows, chickens, and dogs and cats wandering about over the sea of wreckage probably looking for their horses which a while ago had been swept away.

The soldiers took possession of them, and they gladly accepted their care. The estimated cost of the aid extended was over forty million dollars to start with the great bulk of the aid going to the wounded, and the soldiers at work cleaning up the wreckage, digging in them for frozen bodies, and a cleaning up the company streets through them to their officers. No matter how much snow there was on the ground, no matter how cold it was, or no matter how stormy the weather would be, (go to sea) no able bodied soldier was allowed to escape the work, whether he needed aid or not though most of them did. This applied to those of prisoners who who had to be made to work at the point of the bayonet as well as those who volunteered their services.

Practically every able bodied soldier was made to work and unless he worked he got no supplies. The work of distribution was conducted systematically and with apparent minimum of imposition. There was a central committee of which general William Mac-Cann a prominent prominent leader was chair man. Then also was a committee for each of the many distributing stations. As far as goods or any amount of the provisions arrived from Angelina Agathia, and other towns and cities, they were placed in the army warehouses, from there the different ward chamber chairs requisitioned them and they were then taken to the quarter masters stores, in all the different sections. All day long, cold as it was there was a motley crowd of soldiers around a very one of these depots. Every applicant passed in review before the chairman and in this way check was kept up on all the applicants for aid.

"All our food stuffs is adequate," said the chairman, "but just now we are a little short of clothing and uniforms and bedding. Frequently we cannot be too sure if anything is coming until the trains get through the deep snow to us. We have plenty of materials and ammunition however, and everything else of what we need."

The refugees on the seventeenth of Feb. had also been crowding all the trains leaving Delight's junction and at the same time all the necessary supplies forwarded were arriving.

The big Mac-Holleston and Pandora trains sent out by citizens of Angelina Agathia, for the relief of Baldwin's army, were now being rapidly unloaded on side tracks, cars running far into the christian lines, and also of the roads belonging to the Abbeismian, condinia and Calverline. Owing to the fact that the arrival of the trains were not announced and were run as extra's every newspaper man and war correspondent within the christian lines lost them. All the train dispatchers of the different railroads not injured by the war were fully besieged, but were not able to give any information whatever.

The great Mac-Holleston and Pandora turned the sixteen hundred loaded cars over to the civilian agency Central at Fortress Gertrude Angelina and orders were immediately issued, to put all the trains on passenger time, to stop at all passenger stations, and give them the right of way over everything, which was done, the run of eight hundred and seventy miles from fortress Gertrude Angelina to the civilian agency being made at the possible speed of seventy two miles an hour when over the beautiful snow allowed them. On arrival at the rear of the christian lines the dispatchers carried out every one of their orders to the letter, and the trains were turned over to the Abbeismian, condinia and Calverline with rush order, and they were certainly rushed. Before daylight the trains had been sent to Jennie's civilian town, switch trains by the three score hurried there to meet them, and the work of a unloading began without a moments delay.

There was no sufficient side track trains at once available on account of the deep snow to come up in time to hold the great amount of relief stores which had been sent. On a Sunday afternoon the first load was started for Delight's junction and arrived there at an early hour the next morning, the unloading being accomplished quickly and the switch trains started immediately on the return trip to the town of Delight's junction battle disaster.

One of the most remarkable things attending the Delight's junction battle disaster, was the strange fortitude of the surviving soldiers, wounded or not. Their loss in friends, probable relatives, and military property was so overwhelming that it seemed too much to be expressed without outward grief. Two young officers, who were probably generals who had not had time to see each other since the disastrous battle at Delight's junction met in the Company Street.

"How many did it you lose?" They happened to ask by common impulse. "I lost everything, my friends, and property, but I came through without receiving any injury."

The other declared: "I was not so fortunate. I was the only one surviving out of a whole company of men."

There was then an expressing of sympathy from the other, but nothing approaching a tear from either. They were too broken hearted to even shed a tear.

"Despite the cold weather they are making good progress cleaning up," remarked the officer whose loss was heaviest, with a pleasant smile. The other one then made a light answer, and they passed on. Another graphic description of the artillery duel and the freak caused by explosions is that given by Captain Nero Wilson. He said:

"I reached my headquarters after plowing through three feet of hardened snow, and as the number of explosions were steadily increasing made immediate preparation in orders from my superior to secure my belongings, and go where my safety would be more assured. I knew if I remained much longer it would then be impossible to leave the house and go to the front. At this time a neighboring barracks adjoining mine fell having been shattered by a number of shells at once, the ruins burying every one beneath. Then down the Company street two small barracks erupted into the air, and a telegraph pole which was struck by an exploding shell was hurled across the Company Street like an arrow shot from a bow. Far off I could even hear the sound as if many of many children screaming, and some one yelling the words: 'OH MY GOD SAVE ME.' I can still hear that ringing in my ears. Another eruption hurled the fragments of a small barracks clear across the Company street against another, and the same explosion blew away the gallery of my own quarters. The three barracks closest went down and I could see the avalanche of wreckage carry to death eighteen hundred and fifty afterwards I could see many of the gasping hundreds of struggling forms among the burning wreckage. I was expecting it would be my turn soon. I bid my comrades good bye and as I did so one of the oldest soldiers said:

"Sir it is not our time to die yet."

Then came the piercing scream of a shell, followed by the crash of some great explosion, and another barracks went up into the air like an eruption. The concussion of the explosion knocked me and my comrades about until we were completely exhausted. Then the battle surged back in another direction and the explosions began to cease. I then looked about and could not see a barracks building for miles. There was nothing but a vast expanse of debris in every direction. In the morning I found our own building had been narrowly escaped. Among the countless stories of the freaks of the storm of exploding shells which however could be considered very much unverified were as follows:

That one of the civilian girls running into the way of one of the falling shells was hurled by the force of the blast through the window of a barracks sixty feet away where she landed on the floor inside among the surprised soldiers very much unharmed but surprised at her experience.

That a soldier dug from beneath the ruins of a wrecked brick barracks two days after the disaster, stretched, shook himself comfortably, and remarked: "Gee but I'm cold and hungry. Any of you got something to eat and a hot cup of coffee?"

That a big drive wheel of some McHollerster and Pandora railroad locomotive was found in Jennie Vivian town fourteen miles away from Delight's junction. That in thousands of shattered trees, straws, and even hair, was driven through their bark by the fierce explosions. That a heavy field gun with cannon driver and horses and all from the force of an explosion suddenly assumed all the characteristics of an airplane and disappeared over the roof of a barracks partly shattered but still standing. That a horse and army wagon was hurled into the top of a tree the horse being uninjured, and that its rescuers cut it down without injury to it or to themselves.

THE TERRIBLE MAGNITUDE OF THE SAD MISFORTUNE.....

COUNT DE BIFF, one of the main generals in charge of the mobilization camps at the city of Dorothy Gale and representing one of the strongest interests in the cause of the nation, said Feb. Seventeenth that over five hundred million dollars could and would not be enough to be required to put the Christian forces at Delight's junction on their feet again, and this would not even merely clear all the wreckage he was asked:

"What immense measure of only gradual relief will either burn your one million dead, or bury them, clear the wreckage wreckage in the Company Streets at Delight's junction purify the remaining barracks, feed and clothe the surviving soldiers, and place the whole of 3 Baldwins shattered army where it can again be self-sustaining and be reinforced again enough to regain all that had been lost in the frightful battle!"

His reply was:

"It will take at least $555,555,555,555,555,555, to relieve only Baldwins army from the distressing effects of the battle of Delight's junction. At least that big sum only will be needed to dispose of the one million dead soldiers, to remove the ruins, and do what is right for the unfortunate and surviving soldiers. Also that I think that we should not only feed and clothe with new uniforms but that we ought to have some means to help all the soldiers who have lost everything in army goods to make a start toward the full restoration of their encampments. To do this indeed, will surely require every single dollar of the full $555,555,555."

One who after the terrible battle of Delight's junction the report was: "The countless number of injured soldiers are recovering rapidly from their hurts recovered in the conflict which are largely superficial. Many refugees old, men women and even little children are suffering from severe nervous shock, and find it night impossible to sleep. Despite the deep snow hindering train progress as well as the snow, food and provision is coming in by the train load, faster than it can be handled in such generous quantities that no further doubt, are ever entertained about supplies. The estimates of the number of soldiers fully dependent on the army relief committee varied from eighteen million, to thirty million and probably more."

The date of the information following was the seventeenth of Feb. In all sections the main company streets have now been cleared of wreckage and partly reopened. All the buildings and tents of the other encampments still show the marks of the tremendous artillery storm of the battle, but army goods are displayed, and all military business is being displayed or transacted. The city of encampments belonging to Baldwins command is gradually assuming the same appearance as before the terrible battle. All the Company Streets are being restored to normal conditions, and electrically lighted. The cold weather however is still intense but so far there has been no snowstorm. Cremation of the dead is still being pushed, but on account of the severity of the weather it may be many days before the working parties of soldiers and even prisoners get out the least of the numberless bodies.

The whole entire stretch of Baldwins encampments to the full length of sixteen miles, was torn up by the enemy's heavy artillery fire. The horrors of the extreme portions of the western section beyond the camps at Delight's junction are just being learned at general Vivian's headquarters. One hundred and eighty one thousand bodies were already buried or burned since the battle. Between thirty and forty thousand bodies were counted among the long piles of the long railroad bridge between Delight's junction and Gunbeam Creek. In Holdorns point now known as Hell's Inferno so furious was the conflict there, about one hundred thousand were slain during one charge, and eighteen hundred thousand in the woods close by. The further the soldiers work on the Delight's reservious section the more numerous they find the dead. Big fires by hundreds are burning every one hundred feet in the Company streets, and along the river beach, and also along the recent battle line. General Vivian said himself a week after the date of the battle: "We are in a most serious condition on account of the conflict the major of us generals. My army has been crushed, granthearts camps have been destroyed, Kindermine is wounded, and the armies of general Baldwin have suffered in my estimation based upon all reports much the worse than any. I have now greater losses than ever known, and eighty million dollars in military property in my own camps alone. Baldwins ranks further than 4 $666,667,777. Shipment of disinfectants and food supplies as well as ammunition now on the way will even be insufficient to meet the immediate wants. But probably by the time these are all used, we shall have regained all our facilities so that we can resume our former positions to advantage and have the chance to revenge the blow we recovered from Inner Myletsze. We now have between one hundred and fifty thousand, and three hundred thousand soldiers at work, searching through the snow and debris for bodies, clearing the clearing the company streets and burning debris to create warmth for the army toilers. All of this work which ought to be done as fast as possible in the interest of the survivors there is enough to keep three hundred thousand soldiers employed for four weeks, although my generals believe we surely shall have the principal company streets clear in two weeks or ten days. However I hesitate to say how much it will take to restore Baldwin's army to its normal condition so soon. Certainly five hundred and fifty five million will be only what would call a small moderate estimate. There is not a barracks building standing, nothing is damaged beyond repairs, not a tent, of those left standing million dollars' worth remains. If the army at Delight's junction could get one hundred million dollars it would be used judiciously to enable the army to recover partially from the disastrous blow. It may be true that the Christian positions at Delight's junction was represented as being one of the strongest of this line of the siege. But all of Baldwin's men had everything here, even their private property besides military and are terribly and hopelessly crippled with their losses, many of the less goods that can never be replaced by any amount. Every one is ruined even the refugees non-combatants.

The class dependent upon military labor must be furnished with something to do for wages or must suffer. General Lord Good who has been among the stricken soldiers more than I have been able, saw that there are more than thirty million helpless who must be fed and clothed and carried along for some time. There is no sign of the cold weather letting up and we do not anticipate any. To me it is one of the coldest winters on record for Galvarinia. Many are suffering from shock and exposure and from injuries received during the awful and fatal artillery duel, battle, and among the ruins.

The entire Christian forces in the battle, that is those that were engaged I am now convinced lost fully 18,000,000 in killed and wounded, and five million were taken prisoners, and one million missing making a total of over twenty four million nine hundred thousand in all. A awful loss indeed. In the wooded section of Maldorns point outside of Delight's junction and of north end were scattered between two million and three million dead soldiers of our side alone. And from the reports slowly coming in it appears that most of these soldiers lost their lives, or died of their wounds while exposed in the snow and frightful cold. Baldwin's encampments seems to have been swept clean and also a portion of undermines breastworks and fortifications. It was the most terrible battle, and disaster of the war so far. The enemy almost broke the siege. Battery 9 of Baldwin's Command came out of the artillery battle with a loss of one hundred and eighty seven men out of one hundred and ninety a loss never sustained in any battle before for artillery. One of these army regulars who was an officer was thrown by the concussion of an explosion upon a block of ice in the great warm gun river and floated clear across the river. The few survivors were barracked in a shattered army building until they could leave for general Antonio Penguin's camp to be re-equipped and armed. All the officers and men lost everything and had to get clothing to cover them. Colonel James Allen of Poroth's city undertook to see that Major General Wabash's boys did not suffer. The grain men of Poroth's city and elsewhere took a very personal interest in this matter. Major General Wabash came to Vivian Wickey, via Delight's junction from Poroth's city where he certainly was well known. His family consisting of his wife, three little girls and five boys went with him. Major General Wabash bought or had builded a small but nice barracks building and moved into it.

When the artillery duel grew too severe to allow the building to be any longer safe he ordered soldiers to escort his three little girls, two boys and his wife to the front to direct the fighting. Unfortunately the major general's intention of going to the front to direct the fighting was not carried out. The boys were taken safely to the Christian rear but unfortunately the major general's wife and his three pretty little girls were lost. The number of non-combatants who fled from the region of Delight's junction during the battle was about eight hundred and eighty thousand. The latest list of the dead soldiers of the whole battle at that time, accounted for was up to 4,178,899 men.

On the 19th of February, general Vivian himself sent this report by wireless telegraph to the Emperor At Angolinia Agathia. It was as follows:

The situation to night in all parts of the stricken districts of the camps at Delight's junction so far as no known to me is very much improved and will I suppose should we have fair weather and receiving no further attack from the enemy, continue to improve. And our armies have the voluntary assistance of the full railway, express, telegraph and telephone companies, all of whom have promptly and without any hindrance from the enemy transmitted supplies and messages besides besides contributing to the relief of the suffering wounded.

The armies at Delight's junction is being managed by its own general generals supplemented by the assistance of a large National army committee composed of the best generals, and also by the aid of general Darger and Schneider. General Robertson Vivian.

The most reliable information obtainable placed the dead at the battle of Delight's junction including those killed in the barracks between 5,000,000 and 5,500,000. Also at a meeting of the general relief committee no one at first could be found who would undertake further the job of removing the debris on account of the severe cold weather as all state it would be impossible to work under such conditions without freezing to death. And the nearest estimate expert wreckers will make is that it will take more than two million men one hundred and ninety six days to clear away all the debris, and get all the rest of the bodies out, and that this would probably cost $500,000,000.

Yet the whole situation was now rapidly growing better, though the surviving soldiers found themselves shocked and shattered as a result of their harrowing experiences during the frightful conflict.

While there was an abundance of energy running as night or might have naturally been expected a vast amount of it was not concentrated, because of the extreme intensity of the cold weather and the difficulty of even getting all sleighs through the deep snow. It was the policy of all the generals to concentrate all the energetic energies possible. These efforts despite the cold weather had been indeed most gratifying.

There was still about two hundred and fifty thousand men who owned their own tents, who had seen them all destroyed. Nearly the whole of the besieging Christian lines were now dependent upon the full general city of the whole of Galvarinia, and upon the relief committee to do all it possibly could to help the besiegers withstand the rigors of the mid winter, and reinforce their encampments with more troops and all necessities. No man or soldier who had been an eye witness to the terrible devastating effects of the battle which has swept over the region can have the faintest idea of what it really meant.

The small city of Delight's junction lies on the north bend of the gunbeam Creek, the big town covering about half a mile of this, the bend also extending for a mile. Along the southern sections of Baldwin's encampments for a distance of two to five miles every army barracks had been absolutely demolished. Scores of thousands of the soldiers were living in their wrecked barracks here. Many of these barracks were without floors and devoid of all sanitary provisions. And despite the cold weather's serious outbreak of sickness among these soldiers was feared. And the terrible intensity of the cold made sleep almost impossible at night, the soldiers shivering under their thickest bed clothes, and war correspondents who went there did not remain there long on account of no sanitary place to shelter them from the terrible cold.

An increase also in the awful cold weather was already noted, and many soldiers were in danger of freezing to death unless something was done to place the soldiers into more warmer shelter.

One of the great hospitals contained over six hundred soldiers, sick and overcome from exposure, and many men, women and children refugees were among them. They were being cared for by the Angolinian Red Cross nurses, doctors, and also Catholic nuns and priests. Many deaths said to say had occurred at this and many others of the army hospitals. Many of these victims were not identified but a record was being kept of them for purposes of identification in the future. There was no lack of any amount of medical and also medical aid within the Christian lines of the main distant camps, but it was the countless suffering and sick soldiers at Delight's junction and the other points, where the battle raged who were badly in need of medicines and army surgeons, precluded from these points had reached the main christian lines, asking that any surplus of help there be sent them, but nothing for a time could arise on account of the deep snow, and hindrance by the enemy robbing and scouting part part parties. The work in the cold of burning the frozen bodies and countless other carcasses which still were to be found under almost every pile of wreckage continued. In most of these snow clogged ruins great numbers of bodies were found frequently. No attempt whatever was made in keeping count of them, and therefore it could and would never be known accurately how many were destroyed in this manner.

Even the deep snow drifts were giving up dead bodies constantly, and the shore of the river and other points were still strewn with them. There were only ten barracks in a condition to be habitable. There were yet thousands of bodies of dead artillery horses, and about one thousand five hundred and fifty bodies of soldiers being found there south of Flower Junction. The latter had been only partially buried on account of the snow and frozen ground, and hands and feet were seen to be protruding from the earth and snow in many places and there were not enough soldiers who could stand the cold long enough to bury the remaining dead. Writing from Delight's Junction Feb. eighteenth the Angelina Agathia Record's correspondent said:

"The besieging armies at Vivian Wickey had been engaged in three most violent battles already, but even this disastrous experience is not enough to convince these at Delight's Junction that such a disaster will happen again. Only a few more cautious generals have any idea of taking steps to prevent a repetition of the recent terrible disaster. Asked if there will ever be anything done to make future blunders like the one at Delight's Junction impossible, many of the officers quote the old saying, 'Lightning never strikes in the same place twice.'"

"No indeed," said general Richardson Halsted. "The generals of all the divisions will remain here in fancied security just as those at Delight's Junction did before plan of erecting extremely strongly fortified works is perfectly feasible and so in a series of new batteries. I think the good old Mies-Hollerster and Lucille taken plans are the best. The old battered works at Delight's Junction do not need to be abandoned. I was seventeen years chief army engineer and following the great battle of Bieghburg Landing drew on a piece of paper plans for a strong line of fortified works ten feet high and extending all along the river for miles to the north end on the north of Vivian Wickey. There was also drawn the plans of works on the river edge in the formation of a dyke. At first our generals gave my plans great consideration, and I still have the map of the plans which show the fortifications. Even the legislature at Angelina Agathia gave full authority to fortify the besieging christian lines, but it was sometime after the battle of Bieghburg Landing when this had been secured and many of the generals said:

"On the enemy is not strong enough to drive us back," and they did not fortify strongly enough in the vicinity of Delight's Junction."

The construction by the armies of strongly fortified works one eighteen miles long extending out southeastward for the purpose of making it impossible for the enemy to gain their way into the christian encampments made the necessity of remedial work more apparent but strangely to say nothing had been done. In the terrible battle of Delight's Junction when the enemy in making his furious counter charge captured general Greatharts encampments one section of the rebel line of charge moved across the southeastern works like a vast tidal wave of screeching fiends and literally carried all before them. This was the point where whole brigades of christian troops were literally swept away with the most fearful loss, such fearful loss that left hardly enough men to escape the foe's rage, to indicate that any brigades had ever stood their ground there.

At this part of the christian line the enemy's attack grew to a violence out of all proportions to any ever known yet in any battle. The foe swept on as if resistance was not there at all. Reinforcements in men and field artillery and even cavalry were rushed in great numbers to the scene, and had not these immense fresh columns formed as irresistible as a gigantic log jam but extending along the line of battle for seven miles, this enormous body of men attacking glandelinian soldiers would have swept through all the christian encampments far beyond Delight's Junction, and the number of dead wounded, and captured and the amount of property damage would have been enormously quadrupled, and in a most deadly and sanguinary manner.

The reinforcements fought desperately and held the foe in check cutting their masses down like waves crashed against the rocks.

"The reinforcements forced like a powerful breakwater against a wild stormy sea," said general Richardson Halsted in calling attention to this feature of the irresistible glandelinian attack. "And had it not been for the brave stand of the reinforcements we might not any of us here be here now to tell of it."

According to general Richardson Halsted the christian escape at Delight's Junction had the wrong at the architecture for the making of fortified works to resist the fire of the enemy's artillery. Most of all the army barracks were built with balcon frames and were poorly adapted to stand the heavy shell fire.

"This battle was a most terrible of the war yet," he said, "just such as we have not had before the war or the siege of Vivian Wickey began. Still we can never know when one may break out again, and we should prepare our besieging lines accordingly. What we want is not to keep the enemy from attacking. That cannot be done. We want works and strength enough in troops and artillery to compel the waves of the assailants to break the force of their attack before they overwhelm the whole christian line with disaster. Disaster that will be fatal to the whole cause. It was the force of the great rebel attack which caused the loss of the battle of Delight's Junction and not the damage from the artillery fire."

General Fredrickson Parson attributed the loss of the violent battle, in part to the recent demolition of a long line of old breastworks which originally protected the whole christian line in the vicinity of Delight's Junction near which glandelinian encampments were located. In the regular course of some unknown blunderous order, these were leveled off purposely by Angelinian engineers and workers and therefore there was no front line of works to roll back a violent glandelinian attack and so on from the rebellious in the northwest. Many of the generals under the supreme command of general Robert Vivian had a number of survey maps which showed another contributing cause. It was soon by the very recorded soundings that there was a long line of newly erected works extending for near nearly three miles toward North Bend the average height of the breastworks being less than two twelve feet, one fourth higher than the other works erected before. These works extended before what was supposed to be (but was not) a shallow but lengthy bar of quicksand extending the same length. A fierce glandelinian attack from the direction of the southeast woods of Meloria near Delight's Junction would if successful have a tendency to drive the defenders for miles before it and when the victorious rebel troops reached these shallow sandy stretches during the battle, they only extended their lines, and surged over it, rather than break and recede as they would have had it really been quick sand. The location of Delight's Junction also was formed so as to make an immense ambush. The desperate work of removing the bodies from the mass of wreckage still continued. It was then Feb. eighteenth yet and over forty thousand of the bodies were taken out of the debris which lined the battlefront.

With a blizzard that had been done to recover so many bodies buried beneath or placed to the immense windrows the work on account of the intense cold weather had scarcely started.

There was in most places no chance to dig trench graves because of the deep snow cold weather, and hard frozen ground, and the corpses beaten bruised, and mangled beyond identification was consigned to the flames.

Now despite the cold were still holding many volunteers were coming in fast for this horrible gruesome work. Soldiers who had recently avoided the dead because they said they could not stand the dreadful cold were working with a most vigorous will and energy in getting them out of the way.

Under one pile of wreckage in the afternoon of the eighteenth one thousand two hundred and twenty bodies were taken and cremated. In another pile a non-combatant pulled out the remains of his wife and children and put for a full minute gazed upon them and then threw them one by one into the fire. And an immense force of soldiers were still engaged in removing the dead from Delight's Junction located about four miles north of Delight's Junction. At this point the glandelinians counter attacked with the fury of a raging legion of all the lost creatures in the infernal regions, and carried all before them as does a roaring torch tornado. The force of explosions hung up in trees, and on telephone poles, and fences, the bodies of soldiers which were being collected and cremated as fast as possible. At the southeast of Delight's Junction the searching for and the cremating of bodies that either perished or found lodgment there was being prosecuted vigorously.

An officer whose headquarters was not overthrown by the shells but mangled, tells this of his escape:

"At about eight o'clock in the morning as christian reinforcements began to arrive the glandelinian assaulting columns began to slowly recede, and I could see countless numbers of dead on the snow covered battlefield. It was then I had my first gleam of hope as the glandelinian assailants fell back, dreading the fall of the tottering walls, I clambered out the rear windows to the pile of wreckage outside where I stood for a long time exposed to the fierce cold below zero weather until late in the day and on toward night not daring to stir when a squad of brave men came and said it was possible to get away and find shelter from the cold. This squad of soldiers knew I had taken refuge in what was known to be one of the strongest barracks buildings in the camp. They came through all the danger to learn my fate. The gladdest sound I ever heard was the that of their voices. They hastened me off fearing the return of the fierce glandelinian soldiers."

Already despite the awful cold weather all efforts for quickly rebuilding most of the shattered barracks have been made and the clearing away of the debris continues, though the cold wave is so severe that the work is only progressing with the greatest difficulty. All the railroads not hindered by the wicked snow are working with all their utmost energies to bring Baldwin's armies out of their afflictions. Eight hundred million of capital invested in these roads is bound to see us through in face of all perils.

Especially the great Mc-Hollister and Pandora have been built with special reference to a most great commercial mart toward Vivian Wickey, and they cannot fail to sustain the besiegers.

ALL THE BESIEGING ARMIES OF BALDWIN'S CAMPS MUST RISE AGAIN.

Our nation, our whole nation do not belittle the awful calamity that has befallen that part of the vast armies besieging Vivian Wickey. The whole world has probably never seen the like of it—certainly not even the worse fire-fires of the world could compare to it. But the forces of the enemy, as well as the cruel forces of other nature no less than the forces of reason require that the exchanges of a great region should be conducted there.

Ten weeks may be required to reconstruct the encampments, but the means to even make the fortifications fire proof, will and is forth coming. The losses the armies have already suffered so far during the siege must be borne, but the place is there, and the men are there, to commence at the bottom and work up again, not at the bottom either, for our armies have credit in every land and nation, and the experience of one upbuilding of Baldwin's encampments will help the besiegers. Let our whole nation cheer up, save what the great war will leave, and in the long run we shall win out all right. It may be probable that the worse is already over. In probably a few more days everything will be restored to normal conditions, and if the besiegers hold out nobly against the center of the rebellion we can win the whole war if we retain our Christian faith and unusual holy grit. Let the whole nation cheer up. The whole world is watching us and backing us against the enemy of our blessed Lord. We must win and shall.

This written battle call had indeed an electrical effect upon the spirits of the nation. The same spirit had been shown at Delight's Junction though indeed there were more discouragements of a serious nature even than those of other disastrous battles at other parts of the war-stricken nation. There was no place that escaped outside of the city of Delight's Junction. The writer, (that is himself myself) may resume the war time:

The day or week after the disaster may be a day of recovery from the bloody chaos of war to regenerate general orders, though the whole nation looked upon the scene like the chaos of the Infernal Regions had just passed. All the best and highest generals of Baldwin's army who had survived, were busy providing for the reestablishment of reformation and utmost confidence all organizing for the quick resurrections of the encampments but little of this indeed was seen by the general observer. The war correspondent within the snow bound Christian lines that is the parts not devastated by the enemy observed on an early morning first perhaps, an occasional camp fire, and yet not many, for the immense amount of snow prevented the making of camp fires, and also the orders from officers of all ranks had fully prohibited the making of too many camp fires, and only the very reckless or the contrives exposed to the intense cold made what fires they dared.

He saw thousands of heavily bandaged soldiers, with faces haggard, red eyed, panting, posturing or sullen, many still angered or morose from the effects of the previous experience since the battle of Delight's Junction. He saw military wagons, carts, and army sleighs moving slowly through the company streets and being surrounded by soldiers of the meanest war bearing with caution for water to obtain the fluid which suddenly had become so confounded precious and scarce despite the snow all around.

He saw long sleighs being driven up to the Base Hospitals carrying wounded soldiers and injured non-combatants, innocent victims of the battle now furnished with timely shelter. He saw military fire engines probably from other parts of the encampments well in position playing upon the still blazing and a clattering coal heaps of the ruined encampments along the sunbeam creek, their occasional sharp whistle being almost the only sound to break the strange solemn silence of that cold winter's morning.

And by and by however all the unwounded soldiers began to appear at their duty, and then all gradually became a babble of tremendous confusion din and commotion. Long and small army sleighs of every description, and in numbers no one could believe the encampments would boast of were plying hither and thither with reckless speed through the deep snow. This was a revival of military energy, the complete resumption of trained army engineering labors, a loud protest against further loss of time. The reader if he wishes can follow a vigorous speech of general Vivian Wickey.

The Christian positions at Delight's Junction have called upon us for help, upon the whole nation and is therefore bound to reform with the rapidly developing positions of the other besieging armies, and to do so in spite of any slight or serious hindrance that may happen. Such military po properly have been in some cases irretrievably lost though the way in which Baldwin's surviving brigades rebound even from out the slough of despair is something truly wonderful, but the siege must still continue on. Baldwin must recover from the surprise the rebels over the disaster, and she must recover Vivian Wickey for use which no other nation can subvert and which no other city in the whole world even if it had the advantage of location could prepare itself to subvert in time the time it will take the besieging armies at Vivian Wickey to occupy rates. All the efforts of the entire nation is alike interested in keeping the besieging armies much more rapidly growing than that of other National armies. Non-combatants and strangers who come to Delight's Junction and take a survey of the present desolation are terribly shocked by it and go away saying that Baldwin's fortifications cannot be rebuilt in less than a full generation.

They forget that general Baldwin's positions was only a few months in attaining their last great magnificence simply because the main besieging lines was for that long time growing to its present proportions and that the question of how long it will take to rebuild the works at Delight's Junction is simply a question of how long it will require for the whole Abolitionist nation to produce the provisions, materials, and every thing that is known to be used in the erection of fortifications and earthworks. It is estimated by all those who are competent to judge of this that as soon as the fierce winter lets up, that three months or maybe much less will be adequate to the work, in other words that as soon as more earthworks mounted with artillery can be completed in a solid manner our reconstructed encampments will already be strongly supported by better fortifications equal in their capacity for the reformation of Baldwin's Christian army to that which was demolished in the great battle at Delight's Junction.

One foreigner who appeared to be of Mexican nationality was wondering among the strange and mournful ruins of the extreme north part of general Baldwin's camps on the cold day after that portion was destroyed by Inner Myetic's artillery storm storm and met an Angelinian officer whom he knew and whom he accosted with the usual salutation:

"How did you come out during the big battle?"

The Angelinian officer was "Yesterday morning I had a full Regiment of fine noble soldiers. To day I have only have myself wounded as I am and that is all."

"Are you going to give up?" asked the Mexican with his usual leer.

"No indeed," answered the soldier. "We don't have that for our Religion. Rather than give up to such wicked rebels we'll fight to the death."

"That's the way to talk. Same here," said the Mexican and they both shook hands.

A few days later the Mexican encountered the same Angelinian officer and friend dashing down the snow covered company street at all the speed he could go. He had easily with the help of the Darling Vivian girls, that is Violet and her sisters recovered a new Regiment and was going to take command before night. He was buoyant and very enthusiastic. Probably the reader of this long story if he could visit the besieging Christian army at Vivian Wickey may find this same Angelinian officer three months hence in full command of a division of troops, not in command of thirty thousand men but five hundred and sixty thousand, for it is such pluck as this that wins a just war in the long run. The visiting reader could see besides the newly erected works which would soon appear at Delight's Junction and the sixteen important new long range batteries now already formed also guarding the outskirts of the camp probably by iron and concrete mixture. The echoes of all words expressing individual tenacity of all purpose never giving up under any conditions came upon every breeze from Vivian Wickey. The first hours of despair after the inevitable calamity would take years to describe and a million volumes to fill.

During the confusion of the battle when the foe were in possession of the camps, every company street, glass, and field and all ground in the rear of the camp was occupied by trembling exhausted panic stricken troops, pale with fear and desperate with uncertainty. "What shall we do? The enemy is upon us—what will become of us if the enemy capture the works?" were the anxious queries of the heterogeneous multitude of soldiers as they grouped bewildered in the company streets or as their many wounded lay prostrated in suffering and despair in tents or shell term barracks or on the snow covered ground. And now look at the situation. A great or rally than ever.

Many of the barracks not completely damaged looked almost like capsized boats or a ship's masts leveled flat upon the ground with not one piece of timber remaining upon the other, others were there with roofs off, and upper stories stories raised, many others were torn or twisted into the most fantastic shapes and grotesque forms and there were still many others with most of their walls intact but which had all the windows out and had been stripped of everything in the way of army furniture, a freakish incident for explosions it seemed indeed a most unusual thing for explosions to perform these strange miraculous things, but these blasting explosions repeated all those same strange tricks that the most terrific windstorms in the world ever did, or that tornadoes have ever been known to enact and gave countless new manifestations of their mysterious power.

It would be wasting time, and also it would take me to print a million to a foot sheets to tell all the most curious things to be seen in the desolated company streets, how many of the biggest trees were uprooted by eruptive explosions and driven branches and all through barracks, how even the military telegraph poles near the Min-Holleston and Pandora lines were either driven under the tracks as if they had been hammered there, and how pianos music boxes of every description and all kinds of army furniture were mysteriously transferred from one barracks to another. Pieces of glass sometimes five to ten inches and even three feet in length were found driven into walls inside buildings like as if they had been shot by a bow and sticking five inches into the walls without being broken or cracked.

And yet such were ominous of all than all these freaks not even mentioned as there are too many were the vast windows of debris covered over with heavily laden snow and ice, and from which despite the intense cold of winter these strange orders which told of many dead victims of this cruel war beneath not only soldiers but also refugees women and children, whose silent lips will never be able to reveal the horrid agony from which death alone has released them.

More sorrowful and heartrending still was the sight of the million morose faces of so many brigades of wounded soldiers, the tear stained faces of women refugees half clad who looked listlessly from the windows of the few remaining barracks haunted by the memory from which they can never escape the loss of children, and priceless articles torn from them by battle crazed war mad glandelinians or of seeing their families hurled into a horrid maelstrom of destruction to be seen no more on the earth.

But yet what were all these desolated army barracks to the countless thousands of desolated hearts, within how in the world should I try to describe it will the world ever know the real dimensions of this disaster of the war, which crushed the fighting christian forces at Delight's junction and left them broken and most desolate and discouraged like a wounded dove or sea gull fluttering on the sandy beach of the ocean. And the small but beautiful beachy shore of the gunbeam Creek or river near Delight's junction. That once most beautiful river beach with its long stretches of strangely yet unusually snowy white sand where long before the war the country children used to come to play—what in the world had become of it? Horribly misshapen, unusually and strangely distorted, to blotched beyond comprehension and drabbed and horribly crisscrossed and wreckage and body strewn it spread away to the north and the south, its ugly scars and shell holes and craters made by explosions rendered more hideous by the glinting rays of the winter sun.

Most of it just now had disappeared under the deep snow. And frozen pools along the shore, with the approach of summer, would be stinking with the remains of ill fated pets of the soldiers, dogs, cats, chickens, birds, horses, cows, and even human beings. All along the river shore as far as eye could reach were massive windrows of wreckage, and disabled wagons and gun carriages and everything of every description all shattered and torn to pieces.

Far in the distance I noticed an immense black cloud of smoke and thinking some of the wreckage was ablaze, I hastily drove away to the scene and found a large number of soldiers mostly Abyssinkilians feeding the flames of a big bonfire with the timber of wrecked barracks which once gave evidence of an enormous encampment. And why such a big bonfire? These soldiers were burning in this one fire alone over six thousand bodies, picked up from the battle field, and the fuel was the timber of the very barracks which the brave soldiers once occupied.

And yet this most awful spectacle was but the smallest fragment of the murderous work of the first greatest and bloody battle of the war itself. Along the river front there were to be seen countless piles of snow covered earth and frozen sand and in every direction along the mutilated shore. And many soldiers were noticed in the far distance shoveling these already countless numbers of unearthen mounds. I saw with the sinking of the heart what they were doing. The thousands of dead soldiers brought in from the field were being buried deep in the ground either in single graves, or trenches. Driving beyond the grave diggers we saw prostrate on the ground or lying about the damaged guns, forms like bodies covered over with snow and floating further out in the unfrozen part of the river where the current was strong were other bodies of soldiers that would soon be brought in to be hastily buried. The sea elephants and barges were like herons bringing in the dead dead to be buried anywhere possible. It is to the sad contemplation of such awful scenes resulting from such big battles that would stagger consciousness and sting the human soul. Many of the soldiers told me and my followers with sad humor that what I saw and they had seen nowhere as nothing as to what we could have seen had I and they been here during the actual battle itself.

I am glad then that I did not come sooner, and I am sorry that I ever came at all. What I have seen has been sufficient to make me miserable to the very last day of my life and what I have heard that I could not see and could not have seen had I been in the battle itself will surely haunt me by night and day as long as my senses remain. Indeed I am telling of an incident repeated to me by one of the surviving officers of the battle itself. Four days after the disastrous conflict seventeen thousand five hundred bodies had been gathered in six surviving barracks buildings near the shore of the river. All these bodies were frozen hard and even now very severe cold and windy weather was setting in very rapidly.

Indeed this horrible scene of death and destruction could be observed for miles. What disposition should there be made of this horrifying mass of human flesh was an immensely imminent problem indeed. And while this serious matter was under discussion the army and relief committees were informed that there was no time to waste in any amount of deliberation that nearly all of the wounded were nearly frozen to death. There was so many dead soldiers and it was so awfully cold that it was impossible to get any amount of soldiers to dig into the hard frozen ground to bury them and that all of them could not be totally incinerated in that portion of the encampments without endangering more life and property as an account of everything frozen hard there could not be any amount of water obtained to extinguish a big fire once started.

It was also decided to load the bodies on barges, tow them down the unfrozen parts of the river and sink them with weights. That seemed to be the only reasonably thing that was to be done. Countless numbers of men were called upon to perform this awful task especially glandelinian prisoners.

But on account of this intense cold to which they were not used to having come from a warmer climate, they quailed at the task. And as it was so terribly cold who in the world could blame them even if they were wicked soldiers of the rebellion. They were told that the quickest and surest action was necessary, that they were responsible for the many dead themselves, and with the cool coming of summer a great pestilence might come and sweep off the whole besieging army to the full disadvantage of both sides. Still quailing on account of the cold and deep snow they were completely immovable. Yet it was no time for dallying. Regiments of hardy men from northern Abyssinkia now in the army with muskets at fixed bayonets were brought to the scene and a large force of these glandelinian prisoners, were compelled at the point of the bayonet to perform this sad and fearsome duty.

One by one the many dead soldiers were removed to the barges every body as frozen as it had been and was represented in that horrid mass. The dead, men, women, and children were separated from the soldiers and put on a separate barge. The unwilling glandelinian prisoners, who were performing this awful task, were compelled to bind heavy cloths about their mouths and nostrils to keep their faces from being frozen while they were at work, and occasionally soldiers passed strong brandy and hot coffee and whiskey among them to nerve them to their duty. And the workers were exchanged every half an hour so that no would suffer too much from the cold. Who indeed could ever conceive the horror of all this? After a while, a great long while the seventeen thousand dead soldiers were piled upon the barges and an army tug pulled them slowly down the river.

About a few miles down, where the current was very strong, amid the howling white caps and roaring crashing ice floes with God's Benediction breathed in the moaning winter winds, all that was mortal of these seventeen thousand men and women were consigned to the depth of the river. And yet this was but another sad incident of the sad tragedy of the war of which I write. General Anthony Morino of the one hundred and fourth Infantry known well throughout the army was a member of a party of officers who struggled all day through the deep snow to get to the devastated camp at Delight's junction, and he arrived late at night. It was a very nice day for him, for this was the encampment also of his own troops and before the battle he had six high officers and five aide-de-camps here in addition to a young colonel who was his son and an uncle, and father also officers of high rank.

He found his son safe, but slightly wounded and many other members of his staff also. They told him how one officer a lieutenant had at the height of the battle, picked up, up colonel Granden who had been wounded and placed him on a cot in a little house in the rear of the christian lines after traveling under fire for half a mile and then had made a second trip to bring a wounded general to the same place.

When the lieutenant returned, the house and the colonel was gone having been shot and is nothing but a high explosive shell. The other officers with their very regiments clung to their work throughout and successfully withstood the fiercest of the terrific Glandelinian assault. General Anthony Marino found later on however that three of his officers had been killed during the full fury of the battle. I also met Colonel Knight who arrived at about three o'clock in the afternoon yesterday. He told me that three quarters of his regiment had been destroyed, and all his best officers down. All had joined each other in death on the battlefield. How many stories of sad tragedies like this that remain to be told can not now be numbered. The anxious millions of soldiers who had been desperately struggling, or even who had been straggling into the region of the raging battle from the distance had usually found some dear beloved officer or many of them, and even dearest friends missing and numbered among the hundreds who who became in a few brief moments or hours the victims of the first bloodiest battle of the awful war.

It is with the greatest reluctance that I am compelled to relate one awful case that came under my own startled observation. It was so horrible that per se I should not tell much about it at all but only such instances can convey a very faint idea of the horrors of the battle. While driving near the disabled christian batteries of general Caldwell's artillery the mangled bodies of artillery men by the score of hundreds were observed with their organs plainly in view or with bodies shattered, arms and legs torn off heads shattered, or bodies blown in three parts, or with big holes torn or ripped into them. Colonel Lewis of Baldwin's Field Artillery arrived also looking for his son. General Lewis said: "I helped bury sixteen hundred bodies at Delight's pass a last night cold as it was a victim of the violent artillery duel. The soldiers of my command also buried fifty eight hundred yesterday. Cooling down Delight's pass I saw hundreds of legs and arms, all of infantry soldiers protruding from the deep snow or frozen muck and quick sands."

I myself believe there were countless thousands near the very mouth of this Bayou. As soon as the soldiers can be found able to do this work these poor soldier victims will also be looked after without question most of them were from general Greathart's retreating columns because Delight's Bayou is near the Meldron woods. Among many columns and other things I saw there were known thumbstones with inscriptions in Abbeismian and rusty caskets which had been dug out of some grave yard by the shell explosion. On going to the nearest location of Delight's junction after the big and awful battle tells the terrible tale in this succession of words: against a series of long barbed wired fences, and other kinds the frozen carcasses of many dead artillery horses had been hurled by great shell explosions their swollen limbs stiff toward the winter sky, and yet other horses were seen in the encampments which had been a roaring boiling inferno of shell explosions but five days ago. This sight was the first we saw of the innocent dumb beasts killed by artillery fire, and every officer in the sleigh with us as if to avoid the sensation of fear, emotion and excitement that arose in the mind of each began to express wonder how in the world this could ever be—that is that some of these poor animals had survived the artillery storm, and the others did not.

It was indeed an idiotic talk, but a most beautiful one to me. For it showed to me that all the arguments had fear and excitement for their foundation, and that fear had great sympathy for its foundation. The officers who talked and talked, we who advanced such foolish opinions, had hearts then there under an eclipse of fear for their fellow men. It was hoping desperately against hope. And that was curiously apparent to every one of us officers. And yet why not hope? Why not even if it was tremendously ridiculous!

Countless numbers of trees were denuded of all branches as if shattered by a tornado. How could any number of soldiers live through such a shell fire? At here and there a barracks, even now tottering could be seen, and distressed soldiers would be seen looking out over the devastation of their encampments, and so they could live and hope would take on a new life. Then Delight's junction began to show what the fury of a battle like this could do. Many skeletons of big trees were laid low by shell fire.

And even the hardened snow had been trampled heavily, most brutally here. The opposing forces were surely angry at each other in this spot beyond a doubt. The sleigh went slowly on as it went through the deep snow I could see the horses plowing desperately, slowly as it went through the deep snow I could see the country side laid low. The talking ceased. Hope had gone with the sight of the country side laid low. Everyone of us realized that we were now within the heart of the battle. The battlefield where such a ghastly conflict had lately raged. The army sleigh merely because the horses had hard work plowing through the deep snow went slowly.

And this added to the effect. It was like to invading the territories of the lost souls. It was a funeral cortege over a wide extent. Over the snow covered prairies near Delight's junction the sleigh slowly crept. Bodies of all kinds covered these prairies. It was from the encampments near Delight's junction, because it could not come from no other place. Every part was covered with the remnants of barracks and headquarters of officers miles away. There were army blankets, military furniture of all kinds, but mostly of the expensive kind. Mysteriously there were children's clothing, and toys, though where they came from no one knows, also ladies' toilet articles, bed clothing, and in fact everything that goes to make up an army encampment. And this spot was seven miles away from where the battle of Delight's junction had raged. I believe the whole christian army suffered badly. A terrible number of soldiers had lost their lives there and the agony of the great army of wounded was to see but above all was the idea. What of across the way near general Greathart's position? It was eighteen miles to that point, and another sleigh with a new team of horses was in waiting to take us there. Before we got there there was a good chance of observation of the outer limits of general Kindermine's position on which in the late fall the waters of the Sunbeam Creek had so gently lapped. This little stream itself was as gentle as some small country brook during the summer. It had lapped and kissed the blades of grass that always grew down where the lapping of the waves was very gentle. It merely gurgled up now the shores of this beautiful little stream was strewn with dead soldiers and animals. The countless numbers of bloated artillery horses was also among them.

Strange to say, chickens, rats, dogs, and cats and everything it seemed though it was mysterious where they came from were also there in, in fact every creature that breathed "I'll dead and frozen stiff in the snow. But by their sides and among them were as many dead soldiers. The worn out survivors of the conflict having pulled through the conflict and buried their own dead or created them were quick to respond to natural instincts and to do right by their own kind. I saw them take the bodies of many dead soldiers and with quick shrift place them in trench like graves. It was terrible but what could they do? There was no time for any burial services. The soldiers who did the work were simply doing what they could to relieve the view of them. They were not gentle but how could they have time to be gentle when the weather is so terribly cold and the sight of them lying there is liable to discourage the whole army. It may strike the minds of the soldiers with terror. But it was the only solution—there were fifty nine thousand soldiers buried deep under the snow that cold day, buried as best as the poor unfortunates could bury them—with the idea wholly that they should be placed where those that came to claim them could afterwards find them and protect themselves against exposition of the fierce enemy.

In the debris from Delight's junction was everything getting off the sleigh. I walked about the wreckage and was impressed with the idea that this battle must have impressed the survivors with the idea that the world was at an end. For the extent of forty miles along the stream, and into the interior of Delight's junction—this disorderly battle had raged. The rebel artillery committed the most of the destruction upon Baldwin's encampments and when it ceased the results could be easily observed and the destruction of lives fully revealed.

For slowly plowing through the deep snow among the wreckage I found a real truth. It had been broken over by the violence of the exploding shells. Countless numbers of letters written by soldiers and now hurried by snow melting on them were frozen on the timbers. I was not allowed for serious reason to read one of them.

No man had been busier comforting these terror stricken refugees of the battle than general Kindermine, and Greathart and their officers. They took charge of the homeless child slaves and orphans that streamed in with the refugees and prepared to send them by quickest and safest route to Angelina Agathia—that grand general they are. I will take off my hat to them in any day of the week. I have known these two generals for years and there are to my opinion no nobler characters alive. I saw them both at the battle of Poughburg Landing when the whole of general Kindermine's lines was terribly ravaged by the aerial onslaughts of the Glandelinians. They were at every point of the christian line along the battle front looking for breaks to mend, and I know they have always been quick to reach the scene of impending danger and disaster and do all in their power to avert it.

During this past fearful battle near Delight's junction they brought their divisions forward at eleven o'clock in the noon time or forenoon and lost no time in doing their part of the work and heaven knows there was none more important than that to which they assigned themselves. But all the world ought to know what these two generals have done during the battle. The soldiers have always loved their generals, the whole world should know that hundreds of good officers have been formed by their example and disciplines officers who have become successful in every way they accomplished and who honor their flag and army by their useful and upright lives. But Abbeismian will have greater cause than ever to love and revere all her good generals when it is known what they did for their country when at stake.

INCIDENTS OF THE TERRIBLE BATTLE, THAT MAKES UP THE HORROR OF AN UNUSUALLY VIOLENT WAR, ALSO THE FULL ACCOUNT OF THE BATTLE BATTLES' PURY AND THE RUIN IT CAUSED BEYOND DESCRIPTION.

THE ADJUTANT of general Baldwin had a narrow escape with his life from tons of falling wreckage when the general's headquarters collapsed and he managed to fight his way out of the line of debris with the help of some surviving officers and privates some who were just out of a sick bed.
They managed to get to the basement of another and stronger barracks just across the company street. This was the barracks of general Allenton. This barracks also went to pieces between three thirty and four o'clock and the general fortunately was not there though the other occupants of the army building were lost. Baldwin's aide-de-camp had to flee from the burning structure but he caught up a glassless transome and rushed out into the company street and soon found that the wooden transome belonged to a part of general Baldwin's headquarters being about six feet in length and three in width. It had or probably came from the side of the barracks made of ordinary siding and studding. He used this as a shield to protect himself from flying debris hurled about by the explosions and even now did not know how it really protected him.

All the time he kept telling those who escaped with him to follow his example and this they did. Along toward five o'clock a shell fragment struck the transome he used for a shield and demolished it from him without injuring him. By this time he and his followers were almost completely exhausted but he managed by probably a thousand successive efforts to bring his followers further out of range of the foe's heavy artillery fire.

A little later a number of refugees, men, women, and children were seen coming through the dense smoke haze. The aide-de-camp called to them to take to the lower windrow of wreckage wreckage behind and not to come higher for he was afraid the refugees would reveal themselves to the enemy artillery men and would cause the shells to crash there also. When the wildest uproar of the battle ceased he and his followers emerged from their shelter and he told one of the soldiers to go far ahead and scout and look for better shelter in the distance for had there been any concealed shell craters, or furrows, he wanted to be advised of it before he emerged too much out into the open with the refugees for it was all he could do to push through the deep snow or clamber over the windrows of wreckage in his exhausted condition.

After working through the deep snow until eleven o'clock at night he reached a portion of the vast encampments not injured by the battle and eventually got into better shelter. Not until two days later had he or those with him sufficiently recovered from their exhaustion to resume their duties. At the day after, a number of soldiers in looking for bodies under the debris found one of a sweet faced nun on her knees with eyes uplifted and her hands clasped and extended as if in prayer. It was evident that the sister had been praying over some dying soldier a among the wreckage when she was struck by some flying shell fragment and instantly killed.

During the height of the artillery storm, a young officer heard the cries of wounded outside in the company street. They were calling for help. Two shell explosions hurled a whirling cyclone of wreckage about him and he was so badly battered though not hurt that he had to return to shelter where he waited impatiently for a lull. The cries of the wounded still filled his ears. He went out into the open a second time and after being gone for what seemed a eternity to those who were away, awaiting his return he came back with four wounded soldiers. They had been pinned under the wreckage of a barracks. The young officer was not satisfied with that however but went out for other wounded soldiers immediately, the shelling having begun to slacken by the time, and worked all night. That same evening an army mascot dog stood violently barking near a pile of debris in the west and a little north of Belmont's junction. The guards who endeavored to stop him barking by driving him away did not succeed for he returned as soon as they stopped their efforts.

It was suggested that he was guarding a body but others disputed the idea. Finally they dug beneath the spot where the dog stood and there they found the remains of a young officer and a little girl with him whom the soldiers identified by the decorations on the uniform he wore as Lieutenant T. Corron and his little daughter a popular young officer well known both in the army and in many cities.

scene
This young officer and his followers with the exception of a top sergeant were killed.
This young lieutenant was the commander of a large platoon of Abyssinians.
cavalry cavalry. On one of the company streets there was kept in a large barracks building a Glandolinian prisoner who though no evidence was found on him was charged with being a desperate felon spy and fire vandal.
Those of the soldiers who survived the awful battle reported that during the tremendous confusion and excitement the prisoner escaped and stole three large flasks of brandy and staggered through the shell torn company streets drinking steadily until the explosion of a sharpshell swept him away to his death death, his idea evidently to kill himself in this fashion before the firing squads put an end to him.

His body was picked out of a high snow drift between the streets of Companies A & B. While working with a large squad of soldiers clearing the debris and taking away the deep snow of a large number of barracks on Avenue O. of Company A. P.
one of the rescuers found to his utmost surprise a three year old child snuggled tightly under an unusually thick clothing of an army or a cot.
It was impossible to make any identification of the barracks or of the names of the soldiers and refugee occupants, as three, one hundred foot long barracks were crushed together into one windrow of mortar, bricks and timbers and intermingled with all kinds of army furniture.

The bed was pulled out of the wreckage with the greatest difficulty and out of the wreckage a sixteen feet from the ground, where it had been buried beneath only two feet of debris. The little boy seemed none the worse from his experience of nearly a week covered up under heavy bed covers beneath a mountain of battle and shell strewn wreckage. The full witness of the destruction of one of the refugees filled army barracks and the loss of one thousand seven hundred and seventy five lives with it out of a total of 2,345 was told by one of the three survivors who came through a most terrible experience by dint of Good Providence. These three of many survivors who came through with many severe scratches, and cuts, and bruises, and their lives, were Miss Alibreta Johanna aged 46, Francis her brother, age 49, and William Rich Murray a foreigner. Her husband had been killed. The latter said to be an Englishman was much the larger and braver of the three survivors stated here in person, the other two being a quite undersized.

He went to a tent in general Hanson's vivandoe encampments and as he could not speak the Abissinian tongue, very well the story came entirely from Miss Alibreta Johanna. According to the story of this Abissinian Lady most of all the refugees men, women and children were gathered with the soldier guardians and a man number of nuns and Red Cross nurses on the three long floors of the building.

The shell storm fire was raging terribly outside, the crashes of explosions ten per minute in this location alone being stunning and ear-splitting, and the shriek of the shells being deafening like the roar of steam whistles, and they all being terrified by this noise and the tumult of rolling thunder from distant cannons engaged in prayer and supplications. The west wall of the building to the two remaining explosions and they were driven from that section of the building to the parts still standing, a fierce fire breaking out and threatening to engulf the whole building, and then with it. Many proposed to escape by climbing to the roof of the part remaining, but it could not be risked, as solid shot, sprang sharpshooters, a high explosive and bombshells was flying past as thick as hail with a roar of a high sailing cyclone. Finally along about nine o'clock, in the morning, she was not fully sure as to the time by the hour, the remainder of the building went to pieces before an increase of the shell fire and the whole pile of wreckage soon burst into a roaring mass of flames.

What became of all the rest of the survivors no one could positively tell.
Miss John Johanna only knew that she got out of the blazing wreckage somehow and ran across the company street being missed by the part of some roof of something of the sort that was flying with great velocity having been hurled by a terrific explosion a hundred yards away. Her brother broke through a part of the blazing wreckage also, and got out but was scratched by flying debris hurled by the same blast. He dodged the exploding shells for some time and finally found his way into a deep narrow ravine and clung to its side, and soon found that his sister and the King's Englishman were in the same place cursing the Glandolinian roundly and wishing for the chance to tell so then something right to their faces.

Prior to that they had been separate but a strange fate attracted them to the same ravine. This ravine it developed later was nothing but an enormous shell or mine crater.

There they remained all day. So frequently did the shells explode near by that both men were about to give up and cried out that a shell might land on them. But none hit the shell hole. When night came and the battle ceased and they came out of their shelter they found they were alone on a open plain close to the rear of the Christian lines.

After hard tramping through the deep snow, and almost frozen they finally returned into the heart of the encampments and started southward, not knowing what a reaction to take. They finally came to a barracks building something like a mile or so from the place where their own shelter had been but so recently located. There they found some shelter to warm themselves, but were unable to receive anything to eat because there was nothing in the building. So they came on toward general Vivian and faint they soon reached a barracks that had gone through the artillery storm but was partly demolished, and at the rear of which there was another. There they remained during the night and in the morning they again started out reaching shelter during the day. The two men were taken to the Base Hospital for treatment.

It could have been the probable local aspect that during the day before the awful battle broke out general Vivian's Christian columns had been cutting up strange antics as didoes and seemed to move every which way. This as I said was the day before and general Liner Mylles was then in his strong position at North Bend while the strong Christian forces were going out of the usual way to strike him a telling blow in the rear and force him out of his strongly fortified positions. On the following morning the movements of the Christians under the main commanders increased and during the day there were some terrific stormy interviews between them and some sections of the enemy's forces for miles and miles were steadily concentrating upon Liner Mylles' positions and then came the hard driving assault.

As could be stated the waves of assaulting Christian forces were steadily pushing forward in immense lines striking the Glandelinian armies with mighty force and for a time bursting them and driving them back from the works in the greatest panic and confusion. The main Christian forces at this time were also like angry breakers breaking themselves to pieces on the breakwaters.

At times they met counter charges that shattered them, or a rebel fire too severe to be withstood, the foremost of the waves of Christian attackers would slowly recede leaving the snow covered ground, strewn as thick as grass with their fallen comrades, and then recovering fresh columns and pushed on by the others behind and gathering force anew they could be seen to sweep forward with irresistible fury passing clear over the enemy's lines, leaping over the snow forts and breastworks like overwhelming surges and forcing their way through an inferno of cannon and machine fire into the very rebel encampments.

Early in the morning along one part of the battle line in the Melrose woods where Manley's forces came up the Christian forces under Greatheart, though surprised in the rear as mentioned in the first chapter of the battle, were forcing their way through despite the desperate and most tenacious resistance of the Anglians. Rebels and some of their foremost columns were leaping at times over the enemy's lines of snow forts and breastworks also, making it impossible for the Glandelinian artillery men to operate their machine guns upon the attackers from the woods as the force out of the rebels were almost in possession of them. Their guns were therefore withdrawn to a better position and operated between one of the Glandelinian camps and on the double tracks of the railroad line. A little later the attackers reached this point but met such a terrific fire that they almost as to say undermined the tracks and the grounds of the camps with their dead and wounded.

One column of Glandelinians which defended a gallery of works were cleared out after the Christian forces fought in that inferno for three hours. These however were not the main part of the rebel works and were not as strongly defended or even fortified as the main positions. The main Glandelinian works proper at their outer limits extending far beyond Delight's Junction were but at that time disturbed by the attackers although the heavy artillery fire of general Vivian's batteries at times poured so many bombs upon the rebel commanders and so near the rebel encampments and the rebel batteries on the right that for a time it appeared as if the shell barrage would dig up the whole region and leaving nothing there. The scene of the battle was magnificent, grand. The movements of the fiercely attacking Christian forces were a sight extremely beautiful and fearful though awe inspiring to behold. Notwithstanding the deafening uproar of so many parks of big cannons, screaming tempest of bullets, and earthshaking explosions and the ear-splitting shrieks of exploding shells, scores of thousands of non-combatants from the rear by some in the rear went near the scene to behold the maddened battle, and every one was kept extremely busy dodging eruptions of death of every kind and immense showers of heavy hardened snow.

Down near Kindermans formidable rifle pits during the early morning when the battle was not raging so heavily there seemed no apparent necessity of the curious non-combatants for placing themselves into shelter of the rifle pits to make this trip to view the mad squabble and indeed many of these reckless people went out into the open to their sorrow.

Even thousands of well and warily dressed men and women, and even bold curious children, boys and girls disembarked from the very sleighs and made their way toward the scene and picked their way through the deep snow to get into midway and to pass along to places where a good and apparently safe view of the battle could be had. For an hour they succeeded in keeping in apparent safe places, but using trees, rocks, and snowbanks for shelter but all these soon counted for naught, trees were soon ripped into fragments, or thrown down about them by exploding shells, great eruptions occurred by the score, the air was shaken by terrific crashes louder than the worst of thunder, the atmosphere became smoke screened, big fires broke out, and enormous showers of everything fell about them and the curious were forced to run every which way for dear life, some abandoned themselves to the inevitable and went around seeing the battle at some peril only caring not for the earthshaking eruptions of ground and billiards of snow clogs hurled by great shell explosions nor worrying about the shrieking bullets or falling trees and flying clouds of rock splinters. Some people with abundant nerve even children appeared as near to the scene as possible and of course they were right in the midst of the excitement from the start within their very view the big waves of Christian attackers rolled on through the woods and over the plains, crossed the snow covered fields like waves of yelling fiends and pressed the foe far from behind his works.

These columns fighting desperately were backed up into the other works and the supply of troops being ever on the increase there was as yet no opportunity for the hard pressed rebel troops to drive the Nationals out. It can be probably said that the beautiful region of Delight's Junction had been the scene of one of the fiercest battles and greatest catastrophes in the history of any war. The story of this great battle, as it should be will never be told as it really raged.

Words in any number, or explanations, or expressions, are too weak too few to fully express the shocking horror the awful fury of the battle itself, to even paint pictures of the scene of devastation, wreck and ruin, misery, suffering and grief and exposure to the extreme cold of winter while lying wounded in the snow on the battlefields. Even those who went through the hottest of the battle and miraculously escaped after terrible experiences, who were spared to learn their best friends and military property had been swept away, spared to witness scenes as horrible as the eye of God ever could have borne to look upon, only He alone could tell the story.

There were countless stories of the most horrible deaths, countless stories of individual heroisms, stories of wonderful rescues and strange escapes each of which at another time would be a marvel in itself and would and should command the full interest of the world. But in a time like this when a battle so intense in its fury, so prolonged in its dreadful work of unaccountable artillery destruction, so wide and so so extensive and so infinitely terrible in its consequences has swept away an army an entire army and neighboring encampments for many miles on either side, the human mind cannot comprehend all of the horrid horror, can not learn or know all of the dreadful particulars.

One would stand speechless, and powerless to relate even that which he has felt and known. Gifted writers have told of many battles, where countless hundreds of lives were at stake in one day and even lost. All the horrors of the biggest storms at sea and on land were also written, earthquake disasters also but all these take pale into the utmost insignificance when compared with the task of telling of a insane battle which threatened the lives of perhaps sixty million of soldiers, sent to their deaths perhaps twenty five millions of soldiers, and left more than a score of million wounded, countless numbers shelterless and destitute and still countless others to cope with grave and serious responsibilities to relieve the stricken to grapple with and to prevent the reign of rebel vandals, to clear the snow laden ground of frozen bodies, to perform tasks that try men's souls and sicken their hearts, and even ruin what nature had made. The battle in any story at sea is terrible but there are no such dreadful consequences as those which have followed a big battle on land. And it is the soldiers who pass through the terrors of the battle who faced death for many hours, soldiers ruined in private as well as military military property and benefit of friends and relatives who took up the herculean and well nigh impossible task of bringing order out of chaos of caring for the sea of survivors and getting the vast army of dead away before they made life most impossible there.

The terrible counter charge of the enemy came not without warning but the danger which threatened was not exactly realized, not even when the attack of the Christian forces were being repulsed, torn and roughly handled by the Christian attack the enemy was terribly and wildly angry.

By eleven o'clock in the forenoon their counter attack supported by general Manley's divisions of good soldiers and Glandelinians had grown in fury while the enemy artillery replied to gaudy grand drum, brass fire and the wrecking of all his barracks began. The assaulting Glandelinian columns driving all before them pushed their way into general Greatheart's camps.

of troops in the woods fighting the enemy besides mine. We had been confident that our lines could withstand any a glacialian charge, if not for that we would probably have moved forward to the right of the woods instead of through them. We all managed to rally the foremost rather than to gather but all at once the enemy charged with redoubled energy and in an hour my divisions were swept out of the woods and the glacialian soldiers came at us like a yelling army of demons and the retreating troops all made a break for Baldwin's encampments but reached it a moment just before the exultant glacialian troops surged up. The columns of both sides fought their part way to the front and had almost succeeded in rallying a portion of my troops when driven into terrible confusion my right grand division fell back clearout of the camp. A shell exploded close to me and I was hit on the right side of the head with something and it knocked me off my saddle and into a snow bank head first.

I was partly stunned and I do not remember how long I remained in the snow but two soldiers lifted me up and not being wounded I remounted my horse and rode back to my troops who were still resisting the enemy. I was surprised and gladdened to see on observation that appeared to be reinforcements approaching to my left and more on my right.

I rode to the line of troops that were still in the greatest confusion. Their columns were completely broken to pieces and despite all my efforts and the efforts of my officers we could not rally them part way no one surge of the rebels with their banners flying defiantly before us was within four or five hundred feet of them. There was not a cheerful prospect in sight. I rode forward and managed with wits to withdraw these confused soldiers to a stronger position of the camp but with reinforcements coming up at this point also the rebels did not press on any further that I could see but increased the vigor of their rifle fire to a perfect tempest of shrapnel.

The divisions of all of us generals must have been driven back at the same time, but I cannot tell why they did not fail to rally unless it is that when my forces broke I was into confusion first we were like a long wall loosened from a floor and with like from a lurch we were like being thrown through the crevice and held down by the floor the floor being the enemy. At the right moment however the large column of reinforcements was there on the spot and I do not think the enemy held long against their onset.

It was a wonder I did not get killed when I lead in the counter attack as I just exposed myself to a fire that sent me of my full column flat on the ground and I was dead and wounded.

But to go back to my story of my experience after the battle. I viewed the scene by a partly walking and climbing from one lot of debris to another. On company street was a pile of tops and sides of barracks and the way they lay it was evident that explosions of an enemy shells kept the air full of flying boards and other debris. I think I gained about a block and a half on the debris in this manner and tiring of facing the intense cold so long got into the shelter of a barracks still standing but before a gale then blowing the upper parts of the wreckage was fast going down and I was afraid of getting buried.

Just then the part that I was standing on started to give way and in slipping with it I fearfully struck my head and shoulders or struck my head and shoulders in an old narrow cedar chest that was on some of the debris above me. I could hardly get it off but that is what saved my head from being injured by falling debris. When I decided on returning to my own snow encampments I found I was twenty five miles from where I started. Two slight accidents my head was bruised and hands and legs out a little which I did not find out until I returned and that I could not get my hat on I managed however to save what clothing I found in the ruins, a pair of uniforms a few shirts, one pair of shoes and two suits of heavy underwear, and a one hundred dollar bill. A soon as it was light enough the next morning I went to explore the worse ruins of Baldwin's encampments and not even the sign of a barracks building for nearly two miles where before there had been a large city of barracks. Then went to pay a visit to the wounded general - Alvi - for - had heard he was in a very bad fix a caber having injured his face. After the visit I saw saw soldiers and glacialian prisoners bringing in the corpses, they brought them in by the sleigh load of about a hundred at a time, laid them in rows to be buried in long trench graves or loaded them on big barges to be taken down the river.

They were even starting to bury them wherever they were found and many were even ordered to be burned. Soldiers and prisoners under their guards were starting to remove the debris and also burning it and when they came to a corpse it is just thrown on the huge bonfire.

It is the most awful disaster of the kind that has ever happened in our own history. Hundreds of our best officers have gone down into dead and thousands into wounded and but hardly a squad of men had been left to their hundreds of regiments. Yet it seemed they were all cool to the very last. General Delight had been killed right before my very eyes. It seemed that the whole disaster fell upon us in an instant.

If I had not been hit on the head by something hurled by the exploding shell I might have been able to prevent the disaster. It seemed all the way through that my own divisions were to go to pieces and I was to be unable to prevent it. The last few minutes of the battle was a most terrible time and all the refugees were wild with fright. To encourage them to better efforts I kept telling my surviving officers that we must win to make our cause safe and about the last words one of my officers said before he fell were "That God would help us win in the long run". Despite the awful panic and confusion every one of the officers were perfectly cool and so was general Delight before he fell and when my whole force was in the most tremendous tremendous confusion I cannot begin to tell you dear little girls what an awful suspense that was for us, our columns in panic and the enemy rushing on victoriously and we unable to rally the demoralized army.

But it seemed when the main crash came it was all over in an hour. I'm fully satisfied the enemy did not progress any further that our brave officers did not fear death in the least and I do not believe any of them suffered long. If I do not find what I am looking for I will have to give it up I think, but we can do them no good now. I am getting along alright now since the excitement but for full two or three days the full result of the battle was a problem. Perrods companion and friend called "Ty a battlesome, lost his sister," and all his boy scouts and his general in the battle and I am taking him to my own.

Your friend and servant
General Meldonia Greathart, .....

The work of all the Abbiennian news paper concerns in the fictional history of the ever memorable battle of Delight's junction that wrecked a whole christian army and demolished twenty five miles of massive army barracks was considering all the surroundings a most wonderful achievement and one that would always be regarded by the members of every press throughout the land and the whole Abbiennian nation as of most extraordinary merit--the one thing that was equal to the occasion for the country's holy cause, worthy of the opportunity of the occasion.

Without the success of the news throughout the nation was due to the curious dual character of the main news concern at Port do Dorothy pale city and also Angelina Agathia and Pandora. The resources of these news offices not in the sweep of the war terrific devastation were available. It was the feeling of the many daring war correspondents though much extremely good work was done that they had not been equal to the task on account of the cold for it was as the Angelina Agathia news said at the headlines: "GOLDEN'S BEYOND DESCRIPTION".

The gaps through the special war correspondents was most faithfully and competent competently written-- was filled by all papers in issues about heroic deeds during the battle that will be famous. I will quote one of the written stories thus:

"And all during the terrible battle acts of the greatest heroism were performed throughout all the battling armies of both sides. Not a single news in the whole nation could recommend to highly the work done by the armies of volunteer soldiers since the battle of Delight's junction Feb. fourteenth. The great war catastrophe near a d around Delight's junction and through which the armies were passing at same place had brought out the fact more strongly than it had perhaps ever been demonstrated in any community community that there is more good in any man than evil.

It would be and is perfectly safe to say that fully half or perhaps two thirds of the lives lost at the battle of Delight's junction were lost in the determination to save those lying wounded on the snow covered ground. Strong willed soldiers and officers refused to flee from their work and leave the helpless wounded behind to perish. Scores of thousands of soldiers despite the destructive rebel munitions fire and eruptions of exploding shells rescued as many of their wounded comrades as they could. Hundreds of them every hour went to their deaths.

Yet they had made up their minds to save their comrades in the face of shell fire or perish with them, and alas in many or nearly all cases it was perish with them. As soon as the besiegers realized the awful herculean task before them in burying their vast sea of dead it was hardly necessary to impress Angelinian soldiers into the service.

During the trying period following the disastrous battle nearly every one of the surviving soldiers and non combatants who were able to do a good days work had been at work and also forced glacialian prisoners to aid. It was impossible to see an able bodied soldier or man non combatant loafing about the company streets. Many of the able bodied children volunteered their services as long as they could stand the awful cold.

Everyone was looking forward to the day when the rebuilding of the encampments would be well on the way. The work of cleaning the encampments of wreckage, unhealthful refuse and disposing of the dead had been almost completed by now and all the available labor in the besieging armies was being applied to the rebuilding of the encampments. Most of the soldiers were at work in earnest and everything was done to push forward the work of reconstruction.

Arrangement had been made to compell all Glandelinian prisoners forced to work at the point of the bayonet to do all that was possible at rebuilding. It was hoped that in a month's time that a new city of encampments would rise on the shell of ruins. Clothing and uniforms had been coming in by the trainloads every day, but still there were soldiers in palidwines camps who had hardly enough to cover their half nakedness. There were thousands of non-combatants with also thousands of child refugees who had not enough clothes to go out on the company streets on account of the stormy weather and cold waves and the like.

As cold as it was a tumultuous uproar of the hammer and other tools was heard everywhere. All Glandelinian prisoners, and army carpenters were patching and strengthening partly damaged barracks which in the better spirit that prevailed the besiegers now hoped to save. It was now possible for teams drawing long army sleighs to travel the company streets in the outskirts of the camps into the interior. As he there were many places where passage through the debris had been cleared only enough for a thin line of infantry or cavalry to pass throughout the condition was improving hourly.

Packing along one company street and looking up and down the company streets a visitor could have seen hundreds of big army sleighs loaded high with the fragments of ruined barracks and all kinds of building material that was to be used over again. Also as quickly as the refuse was taken up it was hauled to vacant space vacant spaces cleared of snow and loaded to the many big bonfires which burned continuously before lines upon a line of sentries.

All the encampments were going through a kind of purification by fire. Nearly eight days had passed without more snow falling after the battle, and there was a single barracks surviving in the city of encampments that had a sound roof.

The incessant creation and hasty burial of the sea of dead soldiers and the clearing of the company streets during the severe cold weather had taxed both the Angelinian soldiers and the almost starving Glandelinian prisoners. So cold had been the weather that there had not yet been any attention been given to the roofs, much repairs as had been made to barracks buildings had been only in the form of straghtening and strengthening them so that they might not fall down.

Many barracks which were still standing were leaning over like the Tower of Pisa or were partly off their foundations. When the snow poured down during another blizzard it entered these half shattered barracks still called habitable and covered and almost ruined the contents again. The faces of the surviving soldiers showed the influence of the snowstorm. They were overspread with sadness and discouragement. They were now losing hopefulness and the joy and encouragement which had been light in their features were now gone. But it was only one day of depression when the snowstorm for that was all it proved to be passed with somewhat warmer weather, when the sun came out.

All the army went to work with renewed energy and even worked their prisoners with greater vigor. Many large army sleighs made their appearance and drawn by horses were operated over several company streets.

At all points there was great activity. The strengthening of the batteries recommenced with energy. Creation and cleaning steadily went on. The finding and burning of one thousand bodies in a day showed that the end of this sad duty was not yet in sight. In the southern and southwestern parts of the city of encampments the great windows of wreckage still remained concealing from sight with the aid of deep snow what was underneath.

An order from general Vivian directed against idle Glandelinian prisoners went into operation on the eighteenth. Many Glandelinian prisoners had been working, some of them even of their own free will, the others by impressment—ever since the disaster. But it came to the knowledge of his generals and military property officials that a large number of Glandelinian prisoners were pretending to have different kinds of sickness and in these grounds were refusing to do any kind of work. These prisoners had been standing about the hallways of prison barracks all day long doing nothing. Some when asked questions as why their comrades were come compelled to work received answer by the Angelinians:

"Your comrades under your commanders have caused this havoc and it is more than right and just that we in return make you work for nothing in order to repair the damage your comrades have done in the battle."

Finally as this had continued for several days and probably more than that, general Vivian had this order through the efforts of his officers put up where every one could see and read,;

"WARNING TO IDLE PRISONERS."

In view of the fact that a large number of said prisoners are remaining within barracks and refusing to work it has been decided by the army Tribunal to establish a camp in which these prisoners will be confined out in the open and kept on the smallest diet and kept out of the way of those who are performing the herculean task of cleaning this city of encampments and disposing of the dead. Warning is hereby given that all these Glandelinian idlers will be required by strict demand to join fellow prisoners at work, and if really ill to report to an expert doctor who alone will say whether they can stay at their prison barracks or remain in camp, and also as ye rebels have caused this destruction it is the ir duty to repair said damage thus inflicted--

General Vivian."

On the eighth day after the disastrous battle and artillery duel at Delights junction this message came from the stricken encampments;

"Millions of tents have come and with immense loads of board floors and fences separating now make a white and purple city of camps where the many barracks were so quickly swept away. They will be much safer and healthier than many of the shattered barracks which are yet occupied by the refugee non-combatants. There have been until now some wounded soldiers finding shelter in the big army cisterns which shell explosions had blown off their foundations and left lying about the company streets. Others are said to be in barracks without roofs, windows and still others are in barracks the walls of which are far from perpendicular."

It could be of much interest that while the great battle reduced the strength of the christian forces engaged to a great extent other portions of the christian line was strengthened about as much. One of the Angelinian generals said;

"We have the grandest and biggest armies here besieging Vivian Woke. Why our main armies instead of being reduced by our losses was strengthened twice as much than it was before. We had then facing Manley's armies about twenty of about twenty nine divisions of 10,000,000 men each. We have now forty divisions the biggest army the world itself could boast of having. And who was talking about general Vivian giving up? He was and is bound to prevent Manley from reinforcing his father and preventing them from advancing to the succor of Vivian Woke. The authorities has one million men at work on the repairs. I stared eternity in the face during the battle and was ready to give in to day. But now I have more energy and ambition than I ever had."

It was the beginning of the second week after the disaster following the battle of Delight's junction that the fragments of Baldwin's army in general recovered from its paralysis and general Jack Ambrose Evans took the entire superintendence of the city of encampments for the preservation of order under his own personal charge. One of the war correspondents said in a calm survey of the wonders wrought after the devastating effects of the battle;

"No history of the world ever yet contained any record that we remember or know of of such a spontaneous and general uprising of a whole nation like Abbocanna in a work of aid sympathy and charity as that which immediately followed the stirring news of the grievous and most appalling disaster following the battle. In less than twenty four hours after the commencement of the battle—long before the conflict rations following the battle had ended—the whole country shocked and exulted by the great and awful calamity at Baldwin's camps was alive with movements for his relief. Troops and money without limit and food and clothing and materials without limit also were promptly offered and sent, first by all the towns and cities not in possession of the foe in the immediate region round about, and soon afterwards by every town and city and community, indeed every individual and corporation throughout the land not in possession of the traitors' insurgents."

Incessant words of inquiry and sympathy and cheer were telegraphed to the Delight's junction authorities and to all the well known generals from all directions by men who were anxious to help all portions of the edge in the terrible hour of need. Gifts and village governments appropriated millions and tens of millions from their treasures for the relief of the Delight's junction sufferers. All kinds of societies and corporations contributed and forwarded unusual contributions.

hospitals, military ward dispensaries and many other medical relief stations. Most of these wounds, were slight and not dangerous. It would have become so if not properly dressed and treated. The bulk of the work of caring for the sick and injured was confined to the dressing of small wounds received during the battle and minor surgical operations, despite the exposure there were very few cases of sickness, other than wounded, in fact sickness not resulting from wounds was very scarce and if anything below the normal. Soldiers with slight wounds went to the many different medical relief stations and had them dressed and went away and did not come back until the wounds needed redressing. ....

The destruction of Baldwin's encampments was sudden and all within one half a day, starting with the distant disaster at Greatharts camp as already described. The rebel column had struck like a mighty tidal wave, the shock had caused near total destruction.

Not even the disastrous defeat and decimation of his division, or the loss of so many of his artillery men and officers and provisions and camps or even his uniform now torn in rags and tatters could make general Greatheart seem unduly tinged or even insignificant. He was the same as usual but appeared more haughty and unusually dignified. Even his dark eyes seemed more wonderful than ever before in their remote thoughtfulness and interest as he spoke had a kind of flash.

"Go on comrade," he said. "It is splendid to hear. I will prove it and it is very curious too. The Emperor had thought out the plans well, and yet we did not succeed. You my lad are a born soldier. And your companion the Rattlesnake boy is a good lad too."

"There is not a boy that is more game than he is," snored said. "And I am not any braver than he is. All of his boys are game, but with him it is very much different. He always feels sure that he will really never get to do what he most desires, but he feels that to day during the fight the almost unexpected almost happened and he said also that I might have his permission to show you a great map he made. I'll request you to look at it."

He handed the clean copy of the Rattlesnake map to general Greatheart and all of the generals crowded closely together to look at it. All sections of Ivian Wickey was placed properly and also marked with certain and strange signs. In particular they were to show at what important points the Rattlesnake boy—if he had grown up, and become a general would have attacked the Thumbelina fortress near Murt ha yorde. As Penrod pointed them out for the general he explained the plans of the Rattlesnake boy and the reasons. The generals looked over the maps for some minutes. Every one of them fixed their eyes on it curiously and general Greatheart's black brows suddenly drew themselves together.

"This is indeed a very wonderful map," he said with conviction, and the others nodded their approval. "The Rattlesnake is perfectly right. The smallest attacking force might have succeeded in forcing their way in there, and for this reason that he stated on the map, now in the world did he learn to do all this? It seems very unusual for a boy of his age."

"He has learned it through the help and explanation of his own general, and now he thinks of nothing else," snored Penrod. "General Maurice Costello is his general and he has made excellent play plans for battles. He is not like his company of boy followers brave as they are, his main commander is always busy being well educated in the military service, and when the general is not busy he likes to talk about Ivian Wickey. The Rattlesnake always ask him important questions then and leads his general on in a good conversation until he finds out a good deal of information about the strong enemy at Ivian Wickey. Then at his general's permission he looks carefully over the Geographies, and goes as close to the enemy's lines as he dares, hides himself in dark places and listens to what the Thundelinton officers are saying. He says that sometimes he would like awake all the full night thinking out the things that he studied in the Geographies, and he even thinks about it all day. That's why he succeeded in forming his excellency company. He is a general in some ways despite his age."

General Greatheart and all his generals being intensely interested continued to examine the map of the city of Ivian Wickey and elsewhere. Then he said to Penrod while he folded it up and handed it back to him:

"All the Rattlesnake Morrell, that I and my officers studied his magnificent map well and carefully, and that he should be proud of it. And if it please you my comrade, you may also tell him he is right, and my word is backed by all my generals. Our strongest armies would be holding Ivian Wickey now and also all the fortifications if he had led the assault on the gormman section of fortress Thumbelina."

These words of the great generals made Penrod feel so exultant, that he could not hardly control himself.

"I certainly felt sure that you would say the Rattlesnake was right about his plan, and now that is the main reason that makes me desire to tell you the rest," Penrod said hurriedly. "And if you feel sure he is right about the other two—Penrod stopped suddenly, and in an awkward manner because he suddenly had a wild thought. "I'm not sure of your Excellency what you may think about it." He stammered. "Perhaps it will really seem to you as if the game we planned in very very risky." In spite of his strange hesitant hesitation, the boy scout was so fervently and full of emotion, that general Greatheart and the other generals began to watch him with great sympathetic love and respect, as he always did when the boy scout was making efforts to express some strange thing he was not positively sure of. And one of the greatest bonds between general Greatheart and the boy scout colonel was that the general was always intensely interested in the strong mental process of Penrod, especially in the way which his innermost thoughts led him to an conclusive subject.

"Go on with your story," the general again said to him. "I fell like the Rattlesnake myself to day after my defeat, and also I feel as if I am like you. Luck has not been with me to day. The battle has been like some game with some one cheating on one side. It has not seemed like a fair game to me so far."

Greatheart then sat at the table with his generals and Penrod in his boyish eagerness drew nearer, and then leaned against it, resting his arms on it, and lowering his voice, though for good reasons it was always their habit to speak at such a low whisper that no one, should he be hiding in the room and under the table or elsewhere could not understand what they said.

"If it is the plan of the Rattlesnake to give the signal for a tremedous uprising against Ivian Wickey and her Garrison," he said. At this general Greatheart made a sudden slight movement.

"Does he think the government Air Authorities at porothy gate and Angelina Agathia will be able to gather such an enormous army for such a purpose in so short a time?" he asked.

"He says that is what they must have been preparing for all these months since this way started. And you know it must come very soon, and the other christian nations, will see to it that the supports of Ivian Wickey must be opened to navigation. Navigation even if they have to open it themselves. And if the beautiful Ivian girl princesses are found— but when the Rattlesnake secured the news he saw to his and disappointment, that there was nothing in it, about which camp they were really in. However as he believed it may have been only a sort of false news or rumor. Nobody in the whole camp seemed to know anything about them. He stopped for a few minutes, but he checked himself on time, and did not utter the words which at that time were in his mind. He did not forget himself and say 'but general, I finally believe you know where they are.'"

"And you say that evidently the Rattlesnake has a plan for giving the signal when the armies should strike the fatal blow against Ivian Wickey." "Yes."

At this Penrod forgot his first intense feeling of hesitation. Even he began to see the peculiar plan just as he had observed visions of it, when the Rattlesnake boy scout spoke of it. And the Rattlesnake had talked of it, he made a clearer description and a finer picture than even the Rattlesnake had made of the two vagabond or bagger children—one of them disguising as a crippled girl making their way from one part of the Thundelinton camp to another, quite free quite free to secure information, and also to carry important messages in a messages or warnings to the sections of the christian armies in danger because they would make themselves appear so insignificant and forlorn and poor that no one, not even the smartest among the Thundelintons could ever think of them as ordinary boy scouts, and would only believe them to be two lost or runaway strays of waifs belonging to no one, not even a child slave master, and probably strayed about here and there by the misfortunes of poverty war and so on. Penrod felt as if he wished to convince general Greatheart and his staff that the plan was more possible than it ever seemed. He also felt terribly anxious to win the approval of the scene, though he did not know why—for it was more than real, and Penrod felt sure it actually could be done without fail and disaster, and this feeling inspired him to to enter into new and more grand ideas, details, and to also suggest other possibilities.

the disasterous defeat and decimation of his division, or the of his soldiers and officers. And provisions and camps or even

"You know your Excellency a little girl who seems to be a cripple, and one who tries to be a good singer, and to pretend to be a beggar, could go and edge his way in anywhere." "I said," "I'm sure singers or children or soldiers or any one would listen to children singing, no matter what side he or she is for on providing he can sing good tuneful songs, and they might not have suspicion And be afraid to speak before him. Any how any strolling singer accompanied by a little crippled girl, would surely hear and find out an abundance of information, which might be very useful for the Abbeismian girls to know. They might even hear or discover the most important things in the enemy's lines. Don't you think so general?"

However before Penrod had gone very far with his story of the plan a strange far away look had fallen upon general Greathheart's face, the same look Penrod had noticed so often before. Greathheart as he sat among the other generals was turned a little sideways from Penrod, the general resting his two elbows on the table, with his chin between his hands. He was constantly looking down at the bare floor, and he remained in this position as he carefully listened to the end.

It may have been evident that some newer and stranger thoughts were quickly passing in his mind, as Penrod went on talking of the scene or scene, and enlarging on the full detail of the rattlesnake boy's plan. The general did not even make the slightest movement, look up or change his position as he answered: "Yes dear Comrade, I believe so. I think it can be possible."

Penrod felt his courage rapidly increasing. He had at first felt the fear that the parts of the scenes he was relating, might seem to be so bold and rash, or reckless like the plans of a daredevil, that general Greathheart would not approve of it, but this discouragement faded away, because of the look in the general's face. And the great general had declared that the first plans or the first part of them according to the rattlesnake boys' imaginations had not seemed quite as dangerous to him if done in the proper manner. And even now the general was listening in a manner, as if the details were less than mere fancies and not at all exaggerated. The general believed that the plans would be difficult to carry out, but was not wild or impossible.

And though Penrod was a Canadian, he nevertheless knew enough of all parts of the very Galverinian and Angelinian countries, and methods of making journeys as to help him to give as much reality to his plans as to enter into all their details.

"I for one could pretend that I can speak or understand, French, Spanish, or English," the boy scout said. "You know it may go well that way, because the rattlesnake does not understand anything but his own language. I then for the best part, should pretend to know only an English. I know all portions of each section of the Galverinian, and also the great city of the Whirtherian fortifications, and other places we should want to go to. I know how all the Galverinian boy scouts live and do, and so we should not do anything that would make them suspicious of us. Also we must also be careful we don't cause any strangers to notice us. And if the Galverinians should ask us questions, I would make them believe that the rattlesnake is my helpless sister, and we have made our minds up to travel alone to find our way home, and also that most charitable people, gave more money to a ragged boy who sang for his sister, who is a cripple." "Yes I know but it is hard to hoodwink the Galverinians," said general Greathheart. "And if you find a merciful one among them, I'll give you my command. I knew a boy scout once, who it was reported went into the enemy's lines to pretend to play the guitar, but somehow the Galverinians knew their purpose and put an end to their existence, in a way I do not care to say. And what I say is true."

Penrod at this suddenly suddenly leaped further forward across the table so that he could get closer to him. These words that the general said did not at all shock his courage.....

His courage only leaped up like a flame. If the general had wished, to stop him, he would have done it with one quick sharp glance, even without speaking a single word. But for some unusual reason he did not wish to make the boy cease talking. The general and his staff was more than willing to hear what the boy scout could tell— they were even as interested as listening to an important story. Penrod when he first entered the Angelinian armies, did not think himself to be worth enough to enter the national guard, or worthy to help Abbeismia in any small or big way, even with boyish fancies which might contain a suggestion of some thought which older and much wiser persons might deem to make good use of. And Penrod wondered exceedingly whether general Greathheart listened to the plan, because it was interesting, or because the plan made like a desperate game, but not impossible, and if two boys could be found who would be trusted to the work, the boy caught a deep breath as he went on, drawing still nearer, and speaking even so low that his tone was almost a whisper. "If the members of the Great Gemini society have been working and thinking out their own plans for so many months, for the cause of Abbeismia, they have prepared everything for the final blow. I'm sure that their main Supreme Persons know that probably by this time what must be done by their messengers who are to give the final signal. They can direct them what places to go and how to know the Secret Members who must be informed. If the plans could be properly made out, and sent to some of the Supreme Persons, who has seen all things in the Galverinian and remembered them." The boy scout had started to breathe so rapidly that he was compelled to stop for a full minute. General Greathheart suddenly looked up. He looked directly in Penrod's eyes.....

"You mean to say one of the Supreme Persons who has been trained to remember the in's and out's of the Whirtherian fortifications?" "Yes," he said. "Yes sir, some of the Supreme Persons who has had the training." continued Penrod recovering his breathe again. "Some one among the Supreme Persons of the Gemini who had learned all, and who will not forget all that he has been trained for, who would never, never forget. Even if the messenger were only a twelve year old boy even if it was only a ten year old girl scout as long as they could carry the important message...."

General Greathheart then put his hand on Penrod's shoulder. "My dear Comrade," he said slowly and with emotion. "Your speech sounds mighty suspicious. I believe you are speaking as if you wanted to go on that mission yourself. Is that so Penrod?" "Yes," the boy looked bravely at general Greathheart's face and into his eyes but just now did not say a single word. His look however meant his answer.

"No you you Penrod really know what it means to do that," the general continued. "Do you know the nature of the Galverinians, and their frightful ways? Do you know that even if successful in the plan it would be a very dangerous adventure? Are you not thinking of this? And have you not thought within yourself how it would be, if clever disguise readers among the Galverian guards would betray you, and your companion, and you were sentenced by the Galverinian Tribunal to be put to death as others were?" "Yes," At this Penrod suddenly stood his straightest, and looked haughty as if he owned the world itself. He appeared as if he was even then within the rebel lines.

"If I were put to death, I would be put to death for Abbeismia and her cause," he said proudly. "But the Galverinians will never capture me or the rattlesnake alive."

After Penrod had finished the general said almost proudly: "It is needless to say comrade that I am overjoyed to see a boy scout and his friend the rattlesnake so game. I am especially glad because I wish to explain something to you. I was not justified in myself for forgetting to tell you my appreciation for the way you so bravely behaved to day in the fight at Pelight Junction near south end. I realize it was on account of the cowardly conduct of general James Parkington, an English signal officer that the disaster to my army occurred, and so many of my best officers had been killed. Count De Biff reports shows that just for that reason the attacking forces besides my own had been severely and most disgracefully whipped, and when I learned what a tremendous slaughter had occurred all along the line, and of the dreadful loss of the very division under my own command, and which I find upon inquiry was caused mainly by the cowardice of that English Foreigner, and from no other reason--- I say I was so completely disheartened, and heart broken that I scarcely knew what I was about. It was the first time during my service in the army that, which an important movement that I had planned out to general Vivian and Emperor, Vivian had failed so disgracefully, and also the first time in my life that I was compelled to order my depleted division to retreat and as I had every good reason to hope for complete success, you can have some idea how I and all my generals feel.

After the battle many facts came to light of which mention was made in general Pitters and Count De Biffe reports and which I was unacquainted until an hour ago. And I find therefore if I leave the prisoner, go unpunished I do a grave injustice to my boyhood chum and friend Emperor, Vivian, to the Vivian girls who love me like a father, and to Abbie and Annie. And if ever a person earned a shoulder strap you did at to day a fight at Gouth Bend or Delight Junction. I have however sent in an application for a strict court of inquiry and have also represented the cause to the Authorities at Ag Angelina Agatha and Dorothy girls. As soon as the Emperor drives to night you will report to him, and he will invest in vestige the case. That foreigner will wish he had not come within our lines. He is liable to be branded for life as a coward or be shot as a coward.

Even as the general was speaking there was a signal from the guard outside, and the Alde-De-Camp opened the door. He was heard evidently speaking to some one but side, and then they heard approaching footsteps, and the Alde-De-Camp stood at attention before general Greathart and looked very solemn as he saluted and said with emotion:

"Your Excellency, there is a boy scout outside the door who wishes to be admitted. He mainly asked to see Colonel Penrod."

"If it is the Rattlesnake leader," said Greathart being him in at once. I myself wish to see him."

In his hurry to see the Rattlesnake boy, Penrod saluted the general and went rapidly down the hall way to the door fronting the general's headquarters. He opened the door and then stood stock still. The rattlesnake boy was there, alright, but at first Penrod thought he was not in his uniform. And Penrod also observed with a queer feeling he did not like, that the boy Marshall was leaning on a pair of hospital crutches, and his head was bandaged, and also Penrod believed that his friend looked very wild and strange. This gave him a feeling like if he had lost his own father. The boy's face was very pale and white, his eyes flared and the usual lines on his bull dog like face seemed twisted in a strange and new way. Penrod was startled and wondered if something had frightened the rattlesnake boy or if he was badly injured or ill.

"Hedcliffe," he began, "general Greathart is expecting"--

"I've come to tell you about my company of boy scouts, and my general." The rattlesnake boy broke in at once without waiting to hear any more, and his voice was more strange than the appearance of his face. "I don't know what made me come--- what made me come--- or why--- why--- why I've come but I--- I--- believed I just desired to. My general is badly wounded and all his staff are dead. My Company of boys and even girls are wiped out, and my sister killed. An explosion during the battle did it while they were signalling to an over a frantic signal late this afternoon."

"Our general, and your Company of girl and boy scouts!" stammered Penrod in dismay. "They're dead!"

"Every one except the general is dead." The Rattlesnake answered in a shaking voice. "The general is also without a command as it was wiped out. Our camp is still burning like a inferno of hades. I feared it would happen though. They were in the path of the advancing Landallians, and one of the Rebels hurled a shower of grape and shell at us followed by others. The general was badly wounded in trying to rally his brigades. He was picked up half buried in snow on the field. I knew he'd be shot one of these days because I cannot understand otherwise. And I told him so. And he told me he knew he would himself. I never saw a daring general survive a battle yet. And I stayed with him until I saw him taken away to the Base hospital, and then I was laid low by a shell. My right leg is almost shattered, the doctor said. I've had a bursting headache ever since I've been close to the battle line, and I feel sicker than a mad-dog---and after my loss I thought suddenly of you."

Just at this moment Penrod made a quick spring to grasp the Rattlesnake boy because it appeared to him that the boy scout was suddenly shaking as if he were going to fall in a swoon. Hewms grabbed the boy scout on time however, and the Aide-De-camp, who had been looking on from behind Penrod suddenly rushed forward as between them the Rattlesnake was kept on his feet.

"I don't believe I will faint now if I control myself," he said in a weak voice. "I felt as if I would though. It was a bad scene, to day's battle, and then to see my sister and the general shot down, and my company of boys wiped out. I was all by myself. The whole division was too panic stricken for any one to come to my assistance, and no one would come. He lying in the Base hospital and I'm afraid he'll die. I have not even a boy or girl follower now."

"Come and see general Greathart," said Penrod. "I'm sure he will be able to tell us what to do. Aide-De-camp please help him up the steps."

But the Rattlesnake boy scout refused to be helped despite his wounded leg. "I believe I can climb up the steps myself," he declared. "Do you see the crutches I now have. I was wounded in the leg while kneeling at my sister's side. My doctor gave them to me."

The Rattlesnake boy tried to speak as carelessly as possible, but nevertheless Penrod could see very plainly that he was shaken horribly and overwrought with grief. His queer bull dog like face was still yellowish white in color and he was trembling like a leaf. Penrod led him into the presence of the general. In the middle of the room in one of his strange and silent attentive attitudes stood general Greathart. He was patient for the boys to come in.

"Your excellency this is my friend called the 'Rattlesnake' Penrod began. The Rattlesnake boy stopped suddenly when half way in the room, resting on his crutches and staring at the tall majestic figure with surprised widened eyes.

"In that general Greathart," said he to Penrod, and then he suddenly added; "He looks like a king don't he?"

It seemed so peculiar for a general to do so. The Rattlesnake boy decided also that after he had eaten his breakfast, and then went out to go to the Base up hospital he should now recover the use of his leg desire to hang about the general's headquarters, just on hoping for the chance of seeing him, and his staff officers ride by sometime as usual. And now having a lost his sister and his entire company of boy scouts once under his command, the Rattlesnake boy did not know what he was going to do it was without doubt that his general, the general is command of one of general Concentina Aronhurga divisions would already be brought to the Base hospital, and if he died he would never see him again, and he did not see any reason what use it would be to wish to see him again. It would not bring him back, and what difference would it be to the enemy if he and his general had ever cared anything for each other. He did not wish to see a gladiolus flag again. And probably on account of his sister's death, he would be like a whipped outcast, when he left the army. He never believe that the enemy could be so brutal and so violent. Perhaps the Rattlesnake boy the enemy could be driven to go about the enemy's territory alone. Could he succeed? He could be about death, since his sister and his boy scouts had been brutally murdered by the enemy, and his best general wounded, for this he decided he would spy on the Inherge Inat instead of mere scouting on them. The general is a side-de-camp was waiting for himself of greenhearts big wara Tabour tent. The Rattlesnake boy scout had back for a moment.

"Perhaps they would rather ask eat their breakfast by themselves." He said in a hesitating voice. "You can see for your self that I'm, not ---I'm not the kind of a boy for general Greenheart's father drink my coffee outside the tent, and carry the rolls and tinsulite away with me. And I ask you to thank him for me for his kindness. I'd want him to know how much I am thankful to him."

The side-camp looked at the boy with a most steady eye. And the brave Ratt lesnauk boy noticed that the side-camp was looking him over, as if he were a king's son.

"You may be the kind he is but you do not know it," He said, "The general sees a lot of good in you, and even so does many others and the Emperor himself and also his daughters and if general Greathart did not see any good in you he would not ask you to sit at his own breakfast. And there are seven beautiful boy scouts who wish to see you, and have an important consultation with you. Therefore you must not back out. You must come with me."

All boy scouts who had known him, or heard of him had indeed seen a lot of good in the pennantsky boy scout, and even millions of the Angelinians had, but the glandelinians had not. Neither the vixian girls, neither Angelinia Armburg, or any other heroines or boy heroes in this story was a were a greater terror to the enemy than Radcliffe Glandelinian officers in charge of scouting parties had said.

'There's that Internal Rattlesnake' when ever they saw him at a distance and his tend of wishing to meet him had turned and moved away as fast as their horses could go. All glandulians had regarded him as all persons in Southern part of the United States regard a Rattle snake about to strike from ambush. The Rattle snake boy about gave forth a sort of grin and wondered what the Aide-in-camp really meant, as he followed him into the tent. The day before he had only been in the buildin building, now he was in the beautiful tent, which was as good as a country air mansion. The Rattle snake boy as he gazed around him saw how rightly met the handsome to sit quarters had been cleaned, and even as swept and matted, how the walls of the chambers had been cleaned, and even decorated with beautiful pictures of children, and how everything in all the rooms were set in such perfect order. The handsome lunch cloth on the table was fresh, handsome in design, and spotless from any spot speck of dust or stain, and the silverware shone with brightness like new material.

people peeped their being in boys attire, the Rattlesnake boy who had often seen them, and been with them in secret, knew who they really were; so at the look a from one of them he did not snipe or courtesy as he at first was intending to do. Only he alone besides Greathair had recognised them. But Penrod did not, though he evidently was very suspicious of them. He did not know they were the yvian girls, but he did not believe they were real boys either, but some beautiful children - or girl scouts in disguise as boys.

General Greathair noticed that the Rattlesnake boy had been on the point of making the gesture, and the expression on the general's face as he moved forward lifted the load of bashfulness and confusion from the Rattlesnake boy's heart.

As the strange men advanced, the strange were happening to him,

He began to feel as if something new and strange were happening to him, as if he was not after all so unlucky as he felt himself to be, that he did not need to be afraid of being in the presence of any important persons, even as if he need not feel so much at ease in the dark, and like a thing there was no place in the world more straight, and strange far seeing look in the generals eyes, and the presence of Penrod, and the seven beautiful boys he knew so well seemed to make a place somewhere for what he looked at. And yet what general would indeed very simple.

so well seemed to me a very simple one. Greathart said, "was indeed very simple." "This is very well comrade," he exclaimed. "You have slept well, and rested, and received your morning bath. I suppose the way you looked at them you know these are ven boys as well well as I do. We will have some food and then we will talk together."

The general pointed in the direction of the bench with a slight gesture indicating that the Rattlesnake should be at the right hand of his own place, and left of the most beautiful boys. Again the Rattlesnake boy showed signs of hesitation. What a swell general he indeed was when he saw the general make that wave of the hand it made the bereaved boy scout captain feel as if he were a great general himself, and that Greathart was honoring him.

the hand it made the others look at him. "I'm nothing but a common boy scout Marshall!" The rattlesnake boy suddenly broke out, and jerked his head abruptly in the direction of the beautiful boys. "They evidently know me more than others do." He ended. "I've never in my life sat at a general's table before."

"It does not matter at all comrade." General Grentheart again made the easy going gesture toward the right hand side of the bench again and smiled in his slow manner.

his slow manner."
"Let us sit down."
The Ratt lennks boy obeyed the general, and ate the best meal he had ever had in his life. It would take too long a list to describe what he ate here, but the Aide-De-camp noted as the waiter. And when he was not serving he stood upright behind the generals back as though he wore no real livery of scarlet and gold.

To the Rattlesnake boy scout who had gnawed only bones or crunched a crust of bread where ever he may have found them, and with no thought but of wishing to relieve or appease his own ravenous hunger, to watch the nine others with whom he sat, eat the same food as he did was indeed a new experience. When he first entered the Angelinian Army he knew nothing of the every day manner of the Angelinian generals and other officers. As they ate in their dignified manner the Rattlesnake boy loved to watch them, and to follow their ways. And he tried to hold his cups and other dishes like the rest did, and to sit and not as the seven beautiful boys were doing, sitting and eating, and moving, taking his bread butter and rolls when they were held at his side by the Aide-de-Camp as if it were a simple thing to be waited upon by a general's aid.

Indeed Penrod himself and the seven beautiful boys with him had everything handed to them all their lives, and when they were waited upon it did not make them feel a bit awkward. The Rattlesnake knew that his own general had never had the time to live in this manner. Even he himself would have been at much better ease with himself if chance or fate had treated him more squarely. And he scowled when he thought of the nature of the enemy and the horrible death his sister and boy scouts met at the battle of Delight Jun T Junction. In a few minutes more while they were still eating general Great Heart began to talk about the map of Yivian Lakey, and her fortifications, sea or land. This made the Rattlesnake boy forget every embarrassed feeling and so he was not ill at ease no more. He did not realize however that for the sake of the beautiful boys (the Yivian girls in disguise) was intending to lead him on to explain all his own theories about the country surrounding the city of Yivian Lakey, and the strength of the base besieged Angelinian army, the rescuing force under Mic-Hollerston Johnston and the Hanleys and others, and the condition of the siege. He told all that he had read in ballads, or overheard during conversational conversations, or even everything he thought about as he lay awake at night in his tent.

He had explained so many things he thought out that even the beautiful boys looked surprised. For his age he had a strangely over-mature and concentrated mind, and he surprised every one with all the military scenes he could think of, and they listened with great curiosity and were amazed beyond what they usually felt. The boy scout Marshall as he called himself proved to be very clever, and also the extraordinary way in which he fixed all his mental powers on one thing surprised them still more. Not even the seven beautiful boy scouts had believed that they would ever know any lad who could reason with everything so clearly, or know so much about Yivian Lakey, clever and shrewd as they were themselves, the Rattlesnake boy scout seemed very unnatural to them. And everything he described was extraordinarily interesting and useful. He related many strange rough and clear plans, describing all that had been or should have been done to bring on the speedy capture of the Mic-Whirlthian fortifications and Yivian Lakey. General Greatheart listened as attentively as the seven beautiful boy scouts and Penrod and the Rattlesnake at once saw the general exchange and rapid and somewhat startled glance with the beautiful boys.

And this was at the very moment when the Rattlesnake boy was sketching with his finger on the real map of Yivian Lakey, an attack on the weakest spot of fortress Thumbelina, which had not been attempted when it should have been done. And Penrod realized at once that the look so quickly exchanged between general Greatheart and the Angelic boys meant—
"The Rattlesnake is perfectly right. If fortress Thumbelina had been attacked at her weakest spot by an overwhelming force there would have been victory for general Yivian Abyssinkillians instead of calamity and defeat."

For the boy scout Marshall it was a very good and wonderful breakfast, and the Rattlesnake realized that he should never forget it. After breakfast was over, and the seven boys were gone, the general told him what he had done for him the night before. He had seen the great Abhinnian Emperor and so everything had been done which the military authorities provide in case of the death of heroic boys and girls. As gallant general was not as dangerously wounded as first supposed, and the boys and girls with his sister would be buried in the usual manner any great general is buried.

"We and these seven beautiful boy scouts whom you know will also follow them," General Greatheart said in the end. "You and I and Penrod and the seven beautiful boys."

The Rattlesnake boy gasped.
"You—Penrod—and the Yivian—I mean the seven beautiful boy scouts!" he exclaimed starting. "And also why should the seven beautiful boys go? I did not think they'd want to. I did not believe they'd go to the funeral of a common boy scout's sister, even if they were generals."

For a few moments general Greatheart was silent.
"When even a brave general falls in battle, or boy and girl scouts, the end of it is a lonely thing to any boy scout and they know it," he said at last. "As for you being 'common' is another thing. The Y see more in you than you ever think. They respect you as much as they respect themselves, and they pity you exceedingly for your loss. The Y would do anything for one so lonely as you are." And he spoke the last few words after making a slight pause.

"Yes let us go now as it is yet time," said Penrod gravely, and he caught hold of the Rattlesnake's hand. The Rattlesnake made a sudden movement. He dropped his crutches and slipped back onto the bench and sat still gazing out out of the window at the falling snow as if he were not even looking at the November storm at all but at something else a long distance away. In a few minutes he looked up at general Greatheart.

"Do you Your Excellency realize what I was thinking of all of a sudden?" he suddenly said in a shaky voice. "I thought of those lost Abhinnian Princesses. I feel I saw them to day but for good reasons I'm not allowed to tell yet. Perhaps they got out of Yivian Lakey secretly. No body else but you, I and the Emperor know, but it is nearly a year since, and just because they are cool and friendly, no one I think the Y can do things. It's queer but it does me good to see them once more, though they were in complete disguise. It seemed like heaven to be near them, and if they've been so carefully hidden all these days since their escape from Yivian Lakey, they may have been at all parts of the camp, but so cleverly disguised, that no body may have ever known anything about them except the Emperor and their guardians. But I've seen them to day, and so have you. That's what they have done. Just kept themselves cleverly disguised. When I think of them, and of other pretty little girls and boys—there is indeed such awful and wonderful difference between them and others, that—Yes, I'd be sorry to refuse to let those seven pretty boys attend my sister's funeral and the funeral of my boy and girl scouts. This is the first time they have ever done this much for me at that. I was like to him a general's son and he was the only one I had, but now since he lies injured in a general hospital I am very lonesome—I want them to come to the burial with me."

After this hour, the forlorn details of the dead girl and boy scouts were conveyed to a specially made trench which are dug for the burial of commissioned officers, and an enormous military procession of a funeral followed them. There were the seven beautiful boy scouts, general Greatheart, many other officers, friends of the dead generals boy and girl scouts, the Rattlesnake and Penrod, and behind them Penrod's whole regiment of boy and girl scouts, who walked in squads. Then came one thousand soldiers who had respectfully sad and sober faces, and as they marched they held their heads up, shoulders properly and marched with shouldered muskets as if on drill. They were a company of Abyssinkillian soldiers who were to fire the parting salute, as the dead boy and girl scouts were lowered into the grave. Also with them was a priest.

After the burial ceremony, and while they were returning from the trench grave, the Rattlesnake was unusually silent all the way to the camp. He was thinking of the battle that had caused him to lose his sister and boy and girl scouts, and of what now was his destiny. In fact he was thinking to himself that no good fortune lay before him, nothing good whatever. And as he felt sure that this was too certain, his strange face sharply lined, took on such sharp new line lines which not only made it look look pinched and hard but increased the full dog expression of it. Before his sister's death, and the destruction of his company of girl and boy scouts, all he had before was a dingy room in general Maurice's post-office headquarters, which on account of its condition,

"I could have the chance to draw closer to Vivian Wickey and the great Mid-Whirlian fortifications, and see everything that is going on every day, I could plan the attacks upon them every night," said the Rattlesnake quietly and with a panting breath as an incredible vision of the fortress came before him. When he thought within himself: "Are the Mid-Whirlian fortifications so powerful that if all the nations of the world were arrayed against them they could not be forced? Here the fortresses of Thunelania, Corranum, St Phillip and St Andrew so strong, that they were unapproachable by even the strongest fleet and armies in the world? If so then the siege was of no avail."

"When the time comes we'll see who can draw the best laid plans," said General Greatheart.

"Do you mean to say that you'll be helping me at my own plans at and make maps at any moment even for the cause of Abba-sunila?" asked the Rattlesnake.

"I was not expecting that," answered General Greatheart. "I'll help you when ever you draw maps, or make plans, and we will even have conventions about them."

As they continued on their way, the general told him that Penrod and his Regiment of boy scouts could do many things, that fairly terrorized the glanglinsians. They could go when in disguise to all parts of the great Lucilla taken fortifications, because they knew them, and Penrod and any of his boy scouts could show him, what could be done in real spying work everywhere on that line.

His father said it is exceedingly dangerous for any one to even approach the insurgent line. The Rattlesnake said in a most hesitating manner, and growing hot because he remembered so many ugly days in Corran-gatherine. "I swear, I'll dare anything to go through or into Vivian Wickey but also the Infernal region. Infernal regions to spy on the enemy if need be."

The general smiled, "When I said to my generals that I have a firm belief you can be trusted I meant several good things," answered General Greatheart. "The spying work is one of them. You are a well disciplined boy scout. You and Colonel Penrod are both under my personal command. You both will command a Regiment of boy scouts each."

And the general said the words because he knew they would elate the Rattlesnake and stir the his blood to the highest pitch.

CHAPTER SIXTEEN

THE OPINION OF THE BOY SCOUTS ON THE FALL OF VIVIAN WICKY.

ARE THEY RIGHT?.....OR THE NATIONS?.....

THE OPINION OF THE TWO BOYSCOUTS ON THE FALL OF VIVIAN WICKERY.
WENT THEY RIGHT, OR THE NATIONS?

THINKED THE WORDS DID ELATE HIM, more than the general ever could have expected. His blood was stirred by his words, and every time they returned to his mind. He did even remember them for many days and nights that followed. He even very often indeed laid awake at nights saying them half aloud to himself.

The cot in Penrod's room was not very comfortable, but on inconvenience prevented his resting as in most cases he had not rested much since he entered the army as a boy scout. And to live in general Greatharts headquarters with Penrod was a great comfort compared with the past life he had gone through, and now this new kind of living was a great comfort, and almost luxury. He recovering the use of his wounded leg sooner than he expected even so he could get along without crutches, took his bath every morning. He sat at the general's table with Penrod, and would also always gaze at general Greathart, and speak to him and hear his voice often. But the chief trouble that the Rattlesnake had was that he found it almost impossible to keep his eyes from the general's face, and he was sorely afraid that it would greatly annoy him. Yet the boy scout could not bear to lose a look, or even a single movement. At the end of his second day with the general he slowly made his way but with some trouble and difficulty to the room of the general's aide-de-camp which was at the top of Greatharts headquarters.

"Do you mind sir if I come in, and talk with you a little while?"

he said.

The officer nodded, and motioned the boy to come in. When he had entered, he was obliged to sit on the floor, because there was nothing there except an old bed, and some old pieces of furniture.

"I want to ask you a serious question at once," said the Rattlesnake boy scout plunging into his important talk at once. "Do you think that the general of or even Penrod is right about it being too dangerous to approach the enemy's lines just now? Do you think he would mind me going as near as possible and observing the enemy's lines? I can't help desiring to go----but if he thinks it is too dangerous----well I'll try to overcome the desire, and keep my distance from the foe lines." "OK?"

"The general is used to knowing what the danger is." The Aide-de-Camp answered. "But Penrod knows better also. It is well Radcliffe to ask the general himself. He always has a liking for open speech."

"I want to find out everything possible about the fortifications, and the enemy's positions at Norma Catherine, also of the Lucille Pickens fortifications." The Rattlesnake said. "I want to know----isn't there anything I could do for the general?" "It surely wouldn't matter how great the peril is, and the Emperor would not need to know I'm doing it. I know from the way you look at me that if you was a general you would not be willing to let me do anything particular especially if it is dangerous. But you have always been close to Vivian Wickery and his fortifications, night and day. Could you tell me what I should do please?"

The Aide-de-Camp looked at the Rattlesnake boy with his piercing keen eyes. At last he said in a very gruff voice: "-----"

"Now and then the danger is very great indeed, so very great that only those who desire to commit suicide take the risks. But when the opportunity comes, I'll take you as near to the enemy's lines as I dare to go, or you can take the chances and accompany Violet and her sisters on such a trip. But not to day----perhaps sometime next week if the weather is good. ...." "AA--"

"That day will you take me?" asked the Rattlesnake, boy earnestly....
 For a few moments the Aide-de-Camp reflected, his shaggy eyebrows drawing themselves down over his eyes as if this were a question of state.
 "It probably will be next sunday, or maybe yonday," he conceded, "but not before. I'll tell him when you are to accompany me."
 "I rather you wouldn't," said the Rattlesnake boy. "I almost don't want him to know, and I want to know for sure myself if I'll be able to do something important for him. And I'll find out things that I can do without interfering with the duties of the vivian girl princesses. I'll think them over...!"
 "Anything any one else did without permission no matter how heroic would really be interfering with them," said the Aide-de-Camp, "and they would be liable to the most severe punishments."

It was now time for the Rattlesnake boy to reflect now and it could be seen how that his face was twisting itself into stranger lines and wrinkles.
 "I'll tell you before I do anything rash," he said after he had thought it over. "You have served in the army longer than I have, and ought to know."

"I have served in the army ever since I was an eighteen year old lad, and now I'm fifty six," said the Aide-de-Camp. "I was then a drummer boy...!"
 "Is vivian okay so powerfully defended by the Angelinian Insurgents as they say and as the nations of the world believe...?" demanded the Rattlesnake thinking deeply.

"It certainly is defended stronger than they say," was the Aide-de-Camp's decided answer. "It would take a million books to describe all the makes and formations of the fortifications and the material they had been constructed of. I'm positively sure it will never be retaken-----and neither the fortifications...!"

"Then what good is the siege then?" the Rattlesnake said. Then he laughed a little quaky laugh. "I've never been near vivian okay yet at least any nearer than I am now...!" He added.
 At his this moment his eagle eye caught a sudden passing look on the general's face itself. It was sudden queer, and most disturbed look. Could the Aide-de-Camp be really in favor of his great scheme? Perhaps there was that kind of meaning in that look.

"If you stay near general Greathheart long enough----- and it surely need not be too long, you will be finding out a lot of the dangers you and Penrod too will have to face. Everybody will tell that Comrade, that the slightest kind of glandelinians are not to be trifled with. Why take harsh chances with the worse...!"
 This made the Rattlesnake sit up as straight as that kind of Reptile erects itself to strike strikes.

"Then it suddenly comes to that," he suddenly blurted out. "I've seen a lot of adventures already ever since I joined the boy scout force. I was even feeling as if I was general Greathheart's son, several minutes after he gazed at me with those queer handsome eyes of his. I feel that his eyes are strangely queer, because they gazed me so strangely, and they make me wish to follow him more than anything else."

That night when all was quiet, the Aide-de-Camp related to the general the story of his interview with the Rattlesnake boy.
 He carefully repeated the words the boy had said, and general Greathheart listened gravely.

"I believe we did not have time to learn much of that boy yet," he said. "But he is a faithful lad, during and else, though I think he is somewhat reckless. Be careful with him, and do not approach too near the rebel lines under Mc-Holleser Johnston, or Penrod."

About two days had passed, and everything was still silent along the opposing lines, except occasional artillery duels, and some big fires in vivian okay, or near the fortresses, and some in the camps of both sides, and flood and blizzard storms. The weather by now being the first of December was growing intensely cold, it being 20 below to day, and there was several feet of snow on the ground.

It was at this time, at and while an early newmber cold wave was on, that Penrod suddenly met the Rattlesnake boy scout especially right after the morning, and had been out. He had even made his disappearance without saying a single word to general Greathheart or any one else. It was nearly three hours after before he came back, and when he did return he appeared to be very excited. And he looked very cold and tired. He was questioned by some of the soldiers, and even general Greathheart, but he would not just then give any explanation whatever. He did not volunteer to explain until the approach of the evening, and then as he lay on his cot, without getting up, he said it to Penrod.

"I have been scouting near the enemy's lines, it's some hazardous practice I'll say, walking about with my cuticles and it being so cold and windy and so much snow on the ground, there were so many glandelinian scouting parties around, and within view, that I had to go about more like a rat, than a Rattlesnake. I want to go as near as I could dare, but I walked much closer than I believed I had. I was within five hundred yards of fortress Gertrude Angelina, which I believe had an extent of two miles. I saw her strength. I believe she has enough guns, and fortified sailboats or snow forts to annihilate a million men. If I go again I'll take a look at fortress Korrmann Aurad Aurandecallio."

"Shall I make a trip with you, when you go again?" asked Penrod.

"I couldn't you mind sharing the dangers with a crippled boy scout?" asked the Rattlesnake.

"Don't worry yourself sick about that," said Penrod. "We can examine things while we are together, and try to copy everything we see as we go on. It's best for us you know."

"I want to learn everything about the enemy's positions, and to remember things," answered the Rattlesnake. "I'd like to train myself to also approach the Great Lucille taken fortifications in the most cautious way too. I'd give anything to know all the extent of those fortresses, formations and so on. I've a good memory, and can see things and remember them as they are. I remember the sights of Mc-Whirther Janet, and the great Norma Catherine horror. These things I don't want to remember any more. I hate to. Will you go to morrow morning?"

"Yes," answered Penrod. "I'll be glad to do so...!"

"I, the main thing I really want to do," he exclaimed in not only to see fortress Aurandecallio, as other spies and scouts do, but also the Lucille taken fortifications. Scouts are surely trained to do anything with all complete success. You know it is training that does it for all of us. And you know Penrod, there will come a time when even general Greathheart will need some boy scout to quickly go on some very important mission, and as one of us may be chosen, I'm going to be ready. I'm making up my mind to train my own self until until no general will think of me as if I were only a common boy scout who can't learn to do all the thing a he is required to, and runs himself into useless peril so often that he has to be taken care of. I want all the generals to know that I'm really as strong in spirit as others, and where others can go, I also can find my way...!"

When the morning came their first had breakfast, and then they set out the general being told the reason for their going. The general suspected no reason, or suspected one reason probably, but he did not realize the full intention of the two boyscouts. This day they intended to do their scouting until dark, it being not quite so cold though heavy snow flurries was on. Penrod was silent as he watched the Rattlesnake, and observed with amazement his great determination, and endurance. They could see everything from every point of view. They did not fail to observe anything as they walked. They saw that Manley and many others of Mc-Holleser Johnston's army were pushing forward large bodies of troops, and concentrating along all points of gunboat Creek, and movements were going on at all points of Delight Junction and they saw, larger masses of troops were also moving for Evangelina Grania heights, and elsewhere, while strong batteries, and long and high breastworks made of snow and earth were being hastily erected. Penrod as he observed this, knew that he should not speak of what they could not fail to see as they continued to walk on and on. He Rattlesnake began to look cold and tired and very pale, and desperately fatigued, but he did not give in. Penrod knew that the Rattlesnake had determined for some particular reason of his own to view the threatening attitude of the rebel lines, and to do this thing at any cost to himself. Sometimes when it appeared that they were observed by distant enemy scouting parties, or when shell explosions rent the air with ear splitting detonations, a thousand fold louder than the loudest thunder crash, his face grew white and he breathed hard, but he never retreated nor retreated for any longer period than ten minutes, and no matter how many distant cannons crashed, or how many shells exploded dangerously near never turned back or shortened the scouting tour they had planned.

"Tell me something about the fortress defending the nearest approaches to your Catherine," he said when he was viewing the outer works of Juranaleo.

"When I look at these works I can't see how they can ever be carried," he said. "I look at these wide trees, and as they did so, they talked about the glandon works, and the Rattlesnake committed all he heard to his memory. He was quick at everything, and saw new sights every minute. They invented a game between themselves of remembering every section of the enemy's positions as they viewed them, both would try to sketch a copy of the fortifications. They went to the top of small hillocks, and elsewhere, and observed movements among general. Many Mandays lines that fortold the approach of a gigantic elemental storm of humanity between Jennie Ivian and Delight Junction. Jennie Ivian no doubt would be its center." He took in everything they say (not into their pockets though) making out lists and descriptions which when they returned at night, they intended to show to general Greatheart. It would be very important to him. As the hours passed, and as it grew colder and windier, Penrod observed that the Rattlesnake was gaining strength and nerve.

Indeed this exhilarated him exceedingly. Wherever they had gone, they walked in the snow and wind facing the cold as if it were a summer day. Even now there were not so many wrinkles in his face, and his sharp angle eyes did not look half as fierce, and between each other, they had a long and curious talk. Penrod began to realize that the Rattlesnake wanted to learn everything he could about the enemy's positions.

"The way it seems to me general Greatheart always talks to you as if you were a learned man," the Rattlesnake said on their return. "He knows you understand more about Military things than most men even do, and yet the glandolinians have treated me as if I were a Rattlesnake that lived in gutters, and seemed to live no where else."

They were soon back to their own quarters and a little later were talking in their own room as they always did, when they went to bed at night. To night they sat up clasping their arms or knees. Penrod on his cot, the Rattlesnake on his both of them conscious of hearing all the while, strange booming sounds, and other sounds more eerie than the cry of ghosts or evil spirits, and observing through their bed room windows the flash of night signals. All this made them feel the sense of companionship. All the while they listened to the volume of strange sounds in the distance, they revealed their most reliable thoughts to each other, and even told such things that they never had thought of telling before. In fact they found out about themselves many important things, they did not suspect before.

Even Penrod had discovered but slowly and gradually the admiration the Rattlesnake had for all the Anti Angolinian generals, was becoming quite impassioned and also that he had a curious feeling which entirely took hold of him. It seemed also to Penrod that the Rattlesnake thought incessantly of general Ivian and his beautiful laughs the Ivian girls. So when he told of the enemy calling him a Rattlesnake of the gutter, Penrod had the comfortable feeling that he was somewhat fortunate in remembering something very important he could say.

"General Greatheart and many of the generals declared yesterday a that you have the brains and talent of a professional spy and also a very strong will," he said from his cot. "He told me you have the experience of an official of the wonderful and Powerful Gemini, a most wonderful memory and that you used a special training. He said it again this evening after he looked over the drawings of the fortifications you made during our scouting tour to day."

At hearing this the Rattlesnake began to shut a shuffle on his cot, and then clasped his knees a little tighter.

"Did he really say that? Did he really?" He demanded. Then a few minutes passed, in which the Rattlesnake rested his chin upon his knees, and stared straight before him. Then he turned and looked at Penrod like a startled Rattlesnake does when rearing itself to strike.

"Penrod!"

He spoke suddenly and his voice was rather hoarse, and also queer in its sound. "Penrod, were you ever afraid of anything?"

"Afraid of anything?" said Penrod. "Why do you ask?"

"I mean have you ever felt any kind of a fear when ever you faced great peril?"

"If so do you know what fear is like, and what causes it?"

"I don't believe I understand you," answered Penrod staring a little.

"Are you ever fearful of peril when you go on long distant scouting tours, with general Greatheart, because you know the savage ferocity of the Angolinian insurgents, because the general knows more about his work than you do, and may send you on perilous missions, which no one but you can do? I mean are you afraid to go within the very lines of the enemy, knowing the penalty if caught?"

Penrod first looked out the window for a moment, then removing his arms suddenly from his knees, laid himself down flat on his cot.

"No I don't think that I am one bit afraid. Towards are not wanted here."

He said. "That Englishman was shot the day after the battle for his cowardice. The more brave you are the more the people of this country will love and serve you, and the more you'll be honored and respected. What happens to all cowards I do not know. He only one I fear, or should fear is God, and he is the only one I believe I love or should love most, the only thing I care for is—him. Really I just care for him and the Ivian girls though I have never seen him, or them. All of the lowest and highest of the Angolinians think the world of God. Don't you?"

This question greatly excited the Rattlesnake, but only internally. For all his life he had been constantly thinking of this, and exceedingly too. Sometimes the thought had terrified him. He might as well have it out with Penrod if he could. If he felt sure he could get at the truth at once everything for him would be much easier. But Penrod, would he really be willing to tell him all he cared to ask without getting embarrassed, angry or suspicious.

"Go you mind," he said in a voice still hoarse and eager. "Go you mind how much I really desire to enter the enemy's lines, and to learn the intentions of the highest glandolinian generals. Could it be or would it make you feel like using all your power to prevent me, knowing how savage the glandolinians are? Could it ever set you thinking, that if I made the attempt, I would be nothing but—what other persons would think, that I am a reckless fool, and that it would be cheek of me to push myself into such a grave danger, especially if the general objects to myself going without his permission? Anyhow I might as well tell you the plain truth right now." He declared suddenly. "If I were you going out on the perilous journey, or if you were me, then I should think what is proper to do. I know it is dangerous to attempt to enter the very enemy lines. But I can't help desiring to do it, since it is a sense of duty, and as for that foreign Englishman who acted so cowardly during the last conflict just past now, I can see every low thing that is or was in him, in his cowardly manner, and in his voice and looks. I could see nothing but the contrast between that coward and the back bone of a jelly fish, and also between your bravery and his fear. When I think of the action of that cowardly foreigner I should and do feel so disgust that I should fly into a fierce rage. I should hate that cowardly fool, but God forbid! But nevertheless I certainly do despise him and I'm not sorry that he had been condemned." While he was speaking, the Rattlesnake had worked himself up to a strong passion of feeling, such a passion that Penrod believed the boy scout had surely wrought up such strong emotions, such as he never before had observed in other boy scouts.

At any rate the Rattlesnake had been thinking and pondering over the cowardly actions of that Englishman since that eventful day, or nearly if five minutes later, lay peacefully still while he thought the matter over. Then he said: "Count De Giff, who held that coward a prisoner turned him over to the firing squads because no one interceded for him at his trial. He had no right to work his way into Abbie-annia or into the Christian lines if he was of a cowardly nature. You might despise him if you were with other Angelinians who thought the same way as you did. And if Count De Giff had not found out by that trial that it was such a mistake to demand the coward to answer the signal station, he would not have been so stupid, and would have sent someone else and shot the jelly fish down on sight. But you see it would be probable that if it had been one of the Gargolian girls instead of Count De Giff she'd have drawn her weapons and made him go out there and answer the signal, or shoot him down herself. They have been finding out about the nature of cowards all their lives and won't tolerate them."

"Found out what?" "Oh just this," answered Penrod. "O them to trust a coward or traitor, is just like letting some big dogs loose who are suffering with that strange malady called Rabies. They spread a sort of hideous fever which is as impossible to cure as Hydrophobia but a much worse disease."

"What is it do you mean?" The Rattlesnake demanded. "It is like a plague," said Penrod as he lay flat and warm on his army cot and looking at the reflection of the signal flames outside in the dark. "I remember a day when a boy scout, a new knee whose name is Walter Starring went out adventuring with a party of boys all under eighteen years of age. That day they came upon a body of Gargolian Kurds or what they are called the 'mounted wheelers'. They had not known they were so near. Suspecting that he and his boys were the onlookers of the Gargolian girls, and that the Gargolian girls were near they at once gave chase, and fired a volley of shots at them. At first Walter Starring knowing his followers were or crackshots was for rushing in and fighting the attackers, but it saw the uselessness of it, and fled where the enemy's horses could not go. If he and his boys would have remained and fought like savages what would have happened to him and his followers of thirty boys?"

At first the Rattlesnake did not answer. After a few minutes hesitated and the Rattlesnake boy answered in this fashion: "These Gargolian Kurds would have ridden you down, or starring and his scouts with drawn sabres. They'd have killed every one of the boys, including Walter Starring. But on second thought starring and his followers are strong boys very good at shooting, and slashing with the sabre, and would have succeeded in killing a lot of the wheelers." Suddenly Penrod heard a note of sudden terror break from the Rattlesnake. "What fools they should have been if they remained," he cried out. "Walter Starring and his comrades would not be alive to day. I've seen lots of men mounted rebels, but none worse than the Gargolian Kurds. It's impossible to escape them even on swift horses. If they cannot catch you they'll fire such a volley that they will mow you all down. If I had ever encountered them, I would not be here myself to day. I should never have escaped them."

But by the light of the moonbeams streaming in on the Rattlesnake's bed, Penrod observed that he looked almost ghastly.

"Those Gargolian Kurds are much dreaded, and one squadron of them could in a single conflict destroy a whole regiment of opposing Christian cavalry without a single loss to themselves," Penrod added. "They could not be stopped by a Christian cavalry force of any size, if they had a man wanted to be stopped. And who could have gotten any good out of it sending a cavalry force against them? It would only have been a massacre with all the loss on one side at the end of it. The best way to stop them is to mow them down horses and all with artillery of every every make."

"You have been in the army a shorter time a much shorter length of time than I have," the Rattlesnake pondered. "You are a forger but of a more decent kind. You entered our ranks as though you did not mind what the consequences would be under any conditions. No one has yet asked you why you did it. You looked at first to me as if you did not have nerve, nor even enough nerve to sell peanuts to a boy, and yet you are different, very different than I thought you were. I always wondered and kept on wondering what was your reason for joining, and now I know. It is not merely for sight seeing or anything like obtaining news of the war, or bet raying us like the others do, and you are always so cool and steady. I know every thing now. It is because you are like general Greatheart himself. It is he who had thought you. He is a general, but he is like the Wizard of Oz."

"General Greatheart knows things that not even Glinda with her great Magic Book does, or Ozma with her Magic picture, and knows more than many others of the Angelinian generals do," said Penrod. "He says that even some of the best Angelinians are queer and act very unnatural. There's general Constantinian Arontburg. He's a born Abbieannian, he is within also would be a pleasure. O He fears nothing, but is more feared by the enemy than any other Christian general more greatly feared than the emperor himself. I don't believe you would be scared if you had been in my place, or you in mine."

"And you're sure you are not either?" as he asked this the Rattlesnake's voice sounded almost hollow. "Will you swear that you are not afraid?" "I never was afraid of anything that I know of," said Penrod.

At this the Rattlesnake boy's excitement was increasing as he poured forth his very startling confession.

"I'm sure I was afraid ever since the battle at South Bend or Delight's Junctions. I've been afraid every day since since I came here from my home in the city of Porothy Gale, and I'm telling you straight out that I know that I'm a coward. And it seems just natural that if I acted like that Englishman you and general Greatheart wouldn't even stand for my presence, just as I did not stand for him. It also would just seem more than natural, that you general great heart, and all others would have worked together to throw me out of the army. I know how I felt at the cowardice of that Englishman, Penrod. I said that I'd tell you out fair and square. I'm sure that I'm scared and cowardly. I'm scared of the Gargolian Girl Princesses because of their beauty and ways. It makes me wilder and wilder, when I see so many risking their lives to learn the intentions of the enemy, and also others fit and ready to do any thing on the line of duty, their generals want done. I'm a know I'm not ready for my call, and I'm a fit to face perils of this war as a dry cat is to go into the water he's scared of."

"You only said that to try me," said Penrod. "You really know that you would do anything out our generals wanted done no matter how scared you are whether you are fit and ready, or not. He knows that himself."

"Does he really?" cried the Rattlesnake. "Really is it possible that he does? I wish he would try me to see if I'm brave or not. I certainly wish he would."

Penrod suddenly changed his position in his bed, then rose up on his elbow so that he faced the Rattlesnake boy on his cotton bed.

"Let us wait and see the results," he whispered. "Let us wait for the time to come."

There was a few minute's pause, and then the Rattlesnake boy also said in a whisper:

"What should we wait for?"

"To give general Greatheart the time to find out for good what he is fit to meet the trail or not," you realize my friend, what big fools we should and would be making of ourselves if we should be spending our time entering the enemy's lines and spying when we are not or may not be fit or ready, either of us. We are two boy scout officers, suppose general Greatheart and that we were so foolish as to enter the enemy lines without being prepared or without customary advice. When you believe that you are really a coward and cowardly just go and find some of the books of heroes and heroines, and read of their deeds, and think well of them. Or when things go wrong while out on a scout tour think of what the pioneer girls did and dared. It'll make you forget your tour of duty and set your mind going properly. You have gone through many disappointments and set your mind going properly. You have gone through many stern trials already without flinching, and have tried upon others. You are not only try to stop yourself on time. Any one can be such a big fool as to believe himself a hero when he lets himself. And he can always find out different, if he only makes up his mind. I'm not scared of anything. You must forget such things. Let us such thoughts alone. You are not a coward your self. Ask that foolish thought into the river now. Run."

While he listened to this the Rattle snake caught and held his breath off on and when Penrod had finished speaking, the Rattle snake threw his arms over his eyes.

"Oh my God! Oh my God!" he cried. "If I only had the experiences the others had. If I only had the companionship of the brave pioneer girls. If I only just had and learned something from them. But I'm too bashful to ask them."

"I may be nearer to them now, than we ever think," said Penrod as he leaned forward on his pillow, and here's something very important for us to think of. If the plantelins are authorities who literally rooted the Child Lavery deep into the ground have waited and planned all these years to bring on this great Revolutionary war, we can make ourselves ready to help and aid our side oppose the Insurgents, and also wait patiently so that if us two boy scouts are wanted to do something important, just us two, we can step out of the ranks, when the call comes and say 'Here!' Now let us lie down and think of it until we go to sleep."

In the meantime the honor that that was to be bestowed upon the Rattle snake boy was not being forgotten. It was found that if it had, general Greathart would have openly regarded it as a neglect of the military duty to a great boy hero, and a breach of promise also which is punishable by death.

"I have remembered my promise, and will know where to place you in command of your best newly found Regiment," he said three days after the Rattlesnake boy had been residing in general Greathart's headquarters. "And as they are well disciplined you will be obliged to keep them on the drill. Penrod told me you drilled your company of boy scouts just as a general would. Go don't let your new Regiment get slack. Their services will be badly needed soon."

"HIS REGIMENT." The Rattle snake boy felt something at this what no one could have put into a young man's mind. He knew that he had always performed his duty, and that his company of boys had sacrificed their very lives for their country's cause, and so had his sisters. At the recent Delight Junction Squabble too. He did not know of course, could not understand how his boy and girl scouts together could have perished, two whole companies of them, and which was considered by all the Christian generals and the whole nation itself as the greatest tragedy of the war so far, and a most unnecessary. They had before this been surrounded by overwhelming numbers of the most ferocious kind of plantelins known as the Scoodler Turner unions, and escaped without a single loss, had successfully found their way to the most hidden recesses of the enemy lines, secured plans, and everything, and even boy scout prisoners and even captured plantelinian officers and generals, and escaped without harm. Only once or twice it had seemed impossible for them to reach hidden places, and yet they had still existed in spite of the fury of the worst of the Insurgents, and the utmost vigilance of the plantelinian scouting and searching parties. They had been pursued hundreds of miles by many different kinds of plantelins every time they went out on scouting tours, or during signal duties, and had been chased into and surrounded in many different kind of refuges, and yet with no disaster whatever or a single loss.

No one not even any of the Angelinian generals ever expected, that the simple adventure of a battle pretty far in the rear of the firing line at that would put out of existence a troop of noble boy and girl scouts, and cause the most famous Christian general of all to be killed, and many others, and the highest commander of all general Maurice Costello to be wounded seriously with the destruction of his whole command, and the burning of one million tents and one hundred thousand wooden barracks and other places with a score of million dollar loss to the Christian army in provisions and army goods. But somehow it had happened, and now he was in command of a full Regiment, and among whom he could keep strict order and discipline. He thought of it. He suddenly felt as if he was some general being decorated for bravery. The Rattlesnake boy had sense enough to see and understand many things, and he knew that it was in this way that the great general Greathart was picking him out his important place. He knew how to command a Regiment of boy scouts, and therefore felt as if he was a general instead of a boy. When he or Penrod reached the point or place where the Regiment of boys stood at attention, the fifteen hundred boys greeted them with a loud and most tumultuous cheer of welcome which indeed expressed a great sense of relief.

Private ly these boys had been filled with fears strange to believe, and which they talked over together in deep gloom. The Rattlesnake boy's sorrow over his loss they decided was too deep seated to cause him to even think to ever take command of a full Regiment of well drilled and best picked boys in the army, after he had seen the destruction of his company of boys and girl scouts he had worked so hard for a full year to drill, and the death of his best general and the wounding of his best friend Maurice Costello, and these boys had not been picked out by general Greathart, but by the pioneer girls themselves, and out of the best boys out of their own commands. He might be even leaving the army to go for a bit, and boys like him who form their own company and so on was not going to take the command of a Regiment of strange boys or respect such as us. "He'd leave the army and go home. That's what he will do." They all had thought.

But to their joy and sudden surprise the Rattlesnake boy came limping toward them without crutches now, and looking as if he had been made the adopted brother of the brave and beautiful pioneer girls. Penrod came with him, and the Regiment was put through the finest and strictest drill, they had ever known yet.

"I wish the Emperor or his beautiful daughters, had been around to see that," said Penrod to the Rattlesnake boy scout.

After he had these remarks Penrod noticed that the Rattlesnake boys face suddenly turned red and white, and then red again, but nevertheless he did not answer. Yet the more thought that these words brought was like a flash of fire burning its way through his body. But surely no one could hope for such luck. After the drill the Regiment was given the order "Dismissed", and Penrod and the Rattlesnake boy sat down on a bench in his headquarters to read the morning Angelinia Agathia City News. The news about the war especially around pioneer Mikey was very bad indeed. General Mic-Holleston Johnston, and general Johnston Jackson Hanley had continually been receiving reinforcements, and was massing the most enormous columns ever seen in any way war yet along all points of the San Ben Creek from portress Cedernine, toward Delight's junction to Jennie's town, and was holding stronger works behind Aurandecallio and Leightburg Landing. It was also reported that enormous Christian armies were also moving up to support general Ivian at Emperor Ivians orders, and that it looked as if some titanic battle big enough to stun the world was about to begin. So fierce and dark was the situation now that all the nations of the world stood aghast. The Rattlesnake boy scout folded the paper when he had finished reading and sat for a long time biting his fingernails.

having done this for about ten minutes he began to speak in his strange dramatic and hollow "Secret Gemini" whisper.

"The hour is soon approaching," he said to Penrod. "When the important messenger must go forth to the vivian girls and to do their duty for them. As it is for the safety of the cause, they must not know the reason why they go for, they only must know that it is for them to obey. Even if they were captured by the glandelinians and the insurgents tortured them or grilled them or placed them under cross examination to make them tell things, they would not be able to betray anything to injure the christian cause because they know nothing, but that at certain secret places they must utter only one secret word, that no one but the vivian girls or the Secret Gemini Know, and they alone know. They would be instructed how not to carry any papers or messages written on paper, which if found on them would cause them to be detained as and shot as spies. All at range and secret commands given to them they must know by heart, and therefore if the signal is given, the Secret Gemini Members will know what to do, where to form for their secret meeting, and where to make their plans for the general attack upon vivian Wickeys strongest fortifications."

He then drew or sketched a map or plan of an imaginary battle on a large piece of yellow paper and then having an original printed map of vivian Wickey, and her surrounding fortifications, he rapidly sketched an imaginary route into the rebel lines which he planned the two important messengers were to follow as directed. But to his great disappointment his knowledge of the map of vivian Wickey was not as good as he wished, and therefore he immediately turned to Penrod.

"You know more about the vivian Wickey city and that Geography of her big fortifications and surrounding territory more than I do. At least you know more about the whole of Calvernia than most of us Angelinians do," he said. "I only know that the State of Angelinia is south of Calvernia, that the wicked rebellious glandelinian states is below Angelinia further south, and Abiesmian Tripolygonia, and Dombolia and Conventinian, Pandora and her other states is northwest of Calvernia, and also west, and Abyssinikills straight north, with Angeline line and Yormonia. Now would the Secret Members of the Gemini get into vivian Wickey or her famous fortifications? Can you draw any place around the vicinity of the fortresses that they could pass through with more safety?" Penrod knew any map better than any of her age schoolboy or boy and girl scout ever did yet, therefore as he knew the map of vivian Wickey by heart, and could even find every place and river and town and hill and fortress on the map with his eyes blindfolded, he carefully drew it. It took him nearly an hour and a half to finish it. He also knew all sections of the great Lucille Jackson fortifications, and also knew the safe stations, the two secret and important messengers would be destined to arrive at, and also to leave by when they entered the great city of vivian Wickey or her fortifications, all the streets and avenues they would be brave enough to walk through and the scores of million of fierce glandelinian soldiers they would see, but all of these very things Penrod refused to say a word.

Nevertheless he did certainly did wish in his heart that he could have had the freedom of speech to tell and explain everything to the Rattlesnake, which he knew. If it was not for the Secret he should keep, he and the Rattlesnake could have made and worked out so many details and plans for long distant tours and other travels of adventure that it would have been almost as if they were talking or taking possible adventures from thrilling story books. Nevertheless the imagination of the Rattlesnake boy scout was fired by the mere sketching of the safer routes of for spies, and the Members of the Secret Gemini Gemini. He forged steadily ahead with the description of all his plans, and filled his stories with such thrilling and mysterious purpose and design, that both boys themselves at times were gasping for breath. In his glowing version, the two secret persons went into the most dangerous parts of vivian Wickey only by midnight, and pretended to be glandelinian boy scouts.

but kept themselves hidden, where near the Glandelinian Tribunals they could see the glandelinian poor generals, and other important persons, passing inward, and outward, and outward, or pause to listen to important conversations or between them, and if they observed any one they knew to be important Angolinians in disguise, to give them the signal.

"The disguised Angolinians are not all Members of the 'Secret Gemini'!" He said. "Sometimes it may be soldiers or officers, even generals or even the poor poorest people there. I've known many Angolinians and other kinds of great christian spies who usually appear as the lowest of beggars, even the Secret Gemini may be likewise disguised. Even a great general might be hidden within the enemy's lines, might be even disguised as a woman, or pretend to be a Child slave driver, or buyer or seller, and we could only be able to know them by the signs and signals we ourselves have learned by heart. And if we were to be really sent into Vivian Wickley, we should even in the night time be obliged to creep into some place very frequently, and watch out that no glandelinians would be around to see us or know what we are doing. We should also be obliged to make our way into some hidden part of Vivian Wickley or the Lucille Jackson fortifications where no glandelinians are apt to know of our presence, and where we would be in no danger from an attack by them. It is said most of the glandelinian generals are not at all clever enough to watch all the approaches to some points of the Lucille Jackson Fortifications, and they have not forces of Detective, and Secret Service men enough, or military police and Professional spotters enough to see that all the what all is going on. Therefore I firmly believe that two well experienced boy scouts could find a way into any part of the Lucille Jackson fortifications if they only thought it out."

The Rattlesnake boy then became possessed by the idea of how in the world they were going to be able to think it out without committing a blunder. Again he produced the general map of Vivian Wickley, and looked it over carefully.

"Look at this spot here!" He exclaimed or explained to Penrod who bent over it. "The immense stretch of the Lucille Jackson fortifications is here near Jennie Vivian, and the Great Cedernine is here near Norma Catherine, and here it is the formidable Guarded Lucille Jackson and Cedernine are considered the strongest fortifications defending the land side, though they are not quite so extensive as the Titanic Mic-Murthian fortifications, including the dreadful forts of St Andrew and St Phillip. As for the situation the great east danger lies for two persons to try to pass Jackson, and Maya, and also Thumbelina. There's no reason whatever why anything should really prevent anyone from getting through without detection, and entering Vivian Wickley if they know how to do it."

CHAPTER SEVENTEEN.

THE VIVIAN GIRLS GIVE PENROD, AND HIS COMRADE A SURPRISED VISIT. PENROD SAVES A LITTLE GIRL SCOUT FROM REBEL PERSECUTION.

HE THEN PAUSED A MOMENT, and began thinking.....

"The article in yesterday's paper as I remember said something about a very huge fortress on the Heights of Evangelinia grania. That's here (pointing). If necessary we could ascend the hill by night, hide by day and reaching it pretend we're two lost Insurgent Glandelinian boy scouts, and wander into the fortress and stay there pretending to work for the rebels until we've planned every-thing we had intended to do. We could act so careless and in such a half witted manner that none of the most watchful of the Glandelinians would ever suspect us. What we best could do is to act so that the Insurgents will believe we are nothing but half trained lads....."

Some of the boy scout officers had already come forward and were lent over the map in a close circle of heads, crowded together, leaning far over stretching necks and breathing quickly with excitement, when there came the sudden thunder of hoofs outside approaching toward the barracks, and at the sound Penrod and the Rattlesnake went outside. Some mysterious impus impulse had suddenly seized him and caused him to go to the door abruptly, and then stand at attention in spite of himself.

"There's Emperor Vivian, and the Seven Princesses with him." He said. "Attention all of you."

The pencil suddenly dropped, the map and papers were dropped, in fact every-thing was dropped, even the plan of Vivian Wicky. The Rattlesnake boy was up and standing at attention with shouldered sabre as if he had been hurried into that position by magic, and how he gave his own command if it was given at all, not even the Rattlesnake himself knew, but his whole regiment had suddenly formed inside inside the barracks and stood at attention and with shouldered flags and saluting Penrod alone was almost dumfounded. Close by him inside the barracks of which they had entered, and also close to his companion the Rattlesnake boy were eight little girls dressed in the most handsome lavender girl scout uniforms with wide scarlet h hats of which seven of them wore of the Princesses stifle and each of the little girls were still more dazzling because though they had on the hats beautiful golden brown curls hung down from under them, and about their shoulders they had been seated upon beautiful white horses when they rode up to the barracks, and now to Penrod they looked like beautiful Celestial children. He knew the Seven girls were the Vivian girl princesses, but who was the other? With them being so suddenly in his presence, and Emperor Vivian too, Penrod felt so awed and surprised, that for a few moments he felt as if he was paralysed. And they were looking at him so frankly, and in so friendly a manner that he felt rather embarrassed, but yet liked the feeling. They had all raised their right hand in return salute, and then Emperor Vivian strode forward like some great man who had really conquered the whole world.

"I was passing down the Company street with my daughters, and in passing one of the windows of this barracks building saw you and your Regiment, and your company general...." he explained. "I would like to review your men Colonel Penrod, and so would my daughters."

The Great Emperor of Abhis-annia smiled, but from the appearance of his smile it was evident that he said was not any joke, then he looked down at the map which the Rattlesnake boy had forgot to fold up and put away.

"You certainly can make excellent drawings of maps, and that proves you know all sections of Vivian Wicky very very well." He said, and at this the Vivian girls came nearer but did not say anything as yet. "Given I can see that Vivian Wicky is well placed on the map, what is the 'Secret Gemini' doing did you say?"

"We do not know what they are doing."....."Answered Penrod. "put we were planning to find some way through the enemy's line, and work our way into Vivian Wicky."

"We can get in through this section of Vivian Wicky."....."Said the Rattlesnake boy pointing with his fingers. "There's a secret entrance where we could hide our selves, and find out important things."

"You mean reconnaissance." Said the Emperor looking down. "Yes two stray disguised boy scouts could be hidden safely away. It's a good chance if you know the inn and out of the city, and can work the plans properly." Indeed to both boys it was a joyful and yet almost embarrassing moment. To think that Emperor Vivian, and his beautiful daughters, with a companion should be there. And that the Emperor in his own wonderful way should come and give them such a delightful surprise as this. That he and his eight beautiful girl companions should care enough even to look up the Company streets, and honor them like this, and surely they were nothing else but two common boy scouts, one a Abyssinikilian, and the other a Canadian, and he standing to king at them with a very fine smile.

There was indeed something about Emperor Vivian which made him appear more splendid and majestic than his high office. And his brave daughters. They were not at all restless like little girls not when in the presence of strangers, and they looked steadily at the two boys as if reading their very souls. Though he felt as if he was blushing, the Rattlesnake boys heart thumped with startled joy.

"....."rather."....."Said one of them who appeared to be the most beautiful. "Will you ask either of the boys to drill the regiment? I want to see how well they do it?"

"Will you be kind enough to do me such a honor Captain?" The great Emperor said to the Rattlesnake boy, and he said these words without jesting, and without any seriousness in his tone, and because the Emperor spoke in so right at once the Rattlesnake felt exultant, and his pulse beat quickly, as the Vivian girls looked at him so beseechingly. This great Emperor of Abhis-annia had looked at his map, had talked to his pretty daughters of the plans of his, and Penrod, and now wished to see the Regiment of boy scouts, who were his new command drill. Indeed the Rattlesnake became so exultant that he started to drill his Regiment as if he were reviewing the movements of his main army, and he was it's commander. Indeed the drill of the boy scout Regiment was very wonderful to behold and in its mechanical exactness was like the drill of regulars.

The whole regiment of boys moved like the parts of some enormous machine. The Emperor and the eight little girls with him wondered exceedingly how this Regiment of boys could do it in so small a space of a barracks room, with such great Military precision, and was to them a very extraordinary testimonial to the great military genius, efficiency, and most curious qualities of this fierce faced boy officer.

"That is certainly as magnificent as if it was my own drilling." Said Emperor Vivian, when it was over. "I could not do better myself. Allow me and my little girls to congratulate you."

He shook the Rattlesnake boy by the hand as if it had been his own brothers or son's, and after he had shaken it the little girls themselves came forward and one by one kissed him on the forehead. No I must say that when the Vivian girls did this they gasped Penrod had gasped, and seeing one of them coming toward him he turned to run, so bashful he was, when Emperor Vivian put his hand lightly on the boy's shoulder and said:

"What are you afraid of my boy. They are very good, saintly little girls, and they won't hurt you."

put Penrod had some trouble in controlling himself. It was his first time that he had met the Vivian girls, that is violet and her sisters face to face, and their dazzling beauty, friendly manners, and all he had heard about them, struck him as something very unusual, and when Angelina Aronburg approached him (for she was their pretty companion) and the Emperor halted his flight he blushed a deep emission. But seeing his bashfulness, the little girls did not kiss him as they had his companion. They only talked to him and the Rattlesnake boy for a few minutes keeping the plans about Vivian Wickey, telling the boys of their own experience at Camp Catharine, and warning them not to attempt to carry out their desperate plot without their help, and their clear comprehension of it will added to the thrill which even the dullest boy scout in the whole Regiment was elated by.

Sometimes it would be very difficult to understand persons of the highest rank even if they were really friendly, but any one could easily understand the Abbess-Anna, Emperor, and his daughters, and they stirred up the spirits of the two boys. The other girl who was with the Vivian girls, as soon as she saw her chance, she suddenly kissed Penrod on the cheek. As he stood there blushing still more red, they slowly went out of the barracks, remounted their horses near the entrance, and with a parting farewell salute slowly rode away. When the Rattlesnake boy after dismissing the Regiment, called his officers to him, and they all sat down in a circle and began talking about Emperor Vivian and his eight beautiful companions because they were so excited, had filled with emotion that they could not think or talk of any other thing. All of the boy scout officers stared at the Rattlesnake boy in the most furtive manner, feeling as if he was the great leader's youngest son, and the little girls his sisters. They also stared at Penrod as if he were some highly excited person of the Celestial world. And the Emperor's wonderful loquacious hand had rested on his right shoulder, and prevented his flight from his daughters, when they approached him with the evident purpose to give him a friendly kiss as a also. And they did not because they saw he was so over awed. And the y had kissed the Rattlesnake boy scout while their father had said the Rattlesnake could beat him in drilling troops. And the Vivian girls and the other ones had conversed and conversed with the two boy scout leaders as if they had known them for life. And the Vivian girls were not restless as they spoke, but stood still and quit quiet as their father and appeared as attentive as the general himself. And each looked as gay, and as loveable as gentle doves.

"When you said to me that you wished the Emperor Vivian and his daughters could have seen me drill the Regiment," said the Rattlesnake boy. "You suddenly took my breath away. I'm just like you, bashful in the presence of the Vivian girls. On account of them, I've never had the nerve to think of it myself. And I have never dared to request any one to ask him, even if general Greathart wanted to do it. And yet he and the Vivian girl Princesses came themselves. They appeared to me like most beautiful Celestial children, with their guardian angel on horseback."

"It was certainly surprising that they came," said Penrod. "Maybe he and the Vivian girls with him were going to some important conference, and just by good fortune passed here, and stopped because they wanted to see it. . . . When the boys had finished talking about this, Penrod and the Rattlesnake thought it was time to go on their duty hour. General Greathart before this (give me a kiss) had requested the Rattlesnake boy to go on some important errand to general Richard Kinderknecht. He was to present himself at his headquarters at a certain hour, and receive a package which he was to guard with his life."

"But I believe it is better to let him go alone," said the general and said to the Rattlesnake boy. "It is more pleasing to him, as he desires to do it only himself. His main desire is to feel that he is trusted to go for the package alone."

So they parted at the corner of a company street, Penrod to march back to the general's headquarters, the Rattlesnake to execute his important mission. Penrod turned into one of the better and wider company streets through which he often passed on his way to his own headquarters, near Greathart's. It was indeed very fashionable quarters for officers of lower rank, for it contained a number of respectful tents, and barracks.

As Penrod marched quickly up the company street, he saw some child of startling beautiful appearance, of which he at first mistook for one of the Vivian girls. She was near the corner of another company street, and walk and plough slowly through the deep snow with a most decided limp down the middle of the pathway. It was a little girl probably his age, dressed like a girl scout, but in a gray uniform that appeared to have had a cyclone, but which had been quite elegant before, and the hat which she wore looked as if it had gone through the most violent treatment, and her hair was loose and tangled. One of her legs appeared to be bleeding, and she herself looked as if she had gone through some very unusual excitement. And also she had a foreign air, and it was this and her pitiful condition, which made Penrod look at her long enough to see that also she had graceful ways about her, and was quite lovely, and had a look of daring and defiance. As he watched her approach he began to wonder exceedingly, what nation she may have come from, for it was certain she was not of the Abbess-Anna Nationality. Even when she was at the distance of thirty yards, he could see that she had long beautiful golden hair which hung now loosely about her shoulders, and her mouth was a little curved, and she appeared to be a little heroine who never knew what it was not to smile, under any conditions. He thought to himself that she might be German, or even English.

Penrod was trying to decide to himself which of the two nationalities she belonged to, but as she drew nearer to him she quit smiling as it seemed, and she almost lost her balance, and would have fallen prone into the deep snow, if the boy had not suddenly leaped forward, and caught her. Fortunately she was slender, and not at all heavy, and Penrod being a very strong lad for his age managed to steady her. There was an expression of sharp anguish on her face as he aided her.

"I hope Miss, you are not badly hurt." He said to her in English, but it was evident she did not understand. He spoke in the Angolanian tongue, and then he observed she bit her lip, and clutched his shoulder, very hard with her hand.

"I've been shot in the leg, and twisted my other ankle in escaping through the deep snow," she answered. "I tripped on a tree branch hidden in the snow. I cannot speak English, and I'm afraid I have a very bad wound, and have twisted my foot most badly. I'm very grateful to you, for saving me, as I would have had a bad fall."

As he looked into her face he saw that her long blue eyes were very sweet and grateful. He tried to be braver and to smile, but nevertheless there was such distress under the effort, that Penrod was afraid she must have been more seriously injured than she felt, or believed.

"Can't you stand at all on your foot at all?" He asked.

"I can't stand hardly a little bit now," she said. "But I'm afraid I will not be able to stand at all in a few minutes. I must get to my own quarters, while I can bear to touch the ground with it. I feel so sorry that this had to happen. But a Scouting party of the enemy spotted me, and they were the Gargoylian Kurds. I'm sure I must have to ask you to help me to my tent. Fortunately it is only a hundred yards away."

"I believe we can make it," said Penrod finally. "I saw you approaching and from the way you walked, knew at once that something was wrong. If you are able to support yourself on my shoulder, I can help you to your tent. I am glad to do it. See the crowd of soldiers gathering, and their scowling faces. They are wondering how you got hurt, shall we try to make it now?"

This little girl was who really badly wounded in the leg, yet she had manners that was very soft and gentle, and her very appearance would have appealed to any boy, whether he liked girls or not. She had a musical bird like voice, and her enunciation was almost as exquisite as that of the Vivian girls. Whether she was of some foreign country, or not, it was very easy to imagine, that the little girl was a person held in high esteem by all soldiers for the crowds of Angolanians appeared furiously angry at her condition.

"If it pleases you," she answered. "I am very kind indeed. You are a very strong, I see. Just the same I am glad that we have only thirty yards to go, but it is cold."

She was resting gently on his shoulder, but it was evidently plain, that she suffered intense pain with every movement. As she limped and struggled on, she caught her lips, and Penrod noticed that her face turned white. Though he had not seen her until now, the boy could not help liking her. She was such a good patient little girl despite her misfortune, and so lovely, gracious, and brave. He could not stand it to see the suffering in her pretty face.

"I'm so sorry that this had to happen to you," he said as he helped her toward the tent she pointed out, and his boyish voice had something of the wonderful sympathetic tone of Emperor Jivian's. The beautiful little girl took notice of it, and thought it was very much unlike the voice of any ordinary boy she had ever known.

"I'll have to remove my stocking and shoe when we enter the tent," she said when they stood near the entrance.

Penrod helped her into the tent. With a sigh she sat down on the cot. The tent was large, white plain, and old fashioned inside but very neat.

"Shall I go outside the tent and call some soldier-physician? Physician to treat your wound," inquired Penrod.

"I'm afraid you could not find them," she answered truthfully. "Will you kindly close the tent entrance. I shall also be obliged to ask you to notify general Konstantin Aronburg where I am. I shall find all I want in the tent--if you will kindly hand me my medicine bag. Some persons may come to see me presently, perhaps one of the generals or the Jivian girls, and even if I am alone for a few hours or so, it will not disturb me as I know how to take care of myself."

"Perhaps if I go to general Greathart he will do something for you," suggested Penrod.

The beautiful child beamed sweetly at him.

"Why all that for me?" she said. "If my leg is wounded it is my own fault. I was out on a scouting tour with the Jivian girls early this morning, with their father, and we were apprehended by a party of Omarian guards and Gargolian Kurds. I arranged the scouting plan to accommodate them. We were attacked but escaped, though I was wounded. What a good kind hearted boy you are. Indeed I am sure I will be more comfortable soon. I can lie down on my cot until a doctor treats my wounded leg."

Penrod again helped her to her foot, but her sudden sharp cry of pain made him wince inwardly. From the fact that her stocking was blood soaked, and that she could not stand on her foot at all now, convinced him that it was a worse injury than she believed. The tent she occupied was of the first class order. It was large and high with something like a small dining room on the left hand, and also a sleeping quarters in the back. There was an easy chair with a small round table close to the cot, and on the table stood a candle stick holder with six candles and some other rather rare elegant trifles. Penrod slowly helped his beautiful child heroine to the main cot, and when she lay down placed an extra pillow under her wounded leg. He did it as gently as he could, and as he rose after he did it, he saw that the little girl was looking at him in a most curious way.

"I must go now and summon a doctor," he said with emotion. "But I'm almost afraid to leave you here alone. But you will have to have a doctor."

"What a dear good boy you certainly are," she exclaimed looking at him most gratefully. "But I do not believe you can not find one quick enough. Put I am very thankful to you just the same. I know what to do for a sprained ankle, and a wounded leg. And perhaps it is not so badly wounded as it looks, as the bullet did not penetrate my leg. I'm going to take off my shoe and stocking and see."

"May I help you if necessary?" Penrod asked pleadingly touched by the look of anguish on her face.

"No dear boy friend," she managed to gasp out. "I do not think the wound is very bad. And I do not fear at all." . . .

She however removed the stocking with the greatest difficulty, and the sight of the wound made Penrod feel faint indeed. He immediately secured clean water, and a rag, and cleaned away as much of the blood as he could. As she bravely helped, the wounded leg was soon redressed and rested in a better and more comfortable position on the extra pillow.

"Thank you, my dear boy, thank you," he said when he was through. "If it was not for you, I may have suffered greatly."

"Indeed I'm very happy to have been able to give you assistance."

Answered Penrod with an air of relief. "Now if you think you are all right and you are feeling easy, I believe believe I must go."

"Please don't leave me so soon yet," he said pleadingly as she held out her hand. "If I may say it, it would make me happier to know my hero better. I feel grateful I could kiss a you. I should like to have a good talk with you. And you surely have such beautiful manners for a boy of your age." She ended with a pretty smile, despite her pain. "And I'm almost certain that I know where you got them from."

"You are indeed very gracious and kind to a common boy scout Colonel Penrod answered while he wondered to himself if his face had reddened a little. "But it is time for me to go now, because general Greathart will think--"

"General Greathart will under any conditions allow you to remain, and have an interview with me," he said with a braver smile, and more kindness in her voice than before. "And I surely know that you have learned your beautiful manners from him. I know him and he is one of my best friends. I hope he knows where I am and has not forgotten me."

All the learning that Penrod had received, even all that he had trained himself to remember, quickly took possession of him at this moment. Penrod had a rapidly working brain, clear memory, and had never in his life lived like any ordinary boy. And here before him was a very beautiful little girl whom he had never seen before, of whom he knew nothing at all, but that she had been shot in the right leg by pursuing "landelinians", and had also twisted her foot badly in her desperate efforts to escape, and going to her rescue he had helped her all the way to her tent, and dressed her wounded leg. Yet he knew that silence was still the order to obey, that for the sake of the country's cause he had joined, it was not yet good for him to know certain important things, or to ask any kind of questions, or to give answer to them.

She might be as she appeared to be one of the loveliest girl children in the world next to the beautiful Jivian girls, and general Greathart and the Abbiemian princesses's dear friend but even if this was more than evident, he could best serve them all by obeying the commands of her friends with all the courtesy he could assume and not to forget any instructions he had even given.

"I do not believe that general Greathart ever forgets any of his friends," he answered.

"No I do not, believe he can ever forget me," she said in a soft tone. "Has he ever been in Jivian wickiey since the war began?"

There was a few moments pause before Penrod gave any answer.

"Perhaps I am not so well informed as you think I am," he said.

"I do not believe he has yet ever been in Jivian wickiey all his life."

"Not been in Jivian wickiey, I put you are Maroccan Penrod?"

"Yes Miss. That is my full name."

Suddenly the little girl rose halfway from the cot, and her lovely eyes appeared to be filled with fire (Maybe they were).

"Then I see you really are a good warrior, fighting on our side. And surely you know the terrible disaster that is threatening to overwhelm our nation. You have heard of, and know all the heinous cruelty and barbarous incident that has occurred in all parts of Jivian wickiey, especially Norma itself. Surely you have been with us long enough now to know all about it."

"Everybody cannot but help know about it," said Penrod. "Put to make a long story short, I was a witness to it also."

".....but Abbie-Annina is not your own Country-----not your own. Yet you take part with us. When you witnessed those terrible sights, your blood must have been burning in your veins."

Penrod at this stood still like a statue, and looked fixedly at her. She also looked at him, and she could see that his eyes gave evidence, whether or not her blood burned in his veins now even, but at this time he did not speak. There was however answer enough in the look that he gave her for just now he had no desire to say anything whatever.

"What does the great general Greathart think????? It's not an Abbie-annian myself. I was a child slave ever since I was four years old. But mine Nationality is, I do not know, but my whole heart and soul is for Abbie-annina. And I think of her holy cause, night and day. What does general Greathart think of the rumored report about the statement of the Glandelinians, that the Angelinians who are besieging Vivian wickie will never retake the city in ten years, even with the help of all the nations of the world, with all their women combined together as fighting soldiers? Does he believe all this?????"

Before he answered this serious question, Penrod began thinking very rapidly. The face of the beautiful child heroine was indeed glowing with emotion, and her beautiful voice was trembling with excitement. That she should not even know her own nationality, and love Abbie-annina and risk her very life for her cause, and pour forth her uttermost feeling to a boy she had never seen or known before, deeply moved him. But no matter how he was filled with emotion he remembered however that he must keep silent on any important thing he knew.

"It might be only false reports written in foreign newspapers." He said. "The general says one cannot always trust to such predictions. If you know him, you know he is very calm on such subjects.".....

"I observe he has taught you to keep calm also." she said in a pathetic tone that struck him strangely. "But then you are only a boy. Boys are ever calm, and I never knew women or little girls to be calm either when their tender hearts are wrung. Oh my poor Country far, far away, wherever it is. And oh how I pity the poor Abbie-annian country." And then with a sudden burst of sobbing, she hid her face in her hands. Penrod felt a great lump suddenly rise in his throat. He also felt as if he was ready to cry, but he knew it was useless, and also knew what she meant when she said her heart was broken. In a few minutes she lifted her head, and her eyes looked much softer, with the tears still in them.

"If I was a great general instead of a little girl, I would know what to do." she cried vehemently. "If there were a million generals like the Emperor, or Conscientious Aronburg, they too would know. They would force the fall of this big fortified city, and would end all this horror and war going on."

"Who would not end it now if they were able?".....cried Penrod quite fiercely. "But it is impossible. It can't be done...."

"But the highest, best trusted men in the Calverinian governments, men in the same offices, who are in secret league with the Glandelinian authorities in Glandelinia are responsible for all this." she insisted impetuously. "And great leaders like general Hanson, Vivian and others, who are real Abbie-annians surely don't think of this as I do. You see it is apparently impossible for me to help pouring out my most secret thoughts, even to a foreign boy, even if he is not an Abbie-annian. I'm afraid though that you are not interested. Only Abbie-annina's cause seems to worry nations to be very unimportant, these nations don't seem to even know at all that Abbie-annina is troubled with rank treachery within her own government. Men like general Greathart, and many others must think and plan, and feel that they must--- must find a way to recapture Vivian wickie. Even all women and children throughout the nation feel the same way about it. Even all boys do. Even you must. The great Emperor Vivian and his fair daughters cannot rest one moment knowing that millions of Abbie-annian hearts being shot through, and oceans of Abbie-annian blood pouring forth like a crimson tidal wave. They cannot do anything without upsets. One part of Calverinia's government is treacherous, and general Hanson Vivian cannot do or say anything...."

CHAPTER EIGHTEEN.

PENROD IS SEIZED BY TWO PROFESSIONAL GLANDELINIAN SPIES BUT REFUSES TO ANSWER THEIR QUESTIONS.....OR GIVE THEM ANY INFORMATION CONCERNING JENNIE TURNER.....WHO SHE IS.....AND WHERE SHE IS.

"In spite of the good control Penrod had of himself he started at those words. He knew this was true and felt as if the Calvinian government of its treacherous members had stuck Abbiannina in the back. How could she who had no country of her own know all this and be able to utter those words in her presence? As big as Penrod was for his age, he suddenly appeared bigger, and the beautiful little girl heroine saw that he did.

"The Abbiannian and Calvinian governments, cannot help it and will soon get a good cleanup and cast the treacherous members so secretly among them." He said slowly and indignantly. Despite being only beautiful, the young girl was very clever, and also shrewd, and though her statements had been somewhat true, she saw that she had made a great mistake in talking so to him, that it had been better for her to keep it secret.

"You must forgive me, but it is the truth just the same." She exclaimed. "I was excited and used the words a little too strong. That is always the way with me and little girls of my type. Of course I know that all the real true country loving Abbiannians are giving their heart and strength and their whole being to Abbiannina's cause, von many of those who are compelled to remain in foreign countries for serious reasons."

Penrod suddenly saw her give a joyful start and then turn her head to listen to the sound of galloping horses, and the clanking of sabre scabbards.

"It's a body of cavalry officers coming to see me," she said. "I think they are the ones I went on the mission with the vivian girls for."

"When you won't be alone when I leave," said Penrod. "I'm glad your escort has come. I will now say Good afternoon. May I tell general Greathart your name?" "Tell me you are not shy of me or angry with me for my awkward statements," she said pleadingly.

"I'm sure you're not mistaken, I know that," answered Penrod gently. "I myself know that, as an ally fell into the possession of the enemy, through the treachery of the secret force in the National governments. You couldn't be mistaken about it."

"No I'm sure I'm not," he repeated with the same emphasis on the words. She then wrote her name on a slip of paper, and folding, gave it to him.

"General Greathart will remember my name," she said. "It is Jennie Francis Turner. I hope he will let me see him as soon as my leg gets better, and I'll tell him how good you was to me."

Then she shook his hand warmly, and let him go. But just as he reached the tent opening she spoke again.

"Oh may I ask you to do one more thing before you leave me," he said suddenly. "I know you won't mind as it concerns your own safety. Will you go out the tent by the side entrance. I know enemies in disguise may have seen you do this for me, and they may see you and seize you. I shall not mind being alone, if I'm sure you are safe."

"If I'm safe. Why I defy the whole world," said Penrod. "I believe you do, but be careful nevertheless," she smiled back at him. Penrod went out by the side entrance, and soon was talking down the company side but avoiding the deeper snow.

CHAPTER EIGHTEEN.

PENROD IS SEIZED BY PROFESSIONAL GLANDOLPHIAN SPIES BUT REFUSES TO ANSWER THEIR QUESTIONS, OR GIVE THEM ANY INFORMATION CONCERNING JENNIE TURNER.

IN THE MEANTIME SOMETHING MORE UNUSUAL WAS GOING ON. Two strange persons dressed in the Angelinian uniform were hiding between two large tents. One of the strangers appeared a somewhat slim and tall, and had all the features of Augustus Pratt in the gaily jeweled but of more heavy build, smoothly shaven, and appeared like a captain. The other was also heavy built, but was middle sized like Jaff, but wore a black beard and short moustache.

"Even if we did seize that boy scout, we would not be able to do anything with him," said the middle sized man at once in a very soft whisper, speaking in a tone as if what he said was very firm. "The squadron of Kurds manage to pursue that little female wild cat clear into the lines before one of the soldiers who was a marksmen shot her, and she managed to escape despite the wound in her leg, and despite her fall, but it was because of the aid of that buttinsky foreign boy scout. I see from the looks of his face that the lad is amiable, with manners very perfect, and it may not be very easy to surprise him by suddenly laying hold of him out here in the open where there are so many soldiers about. We would be arrested and shot as spies. And also as we are in the heart of the Christian camp we must be extremely careful. But why I want him for, is to force him to tell where he brought that wild Angelinian girl spy. After he encounters her. But I believe we cannot force him to say anything. It generally can be done with young children who are timid. But he, I'm sure will tell nothing, as he may have been trained to hold his tongue under any conditions. At first I thought he was a very stupid and conceited keed, but he is not, and is highly spirited. But if scared boys of any kind can be made to tell anything, instead of seizing him out here in the opening of the Company Street, we could trap him.

We could surprise him by one of us pretending to be injured, and making a very pathetic scene about the war, and the condition of the Vivian plucky, because I could prove that he is a boy who is easily worked up. We could also try him, with the rumor about the lost Vivian girls. Princess's but instead of truth in it, it may be a trick of the Nationals, and he may know it, and therefore not be fooled. Maybe we could try to make him lose his temper, and betray the girl's hiding place, in defending the Vivian girls, by insulting them in front of him, whom he thinks or knows are his best friends. But then it may also be a mistake to tackle him on that."

He spoke very quickly but in a whisper, and under his breath. The other man also spoke quickly in answer. "I don't know, unless he is still with that wildcat. He may come along in a few minutes, and then we can capture him. Listen. All the Angelinian Christian dogs think he is a brave innocent boy scout. He sees in that girl and also Violet and her sisters only as gentle angels. Nothing on oath will shake his faith in them so much as to hear me tell stirring falsehoods about them. It will probably be a great shock to him, such a shock that it will be possible that you can make him reveal where he placed that Jennie Turner girl. We may scare him so much also by dandy threats so harrowing that he will be frightened, and lose control of ourselves. If that does no good, we will really carry through our threats. You know he is only a young show off."

"You may be right, and you may not," said the tall man. "But maybe when he finds he is our prisoner, and that we will not allow him his freedom to go, it may alarm him so much that we may obtain from him other information that is worth while to us."

"If we could find out what she and the Vivian girls discovered before they were seen by the squadron of troopers. If we could find out what is true about that she discovered or what she believes is true we should be able to warn our general, or nab her before she reports her discovery to general Vivian. It will also be a clue to work from," he said.

"We have very little time," the tall man declared. "As soon as we finish this mission we will have to go to Norma Catherine at once. Even we must be there before midnight."

"Let's hide ourselves," said the short man. "There is a boy coming down the Company street now and he looks like the one we want."

Penrod came up to the place where the two strangers were hiding. Here was there chance. At this moment there was no one in sight at this part of the camp. Therefore when Penrod reached the opening between the two tents, a heavy black sack was instantly thrown over his head, and drawn tight.

An hour and a half passed. Penrod was standing in the center of a room of a large house near or within sight of the rebel fortifications near Vivian plucky, and in the heart of the enemy's lines. The short man looking indeed like Jeff was sitting down in a easy chair of large size, and the tall man was standing by it. The short man with the large dark beard looked fierce and very ferocious despite his funny Jaff features.

"I'm sorry we had to do this to you Master Penrod," the tall man said apologetically. "But you see we need you. I and my companion here are looking for important information."

"Well then you will have to oblige yourself by looking for it somewhere else," answered Penrod. "You two pe played a dirty trick on me."

The short man immediately rose from the chair with a scornful smile, and stood up straight and haughtily. And at his first movement Penrod saw that he was a dangerous man indeed.

"You are a kidnapper," he exclaimed. "You are a kidnapper of Angelinian boy scouts. The Gemini will scour and comb and turn the world upside down to get you for this."

"We do not believe the Christian dogs know about this. It doesn't hurt us anyway," the short man answered with his wicked and scornful smile. "What makes you think they'll get us? We'll never be captured alive. We are too desperate for that, and that is our orders, never allow ourselves to be taken alive. You know some thing very important, and we are bound to find out if possible."

At this Penrod felt his breathless for a moment.

"We made you our prisoner because we know who you are," he added with a scowl now. "I and my companion wish to find out certain important things, that we are sure you know."

"The first thing is, where did you leave that wounded girl scout," said the tall man. "She knows a lot of things about the Heights of Angelinia, and of the Lucille Jackson fortifications in general, and she has found a spot where the Vivian girls can enter the safest part of Vivian plucky and a spy on the child slave concerns which they plan to do soon, and through her and then them, all the Angelinian generals will know it, and also you know where she is hiding, as you have been with her. It is absolutely necessary for the sake of our cause, that we should obtain all the information you can give us. And another thing. Unless you answer all the questions, I shall ask you, we will not only refuse to allow you your freedom, but if possible will take you so far into Vivian plucky, that it will be impossible for you to escape."

Now the boy Penrod realized what the persons were who kidnapped him, and he understood why. He had heard general Greatheart and others speak of dangerous glandolinian spies, military, professional, and even political, and many were even men women and children, who were trained to do the work, and who were paid enormous sums to trace the persons that the glandolinian governments de sired to have followed, and observed, or assassinated and captured: even ordinary plain clothes men, or police men, detectives, secret agents, or service men, military agents and persons who knew all portions of the country well, were even often drafted and trained for this work, and they were so determined a lot, that they never allowed themselves to be taken alive. Penrod also knew it was their work to search out and discover the utmost hidden secrets, to disguise themselves and pretend to serve with the Angolinian camps as Christian soldiers. Penrod believed that these two men were two secret service men, or great professional spies, who were paid not by generals but by the glandolinian government, to follow after some escaped Christian spy, who had succeeded in eluding the pursuers, and taken refuge within the Christian lines. Penrod realized this the case of the little girl who was wounded, because she herself was a spy, and a patriot to Abbia-nunia despite her unknown nationality. He did not know however that these two had been within the very Christian lines for two and a half months already, and had escaped detection so far, because of their great shrewdness.

They had already so to speak, accomplished many things during their pretended service to the Angolinian cause: they had fully made great discoveries of the strength of the armies under the two yivian rulers, and their generals, the formation and power of the besieging works under general Manson, the various intentions of all the high high National generals, and of the concentration of Emperor yivians main and fiercest armies upon Jonnie yivian town, and the Evangelina Heights beyond Katy Dike Creek near Sunstone run. They had also discovered general Groatheart, and had learned to know all of his outgoings, and in,comings, and also of the plans and movements and doings of the yivian girls, and the boy scout, so much dreaded by the glandolinians called "The Rattlesnake".

But they felt sure it was possible to learn other very important things: perhaps Angelina, or Angolinia Aronburg, as her right name was, knew all about the defenses of yivian wickey, and the rebel armies there, and so did Jonnie, who was the boy rescued. Therefore knowing her purpose, they went to outwit her or the other girl spies at no matter what the cost. They believed from the fact that they could see the boy was a foreigner, that he could easily be startled, and even terrified into telling all, and that it might be to their best advantage, to have received all this information, before they hastily left this section of the rebel camp, and crossed the Great yivian river leaving the "CHRISTIAN DOGS" to discover for themselves how their well laid plans had been so cleverly frustrated. And it would also be Penrod's undoing if he told. More strange things however were happening in Penrod's calm mind. He knew that these two disguised men were some of the most shrewd of glandolinian spies. But this was not all. The lovely little girl heroine was right when she gave him the warning before he left her tent. And he had unheeded it. And now he had received his first shock, his first real adventure. His young chest swelled, and he looked as defiant as a cobra about to strike. In all his young life, he had never yet come to face black treachery before. He could not comprehend it at all. The rascals had openly kidnapped him within the very Christian lines, and brought him into the enemy's lines, and relieved him of his weapons and even uniforms, and shoes and stockings.

The gentle and friendly little girl with the soft bird like grateful voice more like the voice of a swan, and grateful loving innocent eyes, had pleaded to him to do her a last favor before he left the tent-----pleaded, beseeched him to be careful, and yet he had allowed himself to be captured by two sneaking spies like this. It seemed impossible for him to believe it to be true. Yet the presence of the two glandolinian secret service men, and himself standing there with only his undergarments on told him it was a sure fact.

Then it flashed suddenly through his mind, the moment he had sprung to help the little girl, and her grateful look. And while he had been sorry for her pain, and had winced at the sound of her piteous exclamation, and had helped her treat her wound, these rascals had deliberately been laying a trap for him, to force him to betray her-----yes betray her. For a few minutes he felt stunned-----perhaps if he had not been trained with a cool mind, he might have only been shocked. But he recovered more than a shock. There slowly began to arise within his breast a high feeling of disgust and disdain for his captors. As he gazed directly in into the pupils of the tallest man, his boyish face felt as if it had grown taller, than that of the glandolinian.

"You two rascals I think you are very clever." He said speaking slowly. Then there was a few seconds pause, and then he added. "I was too careless and too proud, when I thought glandolinians could not enter the Christian lines, and surprise unsuspecting persons. But there are more clever clever persons than you two."

The odd middle sized man gave an uneasy laugh, and then spoke to his companion. "The boy is very defiant." He said. "And as I look at him I believe it is true that he would rather suffer perdition than tell anything."

The tall man now looked angry and ferocious. Indeed he had a savage looking face, his eyes even had a savage expression, and his face turned red. Penrod believed by the way the rebel gazed and glared at him that the glandolinian glandolinian hated children no matter who they were or how good or bad they were, and that the scoundrel was made fierce and ferocious by the mere sight of Penrod, probably for some strange mysterious reason.

"Two hours before that girl escaped into the Christian lines" He said. "Three officers in the Geminis Regalia, besides the yivian girls and some others, were with her. They tried to enter Manley's lines for two purposes. First to find out a spot to enter the city so they could learn the conditions of the child slaves, and this they succeeded. The second was they tried to enter Manley's headquarters to assassinate him. This they failed. Thirty glandolinian soldiers were killed and a hundred wounded with no loss to the fugitives. The Geminis looked like black Oncoms. They were outside our whole line the whole entire day despite how cold and snowy it was, writing down and drawing every thing they saw or heard. One of the yivian girls had with her a roll of parchment which during the excitement of the clash, pursuit, and retreat, she gave to Angolinia Aronburg, who tore through the column of pursuers like a cyclone and escaped after killing all her pursuers. So Jonnie, who she next gave the parchment who being shot in the leg entered the Christian lines. And is that not true since you aided her, that you know where she is?"

"Yes I certainly know where she is!" Answered Penrod.

"Well where is she?"

"I will tell nothing, what ever." said Penrod.

"Before she and her followers escaped, she herself was in Norma Catherine for months pretending to be a child slave. The yivian girls despite their narrow escape during the slaughter went there once in November again to see her. They were there for three days, and she and they saw many spy friends, interfered with the child slavery, and planned to cause a great fire at the Bell-Mell-Tell-Mell Child Slave Prison, and the yivian girls through the general help of this Angolinia Aronburg, and Jonnie, who she escaped through the "Reign of Terror in safety. I demand you Master Penrod to tell us where she is hiding herself if you value your life."

"I shall tell nothing." Said Penrod with determination in his tone.

"Though she and the yivian girls are much dreaded now, I believe you are becoming more and more dangerous, especially in making companion ship of that 'Rattlesnake' boy scout, and you yourself being a foreigner, and an accursed renegade Canadian-----have spent your whole life-----with that general Groatheart. You know most of the European languages, as if you were a courier for the whole world, or the highest portiers in any Viennese Hotel. Taking advantage of this to use thotongues to help the Angolinian generals in their gun schemes and designs. And you know the Geogrp Geography of the Angolinian and Abbia nia at times by heart. Is it not so?"

Penrod refused to answer, but gave him a very saucy, and defiant look.

The short glandelinian soldier then arose from the chair, and said in an indignant tone to his tall companion; "I know that girl Angelina Aronburg well. She for the use of her disguise refuses to tell her own real nationality as well as Jennie Turner, and uses the name 'Gertrude Angeline' for unknown reasons. She had a sister whose name was Annie Aronburg, but who was killed for posing as a runaway child slave when spying on Federal Government property. Her uncle is that 'part y christian dog', General Concentinian Aronburg, who for the same unknown reason as his niece calls himself by the German name of Wilhelmberger Zimmermann. She started her work as a daring spy, and also as an adventuress to avenge the loss of her sister. She though is an Abissinian from the State of Dandobia, and also her sister and uncle. I found that out by going through the Aronburg Records in the city of Lucy Lane Dandobia. And we know what she is. So far she has accomplished more than any christian spy known, either more than this boy here or his companion or the 'vivan' girls. The people and police, and every one in every city, town, or village in 'landelinia, or in Abissinian, nay in the whole world, knows that she is a great sharper for her cause, and a dreadful female wild tigersess as well, and as the most dangerous spy in the world, and yet with all her shrewdness, she pretends the 'vivan' girls aid her, that all boys scouts help her when in peril, when in fact she aids them, and never was captured. All 'landelinians dread her because she can shoot with her two pistols so quickly as if and fast that she can shoot twelve men down in nearly a moments time.

And what in the world did she do with the immense reward, the Great Emperor 'vivan gave her for entering the norma Catherine section of 'vivan 'Wickey, to see and reveal everything going on there, and on reporting things she observed at the Great Lucilla Pickens and other fortifications. This Penrod, or 'vivan lad does not even know what and who she is because he probably he never saw her. It may be also true that he is more stubborn than he looks, and that nothing will make him tell where he left Angelina Aronburg's lieutenant Jennie Turner who was wounded in the leg. Or perhaps it is positively true that he has been so spoiled by her pretty face, and flattering words, that for that reason he refuses to speak. There is also a look in his eyes, that proves that when we nabbed him, we nabbed a young Rattlesnake. He's been both spoiled, and bribed by her pretty look, and childish swag.

The man spoke the truth indeed, but as he did so he did it without looking at Penrod at all, and he spoke in a fashion, and with the great ostentatiousness and abruptness as if some feeling of great anger had overcome him.

He believed that Penrod was very sensitive about the little girl spy he had aided, and the rasol felt sure that if he insulted her or even Aronburg in his presence, he would be angry, and in his anger his very face would reveal something if he did not speak out-----especially if he understood the Abissinian tongue indeed, which was useful for the 'landelinians to find out, as that alone would be a real cause to prove other things they wished to discover. But both were really disappointed, as there was no chance in his face, and neither did the blood rise to his face. He appeared to show no interest in what the shorty said, but his face appeared to be blank cold, and very polite. Let those rascals say what they pleased. He would tell them nothing. The short man twisted his mustache with a furious hand, then monkeyed with his beard, and then scowled fiercely at Penrod as he said;

"We know the easiest and shortest way into 'vivan 'Wickey. Nobody but us and the glandelinian soldiers can get in and out. The glandelinians in the city are more fierce and savage than those outside here in the garrisons or in Mac-Holleston Johnston's army. And we'll take you into norma Catherine far across the river, and you probably will never get out, or see your friends again or live another day, if you still refuse the questions my companion has asked you. You think because the christian armies besieging 'vivan 'Wickey, are so strong that nothing can happen to you, or other boys and also girls, even near the outer limits of the Abissinian camps, even where numerous and immense scouting parties ride back and forth. But you'll soon realize that you're more than mistaken. If you yelled this minute you might cause attraction, or a scouting party to come and investigate, but we would kill you on the spot, and easily make out get away. We only brought you into this house with the purpose to question you, and so if you yelled, and we killed you, we would burn it down with you in it without mentioning the reason to any one. If we choose to even have you placed before a 'landelinian firing squad without any reason at all, we can do it. And if you enter 'vivan 'Wickey, because we brought you there, you may remain there as long as the Insurrectos are in possession. Where you to cry out nothing would help you now. Will you tell us where to find that girl spy Jennie Turner?"

"I said before that I will reveal nothing whatever," said Penrod. "You might be thrown into one of those prisons, and killed, or might be enslaved and remain a slave for a longer time than is pleasant to you, before you ever get free." The short man said more coolly. "Where is she hiding?"

"I will tell you nothing, come what may," said Penrod. "I tell you that I know a more about the 'landelinians in norma Catherine than you do Penrod. They are cruel like the heartless fiends. By the time you found yourself there only a few days, you might find it all to hapless and hopeless to even escape across a street. Did you leave her in any particular tent?"

"It is useless to ask me any more questions as I will not answer a word," said Penrod.

"You are a little fool to risk it," put in the tall man seriously. "I tell you norma Catherine just now is a world of hades, worse than Dante's Inferno. Don't take the chances by going there for refusing to tell."

"I will tell nothing at all," answered Penrod, but he gave him such a look that he winced. He made the robe, feel very uncomfortable. "I do not think you are a boy who has ever been beaten or ill treated by any one," he said. "I tell you fairly and squarely that it will be a hard experience to go into norma Catherine or any part of 'vivan 'Wickey. I advise you to act wise and don't go there, by answering our questions."

But this time Penrod did not speak at all. He looked at both of the disguised glandelinians as if he was some accusing angel. He knew however without the slightest doubt that what the short bearded glandelinian said, was more than true. If he dared to cry out, or yelled, to attract the attention of any scouting parties, they would surely kill him, and turn the house down to hide their crime. And if they brought him into norma Catherine, there was no telling what the glandelinians would do to him there, as they were more ferocious than a huge mass of mad wolves suffering from hydrophobia.

And if they really carried out their threat, and left him in that section of 'vivan 'Wickey, there was no telling how many days would begin to pass before he was missed, and all the christian generals would then suspect, that he had been kidnapped, or how long it would be before the Angolinian generals would start scouting, and scouring the whole country, and sent parties to roam the world in search for him. And it would be probable that general Greatheart or the Rattlesnake boyscout were already missing him, and though neither had the faintest idea of knowing where he was, the general would be gathering the Gemini to make a search. And by that time, he would be far away in 'vivan 'Wickey. And just because he would not betray the trust of a little girl heroine. He did not know what to do. He only knew he was making a sacrifice for her.

"It's a long, long way to 'vivan 'Wickey from here," the short man said. "You would rather be in Hades than there. Please be wise, and tell us the hiding place of that little girl spy."

"I cannot and will not tell you anything," said Penrod. "I cannot and will not tell you anything," said the tall man. "I'm going to make an example of this rascal. For a boy scout. He's more stubborn than even the Angolinian boys are." "He may tell us after he has been locked in this place, this lonely place for a full week without anything to eat or drink," said Shorty. "Come Master Penrod, with me."

The glandelinian spy then placed his powerful thamy hand on Penrod's naked shoulder, and showed him without a gentle hand forward. The rebel expected he would make a struggle, but he did not. He remembered what general Greathart had said about brave and determined boyscouts. It was his first trial now but somehow he had suddenly a feeling of strong hush haughtiness, and defiance instead of being so afraid. He then was led roughly through a long narrow hallway toward the back of a stairway, and then up a long flight of rickety steps, which Penrod believed led to some dark attic. Then after reaching the top he was then marched through a wider but ill lighted flagged passage to another flight of steps, when the attic was reached. The door in the ceiling below the attic was worked on hinges, and the lock which was a bolt was on the outside. At this moment the door was closed, but not locked. The captor made Penrod open it, and go up into it first, and then Penrod observed that the attic was utterly without windows, and was so dark inside that he could not see anything. As soon as he was in, the rebel closed and bolted the trap door. Penrod stood as still as a statue in the midst of erebus darkness. The enslave then made sure the bolt was secure.

"You added the girl spy when she was wounded. Will you tell where she is if hiding?"

"I will answer no more questions," declared Penrod. "It's no use to any me further."

"You are one of the biggest young boy fools in the world," the glandelinian spy fiercely replied. "I believe you are a spy for the christians, and know much more than we ever think you do. General Greathart and all your friends will certainly be very anxious, when they find you are not within the christian lines. We may come back in three or four hours and take you into 'jivian' wicky if possible. I will let you know however that we have recently received disturbing news and rumors that the Nationals are massing like an enormous flood upon Jennie 'jivian' own, and also Evangelina Grania, and that there will be a big battle soon. The information we have already received makes it necessary for us to leave for the glandelinian positions in a big hurry. We may not come back and you may remain here, and face starvation for we placed some little friends in there before you came that will make it sure you will never escape unless you wish to die attempting it. Better be wise and tell us what we wish to know, while there is yet time."

But Penrod did not say a word. He stood with his back against the wood wooden wall, and remained motionless and silent. For a few moments there was absolute quiet, and then he heard the footsteps of the glandelinians moving away. Soon again all was silent, the last distant echo dying away, and when he was sure no one was there, Penrod suddenly drew a long breath of evident relief.

At this moment a rush of most strange feelings swept over him. He suddenly found himself facing the awful situation, it had not been at all easy to realize what all his thoughts really were at this moment, for they were coming so thick and fast. He could not believe the evidence of his eyes and ears. A few hours ago only a few hours ago he had helped a wounded but cunning Angelinian girl spy to her tent, a little girl who was pretty and very grateful and kindly acquaintance, and now because he refused to reveal her hiding place, he was locked in an attic so dark, that he could not even now see his hand before his face.

And what did the short man and his tall companion want to do with all the information they already knew—even what a good use could they make of the things they had tried to force him to confess. Penrod stood up more straightly and braced up more stoutly. He felt sure that if he kept cool, and thought patiently he would think of some way to escape from his attic prison. He had this idea because he and general Greathart had always since the war began, talked of the most absorbing incidents, and also fascinating things, they had observed since its outbreak. Penrod always believed that God gave a person a power in his thoughts, and even strange fascinating strength in the use of them. He knew that the most clever thoughts could pass through his mind if he allowed them. Many times general Greathart told stories to Penrod of many heroes and heroines, who being captured by the enemy, cleverly escaped by using their thoughts to the fullest extent. When general Greathart told these stories, and talked of the heroes and heroines, Penrod felt as if he were listening to some very important and marvelous story, which was more than true. Even in his own scouting tours which had been frequent, Penrod had dared to visit the most dangerous portions of the enemy's lines without encounters with the insurgents and had learned and seen many things among the foe lines, which seemed more than marvelous to the boy, and all the movements of the enemy, he had observed, had thought him deep thinking. He had also discovered through days of experience when hard pressed by pursuers that when he desired a thing to be accomplished and used clear and exalted thoughts, he never met such a thing as failure.

He had discovered this mainly when a squadron of swift Abyssinians caverly came up in time to intercede between him and his ruthless pursuers. From his recent thrilling experiences therefore he had learned to understand what way and what use he should put his thoughts when in peril, or confined in a place that is very difficult to escape from. And what Penrod had believed himself he had thought his whole regiment a few days after he had it fully mobilized.

The best thing he thought was as follows:

ITH I/Th

Number One. "Always some one says it can't be done, there is no such thing as Can't. Here there's a will there's a way. On what will it be best to think about first? On an escaping plan." was what he said to himself, as he now stood still in the total dark darkness, which to him was like the fabled caves of erebus.

He waited for fully five minutes, expecting the right thought to come to him. He will think of the brave Jivian girls, and how they managed to escape from Jivian Wicky. He said at last, all he had heard about them was indeed a most wonderful story to him, and the most favorite. General Greathart who had been at Dorothy Gale during the time this occurred, had traveled far to see these marvelous girl heroines, and what he had heard during his interview with Emperor Jivian had made changes in his own life. The part of the story which Penrod suddenly remembered, was these very words:

"Let pass through thy mind Master Penrod, the chief and only reason why Violet and her sisters managed to escape from Jivian Wicky when it seemed utterly impossible, they first meditated upon their own situation, and upon the ardent wishes of their hearts, seeing first that it could not be a hopeless thing with their guardian with them in due disguise. Then quickly but surely they and their aide thought of one plan after another, which as to them seemed to take earthly form, and draw nearer to them. Finally a thought came to them which brought general Evans the means to help them make their escape."

"I don't see why I should be afraid of those two wicked glandelinian spies," said Penrod almost half aloud. "If I but try I'll find some way to get out of this place."

These were the thoughts which he tried to keep steadily in his young mind—that no one not even anything, could make him afraid, and that he could get out of the attic some way. He thought of this for a long time, and repeated the words over and over again for a few minutes. After he had done this, he began to feel more like himself again.

"When my eyes are used to this velvet darkness, I shall hope to see if there is any other attic besides the trap door. Or some implement I can use to break it open," he said next.

He waited a long time with patience, but he could not get his eyes used to the intense darkness, nor could he see the slightest glimmer of light, or a window covered over.

Finally with caution, he put out his hands on either side of him, and after some time realized on the side of the wall against which he had stood, there were no abrasions to show that an attic window had been there. From this Penrod believed that this attic had been used for many unknown purposes, and that if that was positive, it could be seen then why it had no window, and there even might not be any opening for the slightest ventilation. Yet it was warm there warmer than for comfort, though the air was not yet bad, but now the trap door had been shut, and bolted on the outside.

"There is no use of me being afraid," he repeated to himself. "I shall not and will not have any fear. I shall and must get out of here somehow." Knowing that to think of general Greatheart would only arouse his greatest emotions, and cause him to lose courage, he did not therefore allow himself to stop and think of the general or of the Rattlesnake boy comrade waiting for his return. Slowly but in a cautious manner he began to feel his way along the attic walls. He found to his evident surprise that it reached further than he ever expected it would. The boy had thought that the attic was very small, but now he realized it was very large indeed. He decided to make his way round it gradually, and with the utmost care, and he started to do so, with the purpose of making his way clear around it. But a strange sound which he had often heard before even in southern Texas where he once spent a summer with his parents made him stop. Thinking it nothing and that his fears were foolish he decided to try and make his way across it, with his hands extended before him, and to set each foot down cautiously. But before he made this movement he sat down on the smooth wooden and partly sandy floor, and began thinking again, and what he thought of was the things he had heard of what the Vivian Girls did, despite all peril, and that surely there must be a way out of this dark attic for him, and that in some way, he must and should find it, and before those two glendelinians returned to bring him to Vivian's room.

While he was thinking in this manner he stretched his foot out, and the boys heard a loud scraping sound on the floor. At this moment he heard the same noise again, and it was very startling indeed. It seemed as if he had been struck dumb with uncontrollable terror.

A shrill whistling and rattling sound very much like the cry of a cricket, but a hundred times louder was coming from the center of the attic floor. The sound was sharp and distinct in that quiet attic made Penrod jump as if he had received a shock. If the sound had been light and soft it would not have startled him so much, and he was sure he had not imagined it. Good God, was he in that attic alone with a Rattlesnake? For a moment he felt a sort of panic seize him. Expecting it would strike at him in the dark, he suddenly rose and stood up, and leaned tightly against the wall. He hoped by his quick movement he would have placed himself at a position at some point of the attic, he had not reached at all, and that if the loathsome creature struck, it would miss.

Whether it really was one or not he could not make sure, for even now his eyes were not yet accustomed to the intense darkness. But as he remained perfectly still the noise also gradually stopped. Feeling somewhat relieved he turned his head to listen for the sound again, and then made a sudden discovery. A little above about two feet there appeared to be some aperture in the attic wall where the crepuscular darkness was not quite so black. He believed he found something like a hole or wide slit in the wall, but for a moment he thought the sound may have come from there. Whatever the aperture was, he knew it did not open to the outside, for no daylight entered, but nevertheless though it admitted no light of any kind, it only admitted a shade of darkness that was for some reason less dense. Penrod felt that what he discovered, was better than nothing at all, and hearing no further sound he breathed easier.

"That may have been something else for a beginning," he said to himself. "But I must find a way to get out of here. I shall I shall, I shall." He then on purpose picked up something he found on the floor beside him, and threw it toward the center of the floor. At once the noise was repeated, much more vigorously, and louder, and not only from the center of the room but from every corner and other points as well. It was now a perfect tumult. He felt terrified indeed. Within the world were those things. Then suddenly he recalled to his mind something he remembered.

He had once read the story of a man who being shut up in an empty cellar by some accident, discovered by the light of a match, that he was alone with half a dozen poisonous reptiles, of the Adder variety. It is said the serpents when not bothered never touch a human, but the man passed through such terrors before he was released from the cellar that he believed the snakes had already bitten him, and he died of convulsions caused by his fright.

"His wild thoughts did that," said Penrod. "I must remember to control myself no matter what danger I face. I will sit down again, and be very quiet, and think of everything I have seen outside of Vivian's room. It may take some time, but as long as I remain quiet, the things won't strike."

Indeed it was a very good plan, a life saving plan at that. There was a twelve foot diamond rattlesnake in the center of the room with him, and others in the corners and some by the walls, having been placed there by the rebel spies through a secret opening, in the hope that the serpents would fang the boys to death, should he make any attempts to escape before they returned to bring him to Vivian's room.

Penrod to keep his excitement down, kept his mind upon the scouting tours he had made, to while away the dull dull hours. Anyhow he could not think of anything else now, as this required the closest attention, and perhaps as the day went on his two captors would begin to think, the serpents would have already done away with him, and would not dare run the risk of doing such a desperate thing as coming to the Christian lines, as they too having disappeared from the ranks would be missed, and the reason of their sudden disappearance, and of Penrod's unusual absence known. Knowing that general Greatheart may have sent large masses of searchers for them, and Penrod, and telegraphed to every portion of the lines, they might think it might be wiser to go to Vivian's room alone without him, and not do much as to dare to show up near the House. In every case Penrod learned enough by reading stories, and the teachings he had received, that any person that lets his mind run wild, will meet harm in all its aspects. The mind of any person can be imagined as either some great engine, with a broken gear flying in all directions, or to some gigantic powerful machine under perfect control, was what he had heard and read. He had thought of some of the Lucille Pickens fortifications, and imagined he had walked through a four or five of their interior sections, and when turning mentally into a sixth, when he again was startled violently by the same sound, but uncomfortably near him. This time the sound was at the right of his right foot was one of the worst he realized it absolutely was a Rattlesnake. And it and probably many others were in the dark attic with him, and close to his right foot was one of the greatest. But how near it was to him he did not know. He did not even have a single match with him, one of the two rebels having taken everything he had. And the sudden thought of meeting in such intense darkness the cold terror that strikes certain death frightened him more than ever, but he kept perfectly quiet. He feared however that the reptiles were hearing his loudly beating heart. It was indeed a blank mystery to him how the serpents could be in the attic. It was a mystery which would have indeed taxed the best powers of Sherlock Holmes himself, should he had been in Penrod's place that moment. In fact poisonous snakes of any kind do not exist in the Angelinian countries on account of the Great Belongingness Creatures, and those known there are only kept in captivity, and there is a heavy death penalty imposed on those having them, if from carelessness or other causes, or otherwise, allow any of these reptiles to escape and some one is bitten and dies. None of the Angelinians would bear to see these venomous serpents at large. Penrod of course being new to the country did not know this. To any one of the Angelinians, an argument would make it plain, that this diamond rattlesnake and the others did not get into the attic of their own accord. And no person with an honest desire would even allow a venomous reptile to work its way into a house where it is certain people are living.

It could have been evident that this these serpents was or had been stolen from some circus that had been raided by rebels, because they had surely not escaped, and no person could be allowed to even buy one from a circus.

He then on purpose picked up something he found on the floor beside him, and threw it toward the center of the floor. At once the noise was repeated, much more vigorously, and louder, and not only from the center of the room but from every corner and other points as well. It was now a perfect tumult. He felt terrified indeed. Within the world were those things. Then suddenly he recalled to his mind something he remembered.

manager or owner. What then was the explanation of the extraordinary by reason that Penrod that he was alone with a unknown number of big rattlers. To him no plausible explanation seemed to be possible, except that the reptiles had gotten into the house sometime before winter set in through a hole that may be on one side of the house, and worked themselves somehow up the steps, and into the attic, while the trap door was open, but unknown to him it really was an attempt by the two rebel spies to place the snakes in the attic for the purpose of a most subtle murder, to cover their escape into the rebel lines. Any one probably knows that if a person is bitten by a Rattlesnake, he dies with certainty, and speed, depending on where the reptile struck him. The snake is also said to cause such small pin like pricks with its fangs that they are almost impossible to be found on the victim's body.

and it is positive, that the action of the reptiles poison is such, and the amount of the deadly venom so small, that if Penrod was bitten by this rattlesnake, and died, these two murders might easily rely upon no tell tale evidence, after he was found, and a post mortem examination of the murdered boy had been made. And death caused by the bite of a Rattlesnake, is said to be principally due to either congealing or coagulation of the blood, which then failing to circulate, quickly brings all the vital functions to a stop.

And there is no specific poison in the blood of a person bitten by a snake, which could be isolated enabling a doctor to say positively "This man died from the bite of a poison poisonous reptile." "....."

Penrod knew this, and realized his grave danger indeed. The dreadful possibilities of all kinds of poisonous reptiles, even cobras stolen from ruined Galverinian Zoos, have been used by many crafty Glandelinian spies with the purpose to secure what they were after—the idea of of any man woman or child encountering some deadly reptile unexpectedly any place is exceedingly thrilling, but think of being a boy alone in a pitch dark attic, with a number of venomous rattlesnakes. And not to know in what part of the room they were. It can be believed that the reptiles had been disturbed by Penrod's slightest slightest movements, or loud talking. Penrod knew how to manage a rattlesnake, if he only had a light, and a long cord with a loop on the other end. He also needed a sectional rod four and a half feet long rigged with a curtain cord that manipulated at one end. He was able to think out every detail carefully, but he had nothing, not even a single match. He nevertheless remained as quiet as possible hoping that the reptiles would glide to some other portion of the attic, but he heard no movement whatever. Soon he was again startled by the smallest possible noise, a ghost of a gliding sound, and movement. It came from his left side this time, but quite a distance away. He looked across in the intense darkness, and he yet could see nothing. Then he fancied he saw two round balls of phosphorescent directed toward him. He felt sure they were two eyes of some creature staring at him in the darkness. And when he purposely made another movement, he heard the shrill sound again. It was much louder this time, but sounded so strange and uncomfortable that he actually felt for a higher point of the attic. He felt as he saw the eyes rise upward, that the reptile was in a position to strike. He knew now it was absolutely a rattler, because the shrill noise was so loud and plain, and it was positive to him now, what the gliding noise had been, and it was made plainer was the evident fact that there were more than a dozen of them in the attic with him. At least it seemed to be.

"They may have been all asleep when he had been put into the attic. Or if they had been awake, they had at first been still and not excited. One thing that confronted Penrod, was the saying that a Rattlesnake never strikes unless provoked, or approached. This for a moment gave him a slight feeling of relief. But could such a feeling give evidence. Yet the feeling was so natural and comfortable, that to him it seemed to make spies unreal, and only natural things possible. Yet to him the eyes which were apparently on the level of the floor again did not shine in an unfriendly way....."

CHAPTER NINETEEN.

ANGELINIA ARONBURN RESCUES PENROD FROM THE ATTIC.

Yet he could not understand how a reptile's eyes could shine in the dark, and began to feel for the moment that the one of them might be either a nice big cat, that was playing with something that made the peculiar sound, or a young Belingdomemere creature. Yet he heard no purring, and as he could now hear exactly like a cat. He decided to try and see if it would answer. He hoped it would be one of it was a curious delight to him to stroke it to stroke the soft fur, and talk to the cat. He made the sound expecting if it was only a cat it would answer with purring or a cry, and with one, even a dark attic, would not be so black. But Penrod was disappointed. The only answer was the shrill sound again, and the very next motion of the eyes to a height of nearly three feet.

"It's queer that it has such gleaming eyes," He said. "I'd give anything if I could only find a window."

The mere presence of what he felt to be Rattlesnakes was awe inspiring indeed. He sat down close to where he felt sure the trap door was, and listened carefully to the shrill noise, and noted the direction it came from.

The phosphorescent light in the two eyes he had seen was a terror in itself now.

"I must and shall get out of this attic at any cost." He said to himself.
"I'm bound to make up my mind that I shall not be in here very long."

Just now he was not troubled by the fear of being hungry for a long time. All his life he was so used to eating very little from causes only known among the poor, and to passing long weary hours without food that during his long tour journeys, and that he had often proved to himself that fasting is not after all such a desperate ordeal as most people imagine.

and if he began by attempting to feel frightened and foolish, he might as well have been counting the hairs between meals he surely would begin to feel terribly - reverently. But he knew how to control himself; the time was indeed passing quickly, and he had known it would pass slowly, and therefore he had made up his mind not to watch it, or ask any questions about it, but do his best to avoid his very loathsome companions. Despite any dangers he may face he was never a restless boy, but like general Greathart could stand or sit still, or lie quietly, despite any dangerous creatures, that may be in the place. Now and then since all was quiet in the attic again, he could hear the distant rumbling of many cannons, and the thundering roar of exploding shells far away. To him these to a certain extent were some sort of companion companionship. He kept his place near the trap door, and his hand where he could occasionally touch it.

Every now and then he lifted his eyes to the place where the dim glimmers of something like a cat's eyes had showed itself. But now he saw nothing whatever. Perhaps the intense stillness in the attic, perhaps the crepuscular darkness, and perhaps the thundering noise outside - probably all three caused his thoughts to travel through his mind more slowly. He felt awfully sleepy, but because of his peril he did not dare to fall asleep.

Penrod had now remained perfectly quiet for several hours. There was nothing else yet gubing on to arouse him or his drowded companions during that short time, but after a few minutes passed he heard a more definite sound. It appeared that some one was ascending the stairs below toward the attic. At the same moment the shrill sound or noise was repeated from four different directions and simultaneously a brief metallic ringing sound on the steps below the attic door aroused him, and his loathsome companions outright.

At this moment he was fully conscious that some one was below, and the suddenly he heard the voice of a little girl give an exclamation because she had dropped something.....he was speaking very rapidly as if excited and as if she was in the greatest haste had haste.He could hear her speaking below the trap door.....!!!<sup>AA</sup> <sup>2-4-8m</sup>

ANGELINA ARONBURG RESCUES PHIBRO FROM THE ATTIC.

"I guess I'll have to search for it now," was what he heard her say. "I have not a moment to lose."

When all was silent but soon again he heard her feet hurrying up the steps, and again he heard the child say, "the poor boy is too good for that dark attic. I like him too well."

He immediately laid down near the trap door, and tried it but it was still fastened, oh on the other side. The little girl who ever she may be, was coming up the last flight of steps, and then he knocked on the trap door with vigorous his joy the two professional landlady spies had not returned as they had threatened, but some friendly girl instead. He evidently heard the knocking for her speedy flight up the stairs had halted, and there was silence for a moment. He feared his pounding had frightened her, and that she hesitated in coming up, but the next moment there was a retracing of the flight on the steps, and a noise of footsteps going up other steps, and then there was a noise at the lock outside. The reason of stopping when she heard the knock was because she had at that moment been going up the wrong flight of steps, she had not been frightened.

"I'll soon have you out," she said. "I saw those two take you in this house, and follow Jennie. Jennie told me and I followed them all the way here."

Jennie immediately rose, and then stood with his back against the wall, near the trap door. His strong companions had been aroused more than he expected, and one of them apparently in the corner was gazing toward him and apparently with uplifted eyes, and the shrill noise appeared to him to be like steam escaping from a small safety valve, and a million crickets joining in chorus at the same time. This helped Jennie to think him very quickly. He had been thinking with all his might, and trying to think of how to keep the reptiles quiet. Then he said loudly through the trap door:

"If you can avoid it, don't make much noise. I'm keeping company with probably a dozen rattlesnakes, and against my will too."

At this there was a startled exclamation from the little girl, and then silence. When he heard her working frantically at the bolt, with the desperate purpose to open it as fast as she could, then he began to wonder, how, and why she came to liberate him. She came for something probably, because she felt sorry for him, and was his friend, what did she say? He had heard her coming as if she was coming, and in a hurry. And what was that she had dropped on the steps, and then said, "I will have to search for it, I have not a single moment to lose," and then as she came hurriedly up the last flight of steps he had heard her say again, "The little boy is too good for the dark old attic. I like him too well."

He said these work words to himself over and over again, and tried to recall how she said them, and why he concerned her, and also to recall the voice, which seemed to him to be part of a dream, but just the same was a real thing, who was she? Then he started on his favorite guessing experiment. He had always succeeded frequently experimenting on so commanding his mind to work for him, to help him remember faces, voices, and to understand, and to argue about the things, clearly and properly.

"I hope I can reason this out," he said to himself as he heard a vigorous knocking at the padlock. "I wonder who she is. It cannot be Jennie, for as she is too greatly disabled to climb a flight of stairs so soon. And why did she come, and when she knows the danger she is placing herself in? Supposing the spies should return at this moment. If they returned alone, it would be all right, she could cope with them both successfully, but the rebels may return with a whole squadron of rebel cavalry."

It was certain that she was in a hurry, the way she pounded at the lock, and there was a good reason too. What was the reason? Maybe she had no time to spare, and she said she liked him too well to allow him to remain in the dark attic, the dark old attic, when it was probable that she came because she knew and like liked him. If she liked him she came to free him at no matter what the consequences might be. And the only good thing that this unknown little girl could do for him now was to help him escape from the attic, and his wretched companions. She had said he was too good for the attic. If he had been asleep he would not have heard her approach, or all she said, or understood what she would advise him to do, or what she meant to do for him, however he did not even dare to stop to even think of this at all. The main thing he must do and continue doing is to keep his distance from the beautiful rattlesnake friends. But then he could not keep from wondering what she had dropped.

He had heard the metallic ring, and then heard her exclaim loudly: "I will have to search for it now (Get your cow)." "Search for what?" He thought and thought, what must she search for, and did she find it? And if not would she fail to liberate him? He slowly drew himself down until he was sitting down again, on the attic floor, and then he held his head in his hands, pressing so hard on his eyes, that strange curious lights floated before him, then lying down near the trap door again he said: "Tell me little girl, tell me, what is it you must search for?" "It is something that I must not lose," she answered. "Did you hear the ringing sound?"

He sprang upon his feet with a little gasping shout, forgetting for the moment the presence of the rattlesnakes. The strange shrill noise sounded again, but this time he paid no attention whatever. He realized the ringing sound, had been the ring of metal, striking the steps as it suddenly fell, and he knew that anything any thing made of metal surely may have made such a sound. As she was hurrying up the first flight of steps, she had accidentally dropped something made of metal down the steps. When she had dropped it, it must have bounded all the way down the steps. The little girl liked him, and had said he was too good for his "old attic prison", and yet it was probable that she had dropped and lost the only thing, that would help her set him free, much quicker than breaking the padlock, he had dropped a key belonging to the front door of the house, and which she had in her possession, and which also opened the lock of the trap door.

For a few minutes the feelings which she he suddenly felt, were so full of strong excitement that for a moment his brain was in a perfect whirl. He knew indeed, what General Greathart would have said, and that which he would have done also, and if he was to save himself from the rattlesnakes, he must hold himself still, and not let any excitement over come him. He knew that the little girl finding that she could not break the lock, must find the key at any cost. He knew of course that it would be another delay before she could give him a chance of freedom. And if she failed to find the key, and could find no other means to break open the lock, she could not open the trap door to let him out. The loss of the key must cause a delay. He would be glad to help her look for the key if he was able too, as far as doing it, would take a very long time indeed, and there was danger that other landlady spies would make their appearance, and interrupt the little girl before she could succeed in helping him to get out.

"I will kneel down and say some prayers for better success," he said to himself. "I'll bet she is crawling back and forth and going over every inch of the floor beneath the steps, with the very best determination to find it. And I'll bet if she goes over every inch, she will find it, for there is a will there in a way."

So he knelt down and began to pray, while the rattlesnakes kept their beady eyes on him, and their shrill rattles going like mad.

"I must and shall get out," he said to himself. "I know there is a way if I only try."

He was still kneeling kneeling down, when he heard one of the creatures rattles sounding much nearer to him. Therefore he stood up against the wall, and watched the creatures. Then he wondered whether the key was a small or large one, and whether it was necessary that the little girl should pass her hands over every inch, as he believed she would. And he was sure that despite the difficulty of the search, she would not miss a single inch. Yet he was not so sure what she would do, and that she would go over every space of floor again, and again. He felt sure she was crawling backwards, and forwards, and forward, and backwards, or crosswise, and lengthwise, or diagonally, and around and round. Yet he felt sure from the length of time he felt sure that she had failed to find the key. Probably she was in the same darkness he was. And Penrod wished only wished in his heart that he only had a little light, to see who his hidden enemies really were, but he did not have any.

In the meantime the little girl was totally absorbed in her search for her key, and after she had been engaged in the hunt for three hours, she did not find it yet, and for a moment felt disgusted.

Yet she realized that to stop for sleep, or rest would probably be fatal to Penrod, she did not quit even, though her knees were starting to be bruised, and the skin of her hands was sore as a result of rubbing them on the old flooring. She just now feared the Rattlesnakes going at Penrod and killing him.

"But surely it feel down here somewhere," he said obstinately. "It is somewhere around the lower step as I heard it fall while I was running up the steps. I should have been more careful than I was."

For a moment now she stood up, and felt very tired indeed, her body aching all over. She stretched herself, and exercised her arms and legs.

"I wonder how long it has been since I startled started crawling about the floor," she thought to herself and with impatience. "But that old key must be lying on the floor here somewhere. It must be by the foot of the steps surely."

She decided to rest herself for a few minutes, and she therefore sat down on the lower step, and laid her head on the step above her, while the purpose to rest herself more comfortably. She herself began to think of some kind of experiment also.

"My gosh, but all this work searching for that darn key, had made me so tired. Yet I dare not go to sleep now. I must find that key. I'll trust God to show me where it lies."

When for a few moments she began quoting some prayers, she had learned at home.

"Dear Lord who can do all things. Show me where the key is lying. Lead me to it before it is too late."

And again she began to search for it, and more carefully this time. She did not know that she had been searching for it half the night. But she did. When she did not stop to rest again, it was starting to be daylight outside, and by the noise she heard far off in the distance, it was evident that some small engagement was raging. Maybe Penrod may have heard the sound also, but the fact was that she too was too hungry, but she was determined to locate that key and liberate Penrod first.

Just as she fell down on her hands and knees once more, she heard a strange sound which made her suddenly lift her head, and then heard something arrive.

Some one was entering the house by the front door, he expected this every minute, and thanked her lucky stars that she was armed. She hid in the darkest corner, and as she did so heard the door slam shut. Yet she was disturbed, because no one came near the steps.

She knew Penrod was in the attic above, and felt sure she may have someone who even if he is a landlubber, she could compel him to assist her, and she prayed appealingly.

As no one came, she thought of the key again.

"I will not give up until I have found it," she said to herself. "It is by the stairs somewhere."

She heard the sound of footsteps at the instant, and became very anxious indeed.

"Dear God lead me to the key," prayed the little girl as if pleading in a way as if her soul's welfare depended upon it. And then she got up. As she arose she happened to put her hand out toward the corner of the third step, and suddenly touched something lying there. It must have been lying there all the time, and she had failed to find it in the darkness until now.....

CHAPTER TWENTY.

HOW THEY ESCAPED OUT OF THE BUILDING.

WHO WAS THE LOUD BINKER?

It indeed was the key. When she had dropped it, it had bounded down the steps, until until it reached the fourth and then third step, and then laid in the corner. With a smothered cry of joy, she picked it up, and then hearing the sound of more than one person walking, stood still for a moment. Then she made the sign of the Cross, then mounting the steps carefully, and noiselessly, she found her way to the trap door and fumbled until she found the key hole, and got the key into it. Then she turned it, and Penrod who had forced himself to remain awake all the time, on account of the Rattlesnakes, managed to lift up the door thought it took all his strength.

As he did so he made considerable noise, and caused the shrill noise or sound to recommence with redoubled violence. The little girl mounted to the top step, to direct him down, and as she did so she struck a match she carried, to see into the attic, then she gave a startled cry, and looked at Penrod in amazement.

"Didn't any of them touch you?" she demanded, a look of horror on her pretty face.

"No, indeed. I kept perfectly still." He answered. "They were Rattlesnakes alright and the worse kind. I'm surprised, I'm alive yet."

After closing the trap door so the Rattlesnakes could not follow them too quickly, they descended the steps carefully to the ground floor, and out into the narrow hallway before them.

Penrod and his little girl heroine who was none other than Angelina Aronburg, made their way through the dark passage of a hallway, and into a part of the building, that used to be a dining room. Penrod tried the doors, but found them locked. They were too solid to be broken open. He therefore made his way up another flight of steps, followed by the little girl. But the door at the top was also shut, and bolted, and was a more solid door than the others.

It was evident that these glandelinian spies had plainly made sure that he would not make his escape at all, or if so he did, it would take time enough for him to make his way out of the building, even after he got out of the attic. He wondered how the little girl had succeeded in obtaining entrance, but being too excited over this narrow escape just now, he did not care to ask her questions as yet.

But nevertheless the little girl explained. She had entered the same time the two glandelinians had brought him in, but had not expected that they would lock up things in this fashion. Penrod and the little girl were by this time gnawingly hungry, and very thirsty, and almost faint and dizzy from lack of food and sleep. It was impossible to get into the kitchen, but probably if they did it, it may be of no use, for the building had been abandoned long ago. Anyhow there was no use trying, for there was no moving the locked door.

Penrod tried to force the outlet into the rear of the building, but that was a solid steel door, and immovable. At the same time the little girl observed near it, a much smaller door.

CHAPTER TWENTY.
HOW THEY ESCAPED OUT OF THE BUILDING.
WHO WAS THE LOUD SINGER?

SHE BELIEVED THAT IT MUST: evidently be some entrance to a cellar under the structure. This door alone seemed to be open, and near the door stood two large tin cans, filled with wood and ashes, which attracted Penrod to this, and he decided that one of the cans would be the very thing, which might help them both.

He pulled the door open. All was just as dark inside, but on the ceiling above there was a small window, through which a small amount of light was streaming.

As he looked up he realized he could not very well reach up to it, even when standing on the can, and even if he could reach it by climbing up the steep ladder, he would not be able to open it, and if he did he would only be on the roof, and how would he get down from the roof? He believed however that if he threw a large piece of wood at the glass of the sky light, and break it he could then lift the girl up to it, and then crawl out himself. He had thought first of shouting for help when some one passed by, but fearing they may be glandelinians he did not wish to attract their attention.

They too might notice or understand where the shouts came from, and instead of helping them, may murder them, instead of giving aid. They must break the sash out if possible and then get out without attracting any one at all. Penrod therefore drew from the can a large sized solid piece of wood, and threw it with all his might against the glass pane.

It went clear through with a crash of breaking glass, and left a big hole where the first pane had been.

He then threw another, but it only struck the sash in the middle, and in rebounding back struck him on the head with force enough to make him think he saw a million stars, and a dozen comets, and then rebound from him almost simultaneously and hit the little girl in the neck.

After rubbing his head for a few moments, and seeing to it she was not hurt, and only finding her lag laughing quietly to herself, he picked up the same stick and threw it straight to the mark, and the entire pane was shattered, and Penrod and the little girl dashed aside to escape the shower of glass that fell. As the glass fell out he saw it was broad daylight, and that made him realize that he and the little girl, had been probably shut up for nearly half a day, and a whole night long.

There was plenty of wood in the can by the door, and the boy had a perfect strong arm for his age, and also steady aim.

Therefore by throwing more large pieces of wood, he shattered one pane after another, until only the framework remained. He then asked the little girl if she thought it would be safe for him to do any shouting, as now there was nothing between his voice, and the outside, but she said,

"NO don't shout. It will bring the glandelinians upon us. We don't want no one to see us, when we make our escape, and if we call out that we are here on the top floor near the sky light, we'll be worse off than before."

So he decided to try and smash the sash also, and escape that way by the roof if possible. But as they were both about to throw they heard the sound of approaching footsteps, and hesitated.

"HALLO. THERE." some one shouted in a stentorian tone. "HALLO. HALLO. HALLO, WHO'S THERE?"

Penrod and the little girl looked at each other, but were silent. Yet they feared that if the person heard the smashing of glass, he would come to make an investigation.

"HALLO. HALLO. WHO'S THERE?" some one shouted in a stentorian tone. "HALLO. HALLO. HALLO, WHO'S THERE?"

After a moment's thinking the little girl handed a small revolver to Penrod. "Let him shout if he is a glandelinian," she said determinedly. "He will only be wasting his breath and strength."

"Maybe it is only the owner of the house shouting," he said, "but whatever he is or who he is, he does not yet know where we are. If he is only one glandelinian investigating the noise made by the loud breaking of glass, and he will be trying to find us, we'll just surprise him, and make him guide us out of here. If only several greatheart knew where we were, it would be alright. No doubt he is trying to find me—where are the others, and so is the boy-scout known as the Rattlesnake, anyhow one of their searchers might be passing through this house this very minute. It may be him."

"Then what shall we do?" she asked. He thought for a moment, and a sudden idea came upon him. "We must cautiously follow the sound the voice made," he said, "and we must stop frequently to listen for the sound to come again, and find out where it comes from. And if we hear anything unusual, we must stop at once, and be on our guard. We will shoot to him to show himself, and explain who he is."

However the little girl was somewhat nervous about the situation, he advised him to be very careful indeed, or otherwise both of them were liable to go on a sudden spiritual journey. Penrod also was greatly excited, and in turn also begged her to be very careful. It was a stirring moment for them indeed, and not knowing who it may be, they did not move for a moment or two.

Then just as he started forward a step or two some one began to sing throwing his voice so loudly that it seemed to shake the air.

However who ever it was who was singing he certainly had a most splendid and vibrant voice, though the way he was singing just now, it was apparent that he was ignorant of its fine quality indeed, and wished to be heard a mile for some reason it seemed that he wanted to make it as loud as possible. This made both the girl and boy very apprehensive, and she had jumped with alarm, and annoyance when the loud voice, suddenly had bawled forth like a megaphone trumpet.

"Who ever he is, he's crazy to yell a song forth in that manner. It may art attract a scouting force of the nearest glandelinians, and caused the house to be filled with them in a moment, and place him and us two in greater danger."

"Said the girl. The two heroes a children felt that they would give anything to get away from the sound when they heard heavy footsteps approaching, and they glanced in the direction to see who was coming, for it was not too dark here to discern, whether the singer was a friend or a foe.

"He put he did not come their way, and soon retreated his steps. He has a fine loud voice, loud enough to draw the whole glandelinian army to the house to investigate," said Penrod.

"What's he singing anyway?" said his girl companion. "It sounds to me as if it is foreign, not Angelinian."

"I do not know," was Penrod's reply. "It may be Polish. Let's take the chances and investigate."

Indeed the song was loud and spirited, and very spirited at this moment. It was a wonder the loud singing did not blast itself its way through the walls. Neither of the two children could understand where the loud voice came from, as it would change direction, pause for a moment, and then burst forth once more.

The two children still hesitated about going forward, and therefore stopped in the middle of the hallway.

"I wonder who it is that is singing so loudly," asked Penrod. "And where in the world is he? Is he just doing it to trap us into coming out of our hiding place and be captured, or because he is bighouse?"

"I simply cannot make it out," said the little girl, "and now it sounds as if the loud singing is right from under our room." It seemed indeed very queer now that the foreign songthe unknown person was yelling at the top of his lungs should apparently come under or from under the floor of the room in which they were in, but still it went on, and still the boy and girl did not dare move for fear of someone springing upon them unexpectedly in the dark.

Now unknown to them there was a little negro group of soldiers seeking admittance into the building, when a strange personage came toward the place. It was as the reader will probably know a splendidly uniformed boy scout who limped badly, as he was coming as swiftly as his disabled leg would let him, and he indeed had a frantic look on his bulldog like face. And despite the muffled singing Penrod heard the approach of his friend as he drew near the group of soldiers.

"I hope it is him," he thought to himself. "And yet it might be at that."

At this moment the unknown person inside the house as fairly trumpeting the very chorus of the song as if he meant the sound of the singing to reach the highest limits of heaven, and he was singing it again and again, until one of the soldiers outside yelled:

"For the love of pete shut up!"

At this the man shouted again:

"HALLO, HALLO, WHO'S THERE? I'M LOOKED IN THE HOUSE. J. HALLO, HALLO, HALLO." "Some of the soldiers on the outside gave a start of surprise, when they heard this and the rattlesnake boy scout swung himself into the group of uniformed men in purple, and to them looked like some crippled boy scout, who had suddenly gone crazy. He even hurled himself against the Angellinian soldiers.

"Where is he please? Where have they put him?" He cried out, and then he poured out some words in a breathless manner, almost sobbing them out.

"General Greatheart, and I and all others, have been looking for him ever since he was missing," he shouted. "Where are you Penrod? Penrod, Penrod."

And suddenly from above on the last floor (the house being a four story affair) and seemingly from the roof, came the answering shout, and called out like voice:

"Rattlesnake, oh Rattlesnake, I'm up here in the skylight on the roof of this house house--looked in! A little girl friend is with me. We are here," and a big piece of wool three inches wide, and a foot long came hurtling through the broken window, and fell down crashing among the soldiers. The Rattlesnake then ran back a ways as if he had not been crippled, and some of the soldiers banged on the door, as the rattlesnake Rattlesnake shouted back:

"Penrod, Penrod, where I am, he looked you in! where 's the door, and how can we get it open? It's impossible to come down from the roof roof without a long ladder as there is no drain pipe with which you can slide down."

"All of the doors inside this house is locked, so I can't get out no other way," shouted Penrod. "he, glendelinian spies had me and locked me in the att is of purpose, and took away all the keys except one."

The group of soldiers, had become very excited by this time, and some of them started to bang on the front door with their musket butts, but the door was too strong and would not give way. The soldiers could not make out at all what had really occurred in the building to cause the crippled boy scout to look and act as if he were crazy with terror, and probable relief at the same time.

One of the other soldiers had seen the approach of a squadron of Win the Abyssinians soldiers on horseback, and with excited gestures rode forward to notify them, that Penrod was found.

It was with some difficulty that he made the Captain of the squadron, believe his excited statement that the missing boy scout Penrod, was locked in a vacant house two miles southwest of the limits of the Christian lines, and near the first lines of rebel intrenchments. The officer in command of the squadron was not so much excited, as out of temper. He was enraged to think of a glendelinian boy scout, to be outraged in this way by two glendelinian glendelinian spies. He had no idea at all what Penrod knew, or what the boy the rattlesnake knew about the affair. He knew however that general Greatheart boy scout whom he adopted son Marcuslin Penrod had been missing for over twenty hours, and now had been found locked up in a house with a little girl by a group of searching soldiers. He knew that the glendelinians who had run off with him had some great reason for kidnapping the boy.

He was kidnapped by some strange and mysterious persons, who had pretended to be Angellinian officers for several months, and it will be some time before the soldiers will be able to get the lad out, even by smashing in the doors. He growled as he rode up to the house, followed by his squadron.

He dismounted, strode toward the door, and grabbing the door knob shook it vigorously, and then seeing a boy and girl on the roof, shouted up at them:

"How in the world did you two get in here?"

"Two glendelinians looked us in," shouted Buck Penrod back in answer.

"How did you two get up to the roof my lad?"

Indeed it was not at all an easy matter for Penrod to explain from so high above the ground, that recently he had helped a wounded little lady, by the name of Jennie Francis Turner to her tent, and how afterwards two men within the Christian lines, had jumped at him from between two tents, seized him, and carrying him to the house, had tried to make him tell where the injured heroine was hiding herself. The Captain thought this so rare boys talk compared to other things he knew about the two men. As to the rest of the story, Penrod knew that it could not be related at all properly, without saying many things, which he was not allowed to explain to any one but now but general Greatheart.

Therefore he made up his mind very quickly that he would not mention the questions, the two rebel agents had asked him. The Captain ordered the soldiers to break the front door down with a battering ram. The soldiers took some time in making one from a fallen tree, which they saw lying in the deep snow, but within twenty minutes it was completed. It may have been supposed that the two professional glendelinian spies had not remembered in their haste, that the boy would be missed early, and hasty searching parties, sent out to look for him.

In a few minutes the battering ram was ready, and it was dashed against the door with great force. When the foremost of the soldiers entered the house, and went through a part of it, they were much disturbed after they had liberated the two boys, and also bewildered at what they saw, after they had once got inside.

"Those runaway spies, so staidly bolted every door in the building," he said. "Such things happen every now and then in the army, but what one of us or all of us discovered in the att is in the building makes it appear might y queer indeed. Why did they lock every building or door in the building, as well as those in the basement, and above every stair case? What did those men say to you lad, and why is the attic infested with twenty six Rattlesnakes?" Another of the soldiers asked Penrod when he had been brought outside.

"They demanded me to tell them where Jennie Turner was hiding."

"And they were in a most big hurry to leave?"

"Yes."

"What did they put you in the att is with those Rattlesnakes for?"

"Because I would not tell them what they wanted to know. They took me up there, and looked in at there."

"And left you in there with the Rattlesnakes and bolted. They must have been in a mighty big hurry. How did you get out of the attic, seeing it was bolted beneath you?"

"This little girl helped me. She opened the padlock of the trapdoor."

"As I did," she answered. "Those glendelinians however mistook the girl with the wounded leg and sprained ankle for me at first. She was chased and shot by the enemy in short order. My name is Angellina Aronburg, but I go by the name of Gertrude Angeline."

Penrod looked at her in blank amazement. Then he recognized her as being the beautiful girl with the vivid girl princess's that day Emperor Adrian review reviewed the drill of the boy scout Regiment. After bowing low to her, and controlling his embarrassment, Penrod told her the whole story, from beginning to end.

"And the little girl Jennie Turner told me not to lose a moment after I left her tent. And to keep my eyes open in every direction. As I did not do this probably from overconfidence, it was my fault that this happened."

Those glandelinian spies must have captured you in short order, and when no one was around to see their act," said Angelina Aronburg. "Jennie Turner who you aided, happened to see them seize you, and just after I and the vivian girls who came to see her and aid her, we being on horseback entered her tent. So I and the vivian girls trailed you here after notifying the generals and the signal stations. Violet and her sisters will be here in any minute as they have gone to notify the main lines that you have been found at last. Emperor vivian has sent his entire force of the Gemini after them, and every place inside and outside of vivian is being watched for them. They have been within the christian lines posing as Angelinian officers for over three months and have secured so much information, and stolen so many plans and maps and even the very photographs of violet and her sisters, that emperor vivian is alarmed. I believed myself that these two men, who had kidnapped you in this fashion, are some of glandelinian's most daring spies lurking within the christian lines, that is what they were. Not spies hired by rebel generals, but by the glandelinian governments themselves."

The vivian girls when they observed at a distance the crowd of soldiers around a four-story wooden house, did not wait until their own column of searchers arrived. They urged their horses toward the building, at the swiftest possible pace they could go through the deep snow. Most of the soldiers, when they heard the wild galloping of horses, turned and stared at their wild pace, as they almost shot past the house before they stopped. Thinking they were either pursued, or their horses were running away with them. Yet when they stopped the boy killed the rattlesnake hardly could catch his breath, as he leaped up to the fore most of the beautiful vivian girls and gasped.

"He is found. Thank God he is all right. Those two glandelinian spies had locked him in this house, and left him alone in an attic with rattlesnakes. The Captain has sent some men in to shoot or kill the rattlesnakes. I'm going in. Please notify general Greathart that he is safe."

Violet and her sisters quickly exchanged startled glances. Every one of the little girls were as pale as the rattlesnake boy. Then they almost looked reproachfully at Penrod, and he blushed scarlet. Then violet said pointing to the rattlesnake boy scout:

"Two of you men help him on to my horse. He must come with us and rest. We will go to general Greathart's headquarters, and Penrod will accompany us." The rattlesnake knew it was her desire and he obeyed instantly because he delighted to do so:

"This is a bad sign for our Holy Gause sister," said Joice to Angeline, as a soldier lifted the rattlesnake boy scout upon violet's horse, and placed him in the back.

"It's a very bad one indeed," answered Angeline. "Our papa has been outwitted by two professional spies."

"God who defends a right cause will take care of us," declared Catherine.

In the meantime Penrod had not found it at all easy to leave the place, because he was being questioned, by nearly every soldier there. Neither the Abyssinkilian Captain, nor his officers and soldiers were willing to give up the idea, that he could give him and the little girl with him, some important information about the rebel spies. However the vivian girls moved up closer and this movement proved and produced its usual effect.

All of the soldiers, either lifted their hats, or saluted, even the Captain and his Abyssinkilian squadron, sat up straight on their horses and made their respective salutes.

All of them realized that the seven beautiful vivian girls were before them. They felt that more than the personage of seven Abyssinkilian Princesses were before them, and that it was not possible, to question their nature, goodness, gracefulness, and air of absolute and serene authority.

Penrod found himself a second time facing these little girls heroines of preternatural beauty and grave grace, and was so overawed and embarrassed, that again he almost felt like running away. This was the second second time he had met them, and this time they had come to his rescue.

This time only, one of them came toward him, and it was Joice. She laid her hand on Penrod's shoulder, and held it there as she spoke in her bird or swan like voice. And when Penrod looked up at her pretty serious or grave face, and felt the closeness of her friendly touch, it seemed as if she gave him an embrace, and as if he had caught her to his own breast and hugged her in return. He loved her at once, even though he was awed.

"This good little boy knows nothing of those two spies," she said.

"That I or my dear sisters can guarantee at any cost. And he had seen or never seen either of them before. No my assistant Jennie Turner, who was shot in the leg yesterday by glandelinians saw the kidnappers seize him just as we entered her tent, and while she sent her guard to notify Emperor Hanson, vivian our King, Angeline Aronburg and we ourselves with parties of soldiers went on his trail. And we found him here. His being forced into their house, was the result of some devilish trick on their part. He has been shut up in this house for over twenty four hours, and has not eaten any food. I and my sisters must take him to general Greathart's headquarters. I want you Captain and your squadron, to accompany us there as we are far from the national line lines." ("AA")

All the soldiers who had been dismounted, jumped on their horses, and the whole party started off together, toward the christian lines, Angeline Aronburg and the two boy scouts riding with the vivian girls. All of the soldiers about ten thousand five hundred winking Abyssinkilians in number followed closely behind the vivian girls as if they could not endure to let them go out of their sight. But on the way they said very little. But when they first got away from the house Penrod looked back and saw from a rolling cloud of smoke that the building had been set on fire by those who had been last to go. So Penrod said to the Abyssinkilian captain:

"I don't feel like speaking very much just now, but I am for one thing very glad to be with friends again. It seemed to me it might turn out very badly with those rattlesnakes as company."

"Beloved friend," said violet herself for a moment in french. "You need not speak until you have been rested and have had something to eat."

Nevertheless it was Gertrude Angeline who told the vivian girls the strange story. As violet herself said. General Greathart, and many of his staff had had at once great suspicions, when Penrod had failed to return.

They knew that nothing out of the ordinary could or would have kept him. They suspected at once, that he had been detained much against his will, and they also felt it certain, that if any one had detained him, it could only have been for serious reasons, they could understand and not guess at.

"They said they had been chasing a Jennie Turner and wounded her, and demanded me to reveal you her hiding place," Penrod said to Angeline Aronburg. "This was a small picture of the girl they mentioned, and which one of them lost in the rock room and which I picked up without their noticing it." at all.

And he handed it to Angeline Aronburg. "The tall man said he would remember her in a thousand years."

Angeline Aronburg took it and looked at it with an ironic half smile.

"It's not her picture, nor either is it mine," she replied. "They must have obtained the wrong picture fortunately. But it was Jennie Turner they were after and who they failed to secure on account of her quick speed. Probably she was too near the christian lines, when pursued, and escaping them, the rebel soldiers must have went back to their lines, and notified their general, who at once sent word to the work secret agents in our lines to be on the lookout for her." put I suspect the work these two did. They were Professional spies, not not of the rebel armies, but of the government in Andolinia. They suspected the work of her, she, and Violet and her sisters do, and suspected you know something about her hiding place, and tried to make you tell so they could find her and assassinate her. They also believed they had the power to terrify you into saying things which would be a clue to her hiding place, and cause her death or capture. Spies like them, are also women, as well as men, and elderly gents, and governmental secret service men, who will use the most desperate means to gain their ends."

"And they put you in the attic with the Rattlesnakes because you would not tell?" asked Joyce.

"Yes," answered Penrod. "But did they really intend to leave me there with the poisonous reptiles on purpose, or take me to Norma Catherine as they had threatened?" Penrod asked her.

"They scarcely would have dared to take you there I think she answered. "Too quick a hike and cry had been raised when Jennie Urner and we reported what we had seen, so many of the Gemini had been set at work at once to trace you, and then them. It horrifies me to say that they knew the Rattlesnakes were there, or at least had them put there, or had literally put them there themselves by some means, to destroy you so you could not bring any evidence against them. Or they did it to make it evidently appear, that you may have entered the vacant house, and attic through curiosity, and encountered the Rattlesnakes unawares. It surprises me that you were not bitten by one of them. It was not by remaining quiet that saved you as you made noise enough to arouse them. Angelina Aronburg told me. The soldier who was the one who shot them said that it was the darkness, and the roughness of the decellar floor, that prevented them from reaching you quick enough to do harm."

And the look in the little girl's eyes as she spoke, and the way her sisters and Angelina Aronburg glanced at him gave him an astonishing thrill. He had absolutely won the love and admiration, of these little heroine beauties, and a so their utmost trust in him. While he rode on with the whole column, Penrod and the little heroines were closer to each other's soul, than they ever had been before. They were riding more swiftly now, while the column of soldiers following them hung closely in the rear, thinking about Abbie Anna, and its most tremendous and heartrending struggles, and of the siege of Ivian Wickey and how it might end.

"Do you think that the time will soon come when the children in the hands of the enemy may not be slaves and exiles any longer?" The boy asked of Angelina Aronburg wistfully. "Do you think any of us might live long enough, to see it, you beautiful Princesses, and I and you miss Aronburg?" ".....", there was a few moments silence. Then it was Violet who answered to his evident surprise.

"For all the years that child slavery has existed, I feel /like I'd give my freedom, nay my very life for them," she said slowly. "It will and must be done when I or my sisters think of the miserable child slavery going on. It makes us feel as if we were child slaves ourselves. But Abbie Anna is fighting a good holy cause, and cannot be licked. We must win."

CHAPTER TWENTY ONE.

THE CAVALRY DUEL.

CHAPTER TWENTY ONE.
THE CAVALRY DUE L.

"I CAN RELATE, to you something intensely interesting, and thrilling that occurred only yesterday afternoon," said the captain as the enormous column now joined by more dangerous glandelinian spies are when rendered desperate. Our great general Conventinian Aronburg had sent one of his orderlies to summon general Francis Hedda to his tent on the most important matters. General Hedda a Galverinian, had been in the service of the Angollian armies all his life, or even since he was seventeen years old, and though right to his ways was a man with a very bad temper. The slightest thing going wrong would make him fly off like an explosion. Two hours before the orderly arrived, general aide general Hedda, aide-de-camp, had come to the general's room and surprised him and his staff by falling suddenly dead right at the door. His face had been actually blanched with the utmost terror, his hands groping for help, and his whole body fell and stayed to it and fro before he dropped.

The general and his staff, were dumbfounded. The whole building was searched for the mysterious assassin, but no sign of him was found. And there was no marks on the dead man that they could determine what the assassin had killed him with. Nevertheless the general recalled that in the early morning the aide-de-camp had spoken of a strange sound, between a loud shrill hissing noise and the noise of a very loud cricket. Then several of the staff had told the great general that they too had heard the same strange hissing sound like that of the tail of a rattlesnake, and they all had the premonition that the same sort of horrid death awaited them, and that they had notified the soldiers to make a strict search of all the rooms in the entire building. The soldiers came, two score of them, and started to make a most careful and diligent examination of every one of the rooms, but at first could find nothing whatever.

put one of them discovered a transom above the door of the general's room, and a long stout rope was hanging down from the transom, toward the floor. They therefore believed it probable that some desperate glandelinian spy had without the knowledge of the general or of his staff secreted himself in this room, and when it became time for the general to put away his most important things must have started developments. The spy may have entered and worked at night with only the aid of a small flashlight. It was evident that the dangerous spy may have been hiding all that time, and so the foremost of the searchers said to his companions:

"Do not lose caution as we enter the room, as your very lives may depend upon it. Have your muskets in readiness in case we should need them. I will take the chances and enter the room first."

Suddenly there was the momentary gleam of light shining against the ceiling of the room, but it vanished immediately. Some one in the room had lit a flashlight and then put it out again. Then hesitating to enter for a moment, they heard a strange sound, and then all was still, though a most strange smell began to pervade the atmosphere.

For a moment they waited with straining ears. Then all of a sudden they burst down the door which they found locked, but as they entered found no one was in the room.

But just as they entered, another strange sound was heard, apparently coming from the piles of paper on the top of a large round table. At first it was like every gentle soothing sound like that of a strong yet jet of steam, escaping from a small steam pipe.

With a grave face the leader cautiously approached the table. It was indeed a very singular sight that met the eyes of the soldiers. On the table were piles of different pieces of paper never used by the general or any one else, the drawers were ransacked, and the room had every appearance of having been raided by an army of bandits.

array of bandits. As the sound from the top of the table grew very shrill, one of the soldiers disturbed the papers with the muzzle of his musket. The officer then took a step forward. In an instant something coiled up among the papers began to move and writhe, and in a moment more there reared itself from among the pile of papers the horrid squat diamond shaped head of a very lionlike some serpent.

"It's an enormous Rattlesnake," cried one of the officers. "It's one of the deadliest or most dangerous snakes in the world. It's a poisonous Rattler."

As he spoke he drew his revolver and fired at the snake but missed in his excitement. One of the soldiers however struck it with the butt of his musket before it sprang, and hurled it from the table and against the wall with great and terrific force. It fell on the floor but coiled itself, and made a fearful noise with its rattle, and was about to strike at the nearest man when one of the soldiers shot its head off. It was fully eight feet long. The general was then summoned and they examined everything in the room.

The condition of the room, and the presence of the reptile, and the piles of strange papers on the table, no doubt explained the appearance of some most dangerous and murderous spy, whose rattle snake trap somewhere else no doubt had caused the death of the aide-de-camp. It therefore became evidently clear to the general that whatever danger threatened the Christian cause could not come from a traitor, so much as from a glandelinian spy. His attention was speedily drawn to the loss of all his most important things, and to the dead Rattlesnake lying on the floor. The discovery that this was for the purpose of assassinating the general when he discovered his loss instantly gave rise to the suspicion that this spy never failed in obtaining anything what he was after. The idea that it may be the same ones who seized you, I felt sure that the soldiers who were sent in Peru permit were on the right track. The idea of the two spies using a form of pisco poison which could not be possibly be discovered by any chemical test was just such a one as would occur to a most clever and ruthless glandelinian spy, who had had the knowledge of it. And the rapidity of which a snake poison would take effect would also for his desire be an advantage to cover his foul deed proving the snake gets away in time. And it would indeed be the most sharp eyed coroner in the world who would be able to distinguish the two small fang punctures, and tell where they had injected the deadly poison. Then the general thought of the piles of paper on the table, the ransacked drawers, and the condition of the whole room.

Of course the murderous rebel spy had placed the snake on the top of the table by letting it out of some sort of a box, and had covered it with papers so that it would not be revealing itself too soon, to its victim.

It may have been also probable that he had trained it so it may not bite him, and he had placed it on the top of the table at the hour he believed best with the certainty that it would strike the first one, who fumbled among the papers. It might or might not bite the first person - perhaps he may escape, but sooner or later some one would be a victim. General Hedda Zimmermann jumped to these conclusions before he had ever entered the room. The sight of the dead Rattlesnake, the disturbed condition of the room, the dead aide-de-camp, and the ransacked drawers, were enough to finally dispel any doubts which may have remained. Having once made up his mind the general at once issued orders that a search should be made.

The captain had just closed his story when suddenly there broke from the silence of a still and early and cold noon day the most horrid series of outcries to which any of them in the whole squadron had ever heard or listened to.

It swelled up louder and louder, and still louder, and nearer too, a series of hoarse fiendish yells of derision and anger and frenzy all mingled in one storm of dreadful shrieks.

After a few moments it was said that even within the main Christian lines for a mile distant that horrible chorus and uproar of cries roused the immediate attention of the whole camp and put them on preparedness. It struck cold to the

to the hearts of every man in the column, and even the Angevinian girls gazed at Angelina's Aronburg, and she at them until the echoes of it had died away to the silence from which it rose.

"What was it?" cried Penrod and as he spoke there came a roar as of thunder rolling along the surface of the roadway.

"It means that something is wrong," the colonel answered, and hearing the thundering noise glanced behind the column.

"Goodness Gracious do you see it?" He yelled. "You see it?" But for a moment they saw nothing but a long cloud of flying snow and dust. They could not find it possible to tell what the colonel saw through the cloud of dust and snow but they could see however that his face was deadly pale, and filled with horror and loathing.

Finally the snow clouds cleared away a trifle, and the party saw a column of soldiers of Scodler and Whinsie glandelinians on horseback, a sudden was their appearance, and so close were they that the party of soldiers who had gone to the aid of Penrod, had no chance to make a retreat, and a foremost of the savage glandelinians so, collided with the big column of Abyssinkilians in the rear before even they knew of the presence of the Christians.

The Abyssinkilians at once opened fire, and succeeded in killing fifty five, and seriously wounded sixty seven at once discharge, among the latter a rebel colonel, and causing some confusion among the rest, by their unerring aim.

But the surviving glandelinians were very sullen, desperate, and full of fight and recovering from the surprise they charged down upon the Abyssinkilian Abyssinkilian horde, but the majority of the Angelinians not relieving the brunt of the fierce attack, left their comrades by a turn to the left, just as the left wing of the attackers swept past them like a roaring tornado, and made directly for the large platoon of Angelinians among whom were Penrod, the Rattlesnake boy, and the girl heroines.

This gave the disengaged body of Winkie Abyssin Abyssinkilians the proper chance and their flanking fire was so well directed, that one third the number of the eleven thousand insurgents were mowed down, and it broke the force of their infuriated charge upon the Angelinians.

The column however did not quickly rallied, and leaving the Angelinians to themselves charged the Abyssinkilians, and with much sudden impetuosity as to give them only sufficient time to reload their empty rifles and fire. This volley did not take as much effect as at first, but most fortunately however the other column of Abyssinkilians, had worsted and partially dispersed the assailants, and they went to the rescue of their comrades, the Angelinians also joining in, and the smoke from the discharge of so many rifles and carbines on both sides at once hung so heavy about the contestants that both sides could not hardly see to aim for another charge or discharge.

The glandelinians however despite their overwhelming numbers were worsted, and bolted off toward the direction of their own lines, to the intense delight of the victors.

One of the glandelinians during the fight was shot twice by the same Angelinian at a distance not exceeding one hundred yards.

The glandelinians however meeting with another party of troopers returned to the charge, and as the Christian column raced away opened a heavy fire, but to no effect for none of the fugitives received any perceptible injury. The Abyssinkilians broke away from the Angelinians seemingly to divert the course of the pursuers, but while a quarter of a mile continued after the Angelinians, the rest broke off like the dividing of a wave, and raced after the Abyssinkilians.

They discharged a thundering musket volley, but the Abyssinkilians kept on, and took toward the southern direction of the Christian lines, crossing over a spur, and entering a large thicket.

The glandelinians kept on but as they came to the edge of the thicket, they were greatly astonished to find that the Abyssinkilians had reformed to make a stand and after firing a volley counter charged toward them.

fortunately for the foremost of the Landelinians the main column had almost dispersed the Aysenkinians, and were at their rear, and the Aysenkinians met a fire from two sides. Nearly a hundred and two of the Aysenkinians were killed, and one thousand one hundred and fourteen injured, the Aysenintians, lieutenant dropping dead, but the surviving soldiers wheeled and crashed through their perimeter, and escaped going on down the glens. One of the horses ridden by a lieutenant had his leg broken in the melee, but he beofre it fell the officer was lifted onto the back of another. So savage was the struggle, and the counter charges of the Aysenkinians that the Landelinians found it exceedingly dangerous too approach too near them, and it was Penrod they waited most this time and not the villain. These Glendelins had been sent for him by the spy, and seeing the house burned down and knowing the cause had set off in pursuit.

The Abyssinians and the Angelins retreated with their charges until they reached a morass, where the shouting and perspiring Angelins followed like roaring and howling mad dogs. Two of the Angelin officers fell, and about forty of the Angelins were hurged by horses into the morass, the animals of both parties wading knee deep through half frozen water mud, high dead grass and thick snow, shouting and most heavy firing was exchanged between them like mad for about twenty six minutes, and as the fugitives pressed on, the colonel could see a crowd of the regathered Angelins on a small rise of ground one hundred yards distant from which point they began shooting at the Angelins soldiers with scathing effect.

A terrible yell from the glandelinians then followed and the Angolians were seen to descend from their secure position and desperate their desperate adversary though a hundred fell on both sides in a minutes time. One of the Angolians sergeants had been mangled by the enraged glandelinians within sight of their comrades, who were unable to render him any assistance on time.

The poor soldier was indeed horribly mangled by the sabres of the enemy, and as usual with the savage glandulinians of all types, the furious rebels were not content until they had trampled the body so fiercely under their horses' hoofs that the dead man was found embedded and trampled so lightly in the mud hidden that only a portion of his head appeared above the marsh.

It was probable that the sergeant had been in the front ranks, when the wicked landelinians charged, and they had attacked so fierce y that none of the Angeliinians were able to go to his aid on time.

The Angelinians were able to go to his aid on time. The Angelinians and the Abyssinkillians resumed their made retreat the infuriased Angelinians after them full speed, the terrific pace of the pursuers However was for the moment checked by their main leaders horse stepping into a deep hole, and falling hard on his leg the throwing its rider headlong into the branches of a big popular tree. The horse however extricated extricated himself without any difficulty, but being too lame to run run the landaisian officer who was not hurt for his funny throwclimbed down the tree and mounted another, and the whole column again rode at full speed toward the fugitives, the Angalaisans and Abyssinkillians with their young charges having gained considerable distance, and disappearing into a large woods.

After a quarter of an hour of hard riding, the enemy saw the fugitives plowing through the brush like some immense engine tearing down everything in their way.

At this point the country was veyvery unfavorable for both persued and persuers, on account of deep forrows in the ground, and though the glandsilnians approued to within one hundred and twenty paces, they were unavle to get a fair volley.

Anybody both parties fairly flew, over rats and gulls, until the ponderous christian column was shasseto nother open plain when the enemy then started fir firing, and a ball struck the Abyssinkilium sho colonel in the shoulder. Although badly wounded, the officer did not fall, or slacken the speed of his horse, until another shot hit him close to the first one, and the others broth brought down his horse.seeing him wounded, and in danger of being captured 265 the rest of the Abyssinkillians now slackened the speed of their own steeds, then whooped about, and made strait for their pursuers, every soldier screaming "yo yo" yelling like infuriated fiends. The Glandelinians were bewildered by this sudden turn of events, and whooped getting sparse. Their horses, and as they were pursued for only a hundred yards made their escape, rallied and met the Abyssinkillians with a most gallant fire and then tripping many of those coming on behind and causing confusion. The horses put down the whole front rank of the column and half the number of the pursuers. A thousand had fallen at that one volley. At this the Abyssinkillians broke off into another direction. Among the foremost of the fugitives to escape from their strong escort, and while firing a and by firing a most tremendous volley with perfect aim, and following it up rapidly with a withering pistol fire mowed half half of their number down, and by an irretrievable chance succeeded in scattering the others, and then rode for the eight belated full girls, and the two boys, but mind you these very children seeing themselves alone, and pursued by twenty of the nearest of the rebels, turned to their horses, and counter charged so determinedly upon their assailants and fired their pistols so rapidly that for a time it appeared as if the Glandelinians would meet annihilation, but fortunately running out of ammunition the children stopped almost at the moment they might have annihilated the foremost of the pursuers, and retreating rapidly entered a thicket, where it was difficult for the Glandelinian horsemen to follow.

The main body of the pursuers pressed on without stopping to pick up their wounded comrades, and soon came upon the heroic children still far behind their escort. Their horses were standing in a painful attitude, as if upon the very point of dissolution, but this was the moment they saw the wicked Landelinians approaching; they reared away, the maddened Landelinians charging after them faster than they had ever urged their horses before. One fired a shot bringing the horse ridden by Jennie to its knees, but she rallied quickly and continued on. Screaming with rage the Landelinians rushed after the children whose horses were now badly jaded.

The race was now more exciting, for instead of stopping for a moment, the energy and the pursued children kept their horses at their swiftest pace the wicked Ol melnikians following hard for more than a mile, all the while the latter gaining rapidly but gradually, until the distance between pursued and pursuers was not less than ten yards, while the horses ridden by the brave children, were nearly ready to fall from complete exhaustion.

were nearly ready to fall from complete exhaustion. The Abyssinians who had been besetted from the children by mere force of collision with the overwhelming numbers, were so mindful of the latter's safety, that they made every effort to divert the attention of the Janglelinians to themselves, and then raised toward the party of children as fast as possible, to beat the Janglelinians to it. The Janglelin girls and the others, now without ammunition were almost on the verge of despair, they realized that the climax must soon be reached, and which would be hastened should their horses fall them. In a moment of desperation they turned their horses aside like hares doubling on the dogs, just in time to feel the swish of their long sabres as they grazed them, but the momentum of the speed carried the fierce Janglelinians past like a galloping tornado, seeing the children on horseback galloping in a new direction, the Janglelinians were about to wheel their horses to resume the pursuit, when the intervening column of Abyssinians Janglelinians were upon them like the noise and irresistible fury of a cyclone. It was an unequal contest as the Janglelinians were larger in number, but the Abyssinians rode through and scattered the whole swarm of rebel horsemen in many directions, giving the fugitive children time to rejoin the main escort, without hindrance from the enemy.

Then the whole body of fugitives resumed their retreat, while the foe was still in confusion. During this melee a most extraordinary contest raged: six of the glandelinians had been in close quarters with a single Abyssinkilian soldier, who tried to run the sabre through the body of one of them, but the savage Osarian Scoodler seized it in his hands, wrenching the weapon from him, and in an instant with savage blasphemy horrible to hear, got hold of the Abyssinkilian soldiers aim which in the fashion of a furious ape he seized with his teeth making them sink deeply into the flesh just directly above the elbow, which he tore and lacerated in the most frightful manner. Had not the other Abyssinkilians been close about him, the soldier would have been more seriously hurt if not slain, as in the grasp of this strong Omerian Scodder he was utterly powerless.

After this the Abyssinkilian soldier remained ill for a long time, and never recovered the use of his left arm. Two others of the Landolinians had viciously attacked the wounded colonel. It had been a moment of extreme peril for him but the quick action of his aide-de-camp, and his steady aim saved the colonel's life. He fired at the vicious Landolinian and killed him at almost the muzzle of his gun.

After some more fierce riding the fugitives reached a high hill surrounded by tall trees, banked up with snow drifts, ledges of rocks, and almost impenetrable brush. Here they determined to make a bold and last desperate stand. No attack then at this post the Landolinians would have to dismount from their horses or otherwise they would be dreadfully exposed to the fire from above.

This was indeed the beginning of the climax. The defenders immediately perceived that the rebels were maneuvering to surround this rise of ground with the purpose of attacking the fugitives on all sides.

The main section of the defended knoll, was crowded with the Abyssinkilian soldiers, but their apparent shelter was the thick brush, and the scattered boulders and other rocks. Expecting an easy victory the fierce Omerian Scodders and Whiskies dashed forward yelling, and cursing in indescribable fury.

The Angelinians themselves who as yet were in no favorable position to fire upon the enemy were set to work to reload muskets and pistols as fast as the Abyssinkilians fired them. At the moment before the first volley was fired, the Landolinians had come quite close.

At the first volley the foremost of the Landolinians recoiled behind what shelter they could find, while one of them hurled with direct aim a grenade, and the crash and the shower of splintered rock and clouds of smoke in and snow betokened the direction of eight Abyssinkilian soldiers, and the wounding of thirty four of them fatally.

In another instant these Landolinians rushed forward from their cover in a perfect perfect storm. At this critical moment most of the Abyssinkilians had no reloaded rifles, and already half of their ammunition was exhausted.

All of these Abyssinkilians however were very good shots, and they brought down every one of the Landolinians as fast as they appeared from cover, but the rebels attacked without ceasing with a blind fury, that even the Omerian girls had never witnessed in any regular animal, not even in the most ferocious bulldog.

But by the time the Landolinians had come within good range, the Angelinians also had secured a position to their utmost advantage, and having their own rifles loaded and ready for action, they awaited their own chances.

The movements of the Landolinian soldiers were so rapid as they charged, and darted from one shelter to another in a cloud of musketry smoke from their own rifle discharge, that it was almost impossible to aim more correctly at them.

The sun added with a cloudless sky was extremely light or bright, and as the foremost wave of Angelinian insurgents charged straight for the clearing the Abyssinkilians and Angelinians tore it to pieces with a scathing fire, nay did not rally tear it to pieces as to say but mowed the whole wave down in dead and wounded. The other Landolinians beginning to issue from their shelter recoiled, but recovered from the confusion they recovered at sight of this massacre of their comrades, and the whole force again commenced the attack.

The whole force of defenders fired volley after volley at them, but this without apparent effect, though a number were shot down. At length the rebels badly or apparently badly fatigued retired to their most secure shelter, there they remained at bay, cursing and swearing and blaspheming.

At that distance they could not hardly distinguish each other, as thick smoke and shrubbery concealed them. Some of the boldest of the Angelinians during the lull crawled forward and secured the ammunition and even rifles and pistols from the dead and fatally injured rebels, and returned safely to their refuge taking some of the wounded rebels with them, as a covering from the fire of the enemy below. During the lull the defenders took the precaution to strengthen their positions, and a half an hour elapsed, then the tremendous spitting roar of the Landolinian musketry gave warning that the Landolinians were again rushing indiscriminately to the assault. This time the rebels came charging toward the position, as if though on a avalanche could not stop them. In an instant those in front were close to the refuge, but the whole Christian force met the with deadly fire at close range mowing them all down.

As they dropped a most curious sight prevailed itself or presented itself. The Landolinians either slide down the hill head first, or on their front or back or feet first, or rolling down like as many barrels. Two Landolinians who were shot through the head fell backwards over a long heavy log, which sent it rolling over and over carrying all before it rush crushing brushwood, and scattering the Landolinians or catching those in its way, and rolling over them. In this manner the log rolled for over one hundred and fifty yards down the hill, cutting wide swath among the surprised Landolinians.

Below that point the defeated Landolinians remained, blaspheming and shouting, some laughing, and filling the air with loud and fierce exclamations.

To the amazement of the defenders, the rebel recovered and began to move slowly up the hill again, but carefully darting from one shelter to another, and moving toward the higher brush and dead grass, that covered part of the slopes. As they were far or too far distant for the shots of the defenders to be effective, the Angelinians waited a considerable time, before they opened fire.

In a short time the force within easy range rushed forward with louder yells. They were eight yards distant during slowly toward the position, and reserving their own fire this time. The nearest of the foe being a being a fair mark this time all of the defenders fired right and left with the most rapid and fierce precision, and absolutely saw a great number of Landolinians fall for every shot. Some of the Landolinians nevertheless nevertheless reached the position, and attempted to force their way in and over, but these only gave the Abyssinkilians a good chance, as these rebels were entirely exposed. These Landolinians fairly staggered forward the moment the shots were fired, and all fell dead among the defenses. The Omerian girls who had similar encounters with the Landolinians never witnessed such a determined and desperate frenzy and fury as was exhibited by these rebels. They appeared to be raving maniacs or like mad dogs in human form. Most of the Landolinians who had fallen near the position, were covered with frightful bullet wounds, the result of feeding facing the fire of the defenders while exposed so closely.

It can be supposed that the attack upon the escort was indeed induced by the presence of the eight girl heroines, and the two boys, which at the moment the foe saw them, were leaving the grounds of the house. Fenrod had been looked in vainly however, it was apparent they had been sent after him by the two Professional spies who had made him prisoner before in the house. During the last attack of the one of the Landolinians a most powerful man had succeeded in crossing the works, and with a fury that knew no bounds, he leaped upon the shoulders of the nearest Abyssinkilian soldier, and with the utmost ferocity began choking him as hard as he could.

The attack was so sudden that he was not able to use his bayonet. And he would undoubtedly have been choked to death in a minute if eight of his companions had not come to his assistance, who seeing his plight rushed to his aid and after a terrible battle in which all eight of them were wounded succeeded in despatching the brutal brute Landolinian with their bayonets. And the man who had slain this rebel had suddenly become heroes in the eyes of their countrymen.

Twice during these repeated attacks the ten heroic children had miraculous escapes from the bullets or bayonets of the foe, and one bullet barely grazed Fenrod, and another struck the ground near Violet, almost throwing stone dust and snow in her eyes. Fortunately along this point, the Glandelinians did not make any further attack. But the adventure had dragged them each further from the christ jan lines, and the fugitives found themselves at this point on account of the swift current of the water here close to the shore were a large number of rowboats.

Not retreating cautiously from their stronghold they took possession of the boats, and shot out into the water, and just in time, for a great number of the pursuing Glandelinians rushed down the slopes, having spotted their escape, and uttering fierce and savage adjulations. As the last boat containing soldiers left the river bank, then of the Glandelinians boldly rushed into the water, and grabbed hold of the boat, but were bayoneted or shot down upon the shore. There ensued an indescribable scene, a thousand ferocious Glandelinians, swarmed the shore banks, firing tremendous volleys and yelling and blaspheming like demons. However no one in the boats were hit, and the fugitives had a very good opportunity to effect their escape, the wounded colonel ordering the men by signal to row the boats through the water, with all possible speed.

This scene succeeded so well, that the boats were far out on the water, before the rebels could reach them. Another gird fight now took place, which was a lively one for several minutes. All of the soldiers in the boats, fired one tremendous broadside after another with great precision, and every shot told, scores of thereabouts on the shore, going down dead or wounded together.

Pistols were also brought to bear on them next, by which as many more were slain or wounded. This served to stop their attempts to reach the boats by swimming or wading, but others quickly manned half a dozen gasoline launches and shot out from the shore to continue the pursuit and battle. Two of these launches were sunk with a volley of musket balls, and two others had their engines disabled, and one backfired, set the gasoline tank on fire, and the explosion blew the boat to pieces and killed every one of its occupants. The result of the galling fire of the pursuers or fugitives I mean seemed to produce a panic among the surviving Glandelinians. Glandelinians for they showed signs of abating the attack, and some of the boats were put back to shore, with great speed and energy.

Owing to the fact that some of the fugitive boats were in a sinking condition and sank, and eighteen soldiers came near being drowned, the trip was somewhat delayed, until these comrades could be assisted into the other boats. During this moment the enemy on shore now three thousand were in number opened a heavier fire, but all those in the boats replied returning a brisk fire of their own that fairly mowed the fierce Glandelinians with swaths of flame, and put the survivors to rout so completely that these same Glandelinians gave the fugitives no further trouble.

The fugitive fleet bearing the Vivian girls, Angelinian Aronburg, and the two boys moved down the water again, hardly a single Glandelinian being seen now. As the fugitives approached the opposite shore thinking to land safely there as it appeared to be the Christian side, a hundred and ninety two big Glandelinian motor boats teeming with Glandelinian soldiers shot out from a bend in the river and made a sudden impetuous dash upon the fugitive boats, and amid a terrific exchange of musketry in which forty were killed and eighty wounded on the Christian side, and two hundred killed and four hundred on the enemy side, and thirty boats sunk, and nine disabled the superior force of surviving boats were driven to the shore, the retreat of the rebels being covered by a large body of soldiers on shore with muskets, and even cannons. The Glandelinian cannon on the shore were used with such extraordinary effect, that ten of the fugitive boats were struck, and shattered or sunk, with every one killed or wounded in them. This caused great confusion among the fugitives, but instead of following up this advantage by charging after the panic stricken Christians, the Glandelinians who were in the motor boats returned to the shore.

The Glandelinian officers were dreadfully affected by this defeat by a mere handful of fugitives, and calling their men about them they berated them soundly for their cowardice, reminding them that everything they had was due to their generosity, and swearing that if any more of them retreated again before the few fugitive boats, they would all be discharged from the army in disgrace. Suddenly the fugitives perceived moving toward them what appeared to be a floating stockade, one hundred and seventy feet long, and eighty seven feet wide, and apparently so strong that nothing could penetrate it. This novel craft floated with much grace and was manned by six hundred and eighteen rebels, and moved down the river like a tank of life.

As this terrible no man's land on the river approached the fugitive boats one inside of it caused a proclamation to be made to the Christians in deep and awful tones, that if they did not surrender themselves at once, all of their boats would be blown out of the water, and by the guns on shore.

It was only a sort of stratagem however, and realizing it no one in the boats gave any answer. They kept on going swiftly until they reached the opposite shore where all seemed clear of the fierce Glandelinian soldiery. After all of them had landed, the colonel sent his most faithful lieutenant to scout ahead of the main party, and see if the way was clear. But the officer did not return and a large part of the force went forward to investigate, and found the result was most deplorable, for the lieutenant had been treacherously murdered, and also were two soldiers who had been sent to accompany him.

This was a warning that a big force of Glandelinians were lying in ambush. At some other point Glandelinian sharpshooters, had been stationed behind trees and rocks to shoot down the two boys and eight girls, but though they fired at them a dozen times before they could reach the shelter of friendly trees, none of the shots at a mark them. However though two of their body guards were killed and eight wounded. Suspecting an ambush the Abyssinkillian and Angelinian soldiers formed in line, and slowly recoiled toward the boats, some of the soldiers setting fire to the dry pine leaves of the forest to turn them into smoke if possible, and soon all the pine trees for the distance of five hundred yards was enveloped in flames but only the tops and parts where the spinnels were. The Glandelinians then appeared, but on account of the smoke and heat of the fire their aim was without effect, while the slowly retreating Christians moved down the treacherous rebels by scores for every volley fired. This fierce contest with these Glandelinians continued until nearly night fall, when the fugitives retreated to the boats leaving those woods or the masses of trees above the snow a sheet of flame and smoke. The fugitive column had again made good their escape, and reached their boats in safety.

The colonel however saw that if he and his column remained at this location, they must certainly face starvation or be destroyed by the enemy, for although they could resist all the rebel scouting parties along the river bank as long as their ammunition held out, should they even attack them on all sides, yet provisions in this situation was exhausted, and no amount of provisions could be obtained by foraging, which would be without doubt exceedingly perilous if not impossible by reason of the overpowering numbers of the Glandelinian scout or searching parties.

Therefore to secure relief the colonel resolved to keep on going down the stream until General Harmon's lines was reached, and to do this it would be necessary to run the boats down the stream as far as it was not frozen over, and pass lines of hostile rebel encampments filled with hostile rebels who would contest every foot of the stream. It was now beginning to snow and soon had become a perfect blizzard, and in some parts were small swamps were formed swamp grass was nearly eight feet high in places affording excellent means for ambushes in the dark, and diminishing very much the superiority of pistols over rifles, and hidden cannons.

To cover their nightly retreat down the river many more big fires were started on the pine tree tops by the fugitives, until there seemed to be fires, fires, everywhere.

Every man had received his instructions how to act in case they were attacked by the glandelinians and was impressed with the necessity of maintaining their boats in a solid line which must not be broken by the enemy under no circumstances whatever. There were one hundred boats in all, containing ten men apiece, of which had been left out of the eleven thousand, and except one boat, that held the children, not a large force indeed compared to their foes, but their armament was splendid, all having repeating and Spencer rifles, including revolvers, and plenty of ammunition recently secured from the dead and wounded foes on the hills position.

Their movement was retarded however by the fact that they had to row very quietly and avoid the ice floes which were very frequent at some parts of the river. At the beginning of this silent retreat little trouble was experienced, only a few shots being fired from the shore, and some inconveniences produced by a gale rising and a great increase of the blizzard. As the retreat had been started so unexpectedly that the glandelinians had scarce scarcely knew it until the sentries spotted the dark moving objects on the water, and fire the alarm shots. Then however as the colonel had expected, hundreds of rebel boats were on his trail, and with the purpose to surround his rowboat fleet, and capture or destroy his whole troop. The grass and snow drifts along the shore and in the morasses had hidden many of these boats from view, and showers of bullets began flying as if discharged from the water. Two men in the first boat dropped, a bullet going through the fleshy portion of the arm of one of them, and passed through his body.

One man fell to the bottom of the boat and the other plunged headlong into the water. One of the glandelinians in the nearest boat leaped out into the water and swam toward his victim, but one of the fugitives in the same boat, drew a revolver and killed the rebel. The enemy boats were finally dispersed by a raking withering fire of an hours duration, but less than a mile further down when landing on and ascending a small hill in the face of the raging blizzard and screaming gale of wind in short order, a sudden uproar broke out as if all the demons of hell were resolved to capture and destroy the fugitives.

Terrific yells, fierce shouts of defiance, rolling of drums, shouts of blasphemies, the screams of whistles, the crash of musketry from many hundreds of the concealed glandelinians, for an instant startled the fugitives. There was a tremendous rushing sound coming up the hill which gave notice of a general attack from an immensely large and powerful ambuscade in the dark, and blizzard pall.

The officers did their duty. In a moments time alternate files were behind trees and rocks and snow banks facing to the left and right either standing or kneeling, just as the enemy's musketry fire drew nearer, and bullets began to fly dangerously near. The officers then gave the order to fire, and the fight commenced on the side of the Angelinians. The colonel who was nearest he them, heard several bullets scream past within an inch or two of Violet Violet's head. Luckily they were kneeling behind stout trees.

The file firing was extremely good and very incessant, despite the intense darkness, fierce wind and blinding snow, and the musketry of both sides rattled without intermission. The darkness was so dense however and the snow pall so thick and the wind so strong and boisterous that simple pistol shots, would have been ineffective, although excellent at close quarters. And the defenders only fired and aimed in the direction they saw the flash of the enemy's rifles. The Angelinians even handled elephant breach rifles or loaders, and a volley of double shots to the right and left was followed by the loud explosions of piorate or potash shells, against some unseen object, either men or trees.

And a quick repetition of hundreds of piorate shells seemed to affect the spirit of the attack. It was entirely probable that the salvoes of extremely loud explosions of the shells in the midst and perhaps also in the rear of the rebels led them to believe that they were attacked from behind.

It may be difficult to tell the reader how long this night attack of the enemy continued, but a vast amount of ammunition was used before the roar of the glandelinian rifles ceased, and the drums and outcries were at length heard at a greatest greater distance in the rear. The officers gave the orders to advance, and the men with the children in their midst cautiously marched forward recrossing the stream at the bottom of the hill, and at break of day gained the open where they suddenly found themselves in a sort of swampy region of one hundred acres or more covered deep with slushy snow. The blizzard was still raging.

"Ha!" exclaimed one of the Abyssinkilian soldiers. "If we only could have enticed the glandelinians into a clear space like this."

However as the fugitives continued on, the rear guard was hard pressed, and the van of the glandelinian persecutors or attackers, rushed upon the path close to the little girls, who brought many down themselves. The vivian girls depended upon the muskets of the soldiers, instead of their own pistols, they would have been quiet quickly destroyed, but the sharp fire of their pistols at such close quarters caused immense loss to the enemy, at the first onslaught. The rear guard of the enemy was dispersed, and by the vivian girls, but it was necessary to sacrifice nearly all the luggage to allow the men more free movement, accordingly everything except ammunition, was piled together and burned or thrown into the stream.

Again the troop of fugitives moved forward, but at every hill glen or field they were met by an ambuscade that had to be cleared by fierce and dreadful fighting, so that progress was wretchedly slow. At a bend of the stream which was reached shortly before noon, the troop of soldiers were suddenly and most fiercely attacked by a very strong force of Zimmerman Angelinians. Glandelinians in ambush. Many of the enemy exposed themselves in the boldest manner, and rushed upon the Abyssinkilian soldiers, just in front of those escorting the vivian girls, Gertrude Angelina, and the two boy scouts. Twenty three of these bold rebels were promptly shot down, but one big glandelinian soldier with unusual pluck bayoneted a soldier whose musket missed fire through the chest. This poor fellow thus mortally wounded grappled with his assailant, and drove his own bayonet through the rebels heart. Again after desperate fighting the glandelinians were dispersed and for half an hour there was no further trouble, but just as the party gained a broad road covered a foot deep with fresh snow, and within plain sight of the christianian lines, a thousand glandelinians fell upon them again. An escort of Angelina Aronburg was wounded by a bayonet which passed through his leg behind the knee, and out the sinew, thus rendering him helpless, and he was captured and foully murdered.

Another soldier close to her now uttered a wild shriek of pain as a bullet passed completely through his body. The poor soldier crept to his commander through the deep snow on his hands and knees and asked:

"Where shall I go? I'm done for."

He did not have another minute to live. A bullet struck another of her escort on the hip, and lieutenant Frank Vero was also wounded. A bullet had struck him behind the shoulder point, and had passed through the blade bone and the spine, before making its exit by the right arm. It was a very bad wound and bled profusely.

But the gallant lieutenant marched on, after having it dressed and bandaged despite the worst he could expect. One of the escorts of the vivian girls Vivian girls carrying a heavy load received a bullet just behind the left arm, which penetrated a double blanket and passed entirely through the poor mans body. Still he was able to carry his load for more than a mile before he collapsed. The entire march was a continued flight so that it would be tedious to describe each special special assault, but when the christianian positions were within sight two miles away, the whole column reached alongs Run, a small stream running into the Sunbeam Creek with a loss of thirty killed and forty more wounded. Here they were joyful at the sight of the christianian lines, which they reached within half an hour more and where every want was provided for. This was general Conscientian Aronburgs camp, whose officers received the soldiers, and the children with all the honor due them.

"I'll remain upstairs 'n Penrod's bed room." He had said to the general side-de-de-ump. "If the general wishes to see me just give a whistle and I'll be coming."

He writhed on his couch as if in mortal agony, he wrought himself into a frenzy of misery and terror, by recalling one by one all the most heinous crimes upon children by the "landladies," and bit his finger nails in a way as if he desired to rid his hands of them. He knew that he had not yet been called upon to do anything, and yet he dared not leave his post. It was his duty to remain at his post at all costs until summoned. Yet the Rattlesnake felt it was his duty to do something.

to do something. It was a ward ten o'clock at night when General Greathart opened the door of his council room because he knew he must at least go to his own bed room and throw himself upon his bed even if his heart ached him too much to allow him to sleep. But as he opened his door he observed something that gave him a good start. The Rattlesnake boy about was sitting by the left side of the door or was huddled on the floor near it with his back resting against the wall. And the boy had a large piece of yellow paper in his hand and a pencil in the other hand, and his twisted bull dog like face was indeed a weird thing for the unhappy general general to see.

'My boy what ix is it that you are sitting so quietly here!' General Greathheart asked.

"I have been sitting here for four hours and a half your Excellency. I knew you would be coming out of the council room sometime, and I hope you will let me speak to you. will you sir))) will you sir-----Will you!"

"Come my boy into my council room." Said General Greathheart. "I will be glad to listen to anything you wish to say. And what is it you have been drawing on that large slip of yellow paper." As the Rattlesnake boy rose in the wonderful manner he had succeeded in learning by his own effort.

wonderful manner he had succeeded in learning by his own efforts. "I did not dare to leave or go out of the house as I believed you might want to send me somewhere. While Penrod is missing so mysteriously, I dare not sit around the place doing nothing. And despite my own anxiety I began to remember and think things out. I saw him help the little girl whose leg is wounded to her tent, and though I have not seen him leave, I remember where her tent is, and with your permission I will visit her. I have sketched and named all the company streets and squares in your camp through which he might have walked on his way home after leaving her tent. I'm sure I have not missed a single one. And if you will permit me I will start out, and walk carefully through every one of them. After seeing, he talk to every officer of the squad or guards I see, and look into all the vacant tents, and think out many important things and also work carefully at them-- nay I'll not miss a single inch, I'll not miss a tent, or any space between them--I'll all at once his voice had a very hard sound, but it took convulsively and the poor boy himself shook. The general gently touched him on the shoulder. "You are one of my best and bravest comrades indeed," he said slowly. "And it is well for even our cause that you are here. You have indeed thought of the very best thing to do yet."

CHAPTER TWENTY TWO.
HOW PENROD WAS RESCUED.
THE BOYS INVENT MORE SCENES TO CANTHRE VIVIAN WICKSY.

".....WELL, YOU ALLOW ME THE permission to go and see her now?" Asked the Rattlesnake boy scout.

".....umay but an escort must accompany you," was the general's answer. "I'll order them to be ready at once."

The Rattlesnake boy scout then went to the front door, buckling on his cartridge belt, and revolver. Before he left, general Great heart said something to the boy which to him and the general too, was like the sudden glare of some beautiful colored light in the very center of their beings.

"You are one of the best boy scouts that the army has. And now that you are doing this, I'm sure I'll be able to rest easier, and get some sleep. You may one day be the chosen comrade of the Vivian girls themselves."

After wandering about the encampment for fifteen minutes in the dark and encountering nothing more than a few sentries, and a few winter night owls and other winter birds which flew out of their respective places at his approach, he came within view of the tent he had seen Penrod bring the little wounded girl. As he approached the tent, he could hear away in the distance the occasional drum like booming of signal guns, and the echoing voices of sentinels calling out their stations and the periodical crash of exploding shells, otherwise all was more remarkable still than usual for such a seige.

There were three powerful guards standing by the tent, and finding that the little girl had not slept on account of worrying over Penrod, the boy showed his permit, and therefore was admitted....As he entered he saw the little girl lying on her couch or cu couch but standing beside her was another little girl about his size but slender and a just a little older than the wounded heroine.

Just now she wore no uniform, but had on a white dress, with a heavy scarlet cloak of quaint quaint old fashioned shape over her shoulders. Her head was not covered, and her fair curly hair fell in a mass of golden waves and long curls over her neck and shoulders. There being a lantern light in the tent, Penrod could see her face very distinctly, and gave vent to a low exclamation of admiration. Her face was almost as attractive as the Vivian girls, the features being delicately moulded, and in the most perfect proportion, and the eyes long and blue. Yet the Rattlesnake felt that something was indeed wrong. Her cheeks were a trifle too white, tears were in her eyes, and also there was a half frightened half resolute look in them, and lines of pain, sorrow and anxiety about her dainty mouth, that struck the Rattlesnake as out of place. And it seemed as if they did not and ought not to belong to such a sweet childish countenance. The Rattlesnake took off his hat for she was infernally pretty, despite the dreadful expression on her face that seemed so utterly out of keeping with one so childish and enchanting. If ever any features betrayed that within the war wearers breasts there dwelt a hell of heart breaking sorrow and anxiety those features, and that being were then present to him. One of her hands was on the port of the couch as he entered he noticed it part icularly and was greatly struck with its beauty. Never had he ever seen such long white tapering fingers or sh such beautifully shaped glistening filbertnails and marvellously beautiful form, but it was her expression that had arrested him most. He still stood at the opening of the tent wondering whom she was, when she said a few words to Jennie Turner, and then approached the opening. The boy stepped aside to let her pass, but instead of going out she placed her hand gently on his shoulder, and with a pleading look that thrilled him said:

"My beloved friend Penrod has been kidnapped. Jennie is sure she knows where they have taken him, and Gertrude Angeline and others are on their trail.

Won't you please please help me and my sisters find him. You are so good at finding lost people. You rescued Jennie too you know."

Of course that was his mission. He had come out for the purpose of locating him, but her sorrowful pleading expression, that irresistible pleading look touched to the melting point, and his breast swelled as he said;

"By jove he is my dear friend too. I'll help you find him little girl if I die for it."

At this answer to his sudden embarrassment as well as delight, she threw her arms lovingly and tightly around him, and planted a kiss to his cheek. He knew now that it was Joyce, Vivian, the eldest of the brave Vivian, the Girl, and as it had always been proved that she and her sisters were so friendly and as good and loving and more in disposition and character than they were in beauty, and appearance, he became so hopelessly infatuated, that before he realized what he was doing, he had her in his own arms in a tight embrace.

"By Jove," Jennie surmised from the bed as soon as he had released the surprised Vivian girl. "It's a quu Queer hour for a boy and a girl to be hugging each other."

"I forgot myself," the Rattlesnake replied seeing that Joice was smiling at him joyously and gratefully. "Anyway she did it m to me and it was my duty to return it."

'Don't you know there is a penat penalty for it.' Said the girl.

"Penalty. Fiddlesticks," said the Rattlesnake, laughing. "who ever heard of a penalty for loving a person. I know the, 'lavin' girls from the time they were born, and we were the best of friends. If any one attempted to injure them in any way, the there would be a penalty. Why and her sisters are so prett y and so good and kind in every way that I only wish I was their youngest brother."

From this meeting it was apparent, that the Rattlesnakes and Penrds good luck sprang. The Rattlesnake along with the seven vivian girls kept on the search all night with twenty two thousand soldiers scattered over a wide territory as they escorted, and by morning seeing a house in the distance, surrounded by soldiers rode on ahead. As the boy approached nearer to the house he heard a faint sound of singing apparently from under the house, and this arresting his attention, he bade the vivian girls to listen.

As they approached nearer, the sound grew loud louder, and presently resolved itself into a man singing at the top of his voice, singing very loudly some very wistful and plaintive old tune or old time air of some war song of a foreign nation. Through this the reader may know the rest, how after Penrod was rescued from the house, how the column was pursued for twenty four hours, with out a bite to eat, or a moment to sleep and suffering dreadful losses.

And mainly it was because the y followed the Rattlesnake plan, that they reached the christian lines safely, with great loss however but slight compared to that of their relentless pursuers.

After all relieved a hearty meal in the generals house, they had gone to their respective places to obtain a well needed rest and sleep. After sunrise both boys were eagerly questioned by soldiers and officers, and Penrod explained the adventure as much as he could. It was known that many crimes too heinous for words had been attributed to these spies, and that they had been brutally strangled too little girls and one boy on general Anders premises with their own hands, and gashing open their bodies, disembowled them, and brought them in and left them in that state in the mess hall. A nation and world wide search was being made for the assassins. Wherever these spies appeared it invariably portended a disaster to either a division of troops or a whole army and for some important general. Never for once yet had a rebel spy failed to cause a disaster.

"Yes he is one of the best, noblest, and bravest of all boy scouts I have ever known in all my life." General Greateheart had said, when he told his own part of the story to Penrod, Angelina Aronburg, and the vivian Girls as they sat round his big table.

"I had never been sure about him before." Said Angelina Aronburg looking at him proudly. "As I wanted to be sure I put him secretly to t he test, when we were perused after rescuing Penrod. During that perusit I saw into the depths of him and knew. He is well worth his peculiar nickname. He may be trusted as the leader of the boy scout squad against mine or the beautiful friends of mine the Vivian Girls. The enemy sought to avoid him only no matter how they perused thru our column but never escaped his dreadful fire. He even once permed a squadron single from that day indeed, both he and Perrod held a new place everywhere in general Headquarters army. None of the boysouts of the lowest or highest rank resented their holding it. Neither were the y jealous. But they were proud. But such or the boys were allowed to be near general Graebrecht or in the friendship of the nine they heroines as they had never dared to hope to be near. Also it was not only that they were allowed to serve the general or his staff in many important ways, but as if a he was their father, and the two boys his loving sons.

General Greathearth talked to the two boys as he talked to the virgin girls, or at least superior generals, drawing them within the circle which held so much for them, comprehended without speech. And the Rattlesnake boy knew that general Greathearth did it right in his mind, and observing all his plans with exultation, and as he realized it, it filled him with joy. And the general had told the virgin girls that he was one of the best boyscouts in all, and now the general was watching and putting him to a kind of problems and tests, so that he might find out what kind of a boy scout he was going to be, and also he was doing it for some very grave reason of his own.

and whatever was happening possessed the Rattlesnake boys mind and wondered if he would be trusted more than he was before. That he even should think that the Vivian girls even had so much confidence in him, was enough to give him the strongest in inspiration at that.

"Your Excellency," Herald the morning after he and Penrod had been fully rested, and because the general had seen that the Rattlesnake boy was making sketches of Sunbeam Creek, and the one way's positions. His voice on this occasion was very low indeed--"do you think if the time came--if it ever does, you could trust me on most important errands as you could trust Penrod. Could it ever be true that w you would?"

"It is positively true that the tithings already come," and the general spoke as low as the boy had done, though with a strong and deep feeling. "The time has already come, when I or any of the highest generals, can trust you with even the livian girls, that soon Penrod will be sent on some important mission, and that you will be his companion, to care for him, to stand by his side at any moment of peril."

This indeed seemed to be enough to lift the Rattlesnake boy to the very sky with exaltation. But the general had more to say.

"And from the very everything appears within the extensive lines of the foe, it may not be very long before it may be his part to do some most important kind of work, in which he will need a most reliable and trustworthy comrade, who can be depended on to accomplish anything, and as to stand as firm as a rock when he or his comrade faces the dangerous foe."

The great general had said to the Rattlesnake boy, the very words he had suspected he would say. As firm as a rock barrier. A rock Barrier.

"As firm as a rock barrier," the boy scout broke out. "Let me show you what I can do sir. Send me with him as his assistant. The dangers I may face are nothing. You have seen from actual proofs, that I ever even brought the dear civilian girls safely through the ambushes, when we were persecuted. I've been trained to do things that makes the rebels fear to have an encounter with me."

"I know that is all more than true my dear lad. Penrod, and the vivian girl, and even Angelina Aronburg, and even Jennie Urner had told me all of it in deat detail."

The general gave the boy a most grac gracious smile indeed, which seemed as if it held the finest secret in the world. "I will send you as his aide-de-camp. It shall be as great for you as if it was only a game." The great general had always been

General had always accomplish a accomplished all his in his power to encourage the boy and during the last week before the frightful battle of Sumner Creek, near Evangelina Granja, had even found time to help both boys in their planning for mysterious scouting journeys, of the Secret Gemini, and the general had been so intensely interested that frequently he had called on his highest generals to give their opinion of certain old and fortified positions of the rebels, and of their strength and formation, and how certain strong attacking forces can approach them without suffering too severe losses in the the efforts. Also of the small towns and villages they had in their possession. And also to other points, where spies could be sent and where they could learn all that was most important, and how they could easily find their way among the wicker bolder of the child slaves. It would be possible however, that if not discovered, they would meet with the greatest hospitality even among the worse of the wicked Glandelinians. And if the boys were sent within the enemy's lines they would have to be very cautious as the glandelinians hold with the most unfriendly suspicion all strangers who enter their lines.

And the glandelinians to be mostly and more greatly feared, are the Omerian Snoddlers. Through talks and stories the Rattlesnake began to know all parts of the foe's lines, as if he had forced themselves, and would be able to find the most important places as well as Angelina Aronburg or violet and her sisters could. That was a part of his duty too, because they trusted all to his care. And another part of it was the training of the Rattlesnake boys memory, and bringing home his full proofs of his successful work at night when he returned either from drilling his Regiment or from a thrilling scouting tour, and could describe, roughly sketch all he had seen or done in his tours, from from place of the camp to another.

What Penrod generally did, was to recall and sketch maps or pictures of any sections of the enemy's lines, or fortifications, and the faces of all he saw the rebel generals, and other officers. General Greathart gave to Penrod one day a number of photographs of glandelinians generals, and pictures of various varieties of glandelinian soldiery, to commit to his memory, under each face or picture was written the name of the general, or of the sects of the glandelinians.

"Learn as all these things for the sake of your own safety," said the general. "Until you would know each one of them at once, where ever you would happen to meet them. Fix all of them upon your mind, so you will not be able to forget anything of these pictures, or photographs. You also for your own safety, must be able to sketch any one of them by heart, and recall what part of the rebels lines, fortifications, or parts of the ivian, they are in."

Given this was the best kind of duty that Penrod or the Rattlesnake boy could perform, but Penrod began to know in his secret heart that it was so important that he became so overcome with excitement, that his whole form trembled, as he drew his sketches over and over again. And he knew that the best way to remember them was to sketch them all many times, and to sketch them in his memory.

And the Rattlesnake boy scout also knew though he had no reason for knowing, that all was perfect. For night after night, he used to lie away awake and think it over and remember what general Greathart had told him of the time coming when Penrod or the ivian girls might need him as a well trusted comrade, in any work they might perform.

And what was the work to be that Penrod was to perform? Was it to be something thrilling indeed? And the general was preparing him and the Rattlesnake for it. And also though Penrod himself often lay awake on his bed, when the Rattlesnake boy lay awake on his army cot, neither took the time to speak a moment to the other of the very things his mind was dwelling upon steadily.

And never did Penrod work so much in his life as he did now. Everything the boy thought of or did, was very exciting, and he felt sure of his own prowess. Many of the best boy scouts of the most highest rank, were obliged to be with them, because they were needed as witness judges. General Greathart would mention the name of a certain fortification, perhaps of Lucille, Joken, or of his Whirther proper, and Penrod would at once make a rapid sketch of either of them or any place under whose photograph the name of the place, and its locality had been written.

And indeed it was not long before the boy who was a good artist, could begin to make his sketches without a moment's hesitation. And yet when this had been accomplished, they still worked on it as if they had just begun.

There was a great section of the Codornian and at peninean fortifications about half a mile northwest of the south end of the Norma river near Delight Junction of which Penrod felt he should never hear the name or know its very formation, without these starting up before his mental vision of a very tall glandelinian general with fierce black eyes, and heavy beard, yet a delicate high bridged nose across which the strong heavy there was a number of great. This was general Purragatorian. In ivian history there was a number of great Tribunals which would always bring back the sad memory when the ivian girls were brought before its cruel judges, to be sentenced during the "Reign of ERROR".

In her a Catherine.

And a certain street in Norma Catherine sent the spot where the disguised christian officer by his clever ruse saved them from a most horrible death. He knew all of every section of ivian history as he knew his own face, and his own lodin lodging place. But night after night they sat it up. One night nearly a week before the battle Penrod was awakened out of a deep sleep by the general's aide-de-camp touching him, and shaking him. He had always been secretly ready for a long time to answer any call, and at the first shake, he sat up straight in bed.

"You are asked to dress yourself very quickly, and come down stairs," said the aide-de-camp. "There are a number of great generals here, and one of them wishes to speak with you."

Penrod did not answer but immediately got out of bed, and began to slip on his clothes as fast as he could. The aide-de-camp then touched the Rattlesnake boy who appeared to be as ready as Penrod, and sat upright as he had done.

"Come down to general Greathart's room with Master Penrod," he said with a tone of command. "It is necessary that the generals should see you too and speak to you."

And having given this order he went away. No one else heard the two boys as they stole down the stairs in only the their stockings and long coats. As they entered the room they saw seven elderly looking men attired in the garb of the Gemini, standing quietly by the general's round table, one of them talking to general Greathart, who with a gesture called both of the boys forward.

"General Antonio Sengue has been very much interested in what I have been telling him and his staff officers of your plans and schemes," he said lowering his voice very carefully. "He and his generals would like to see you make your sketches Penrod."

Penrod stared at general Sengue as if surprised, and then looked the other generals straight in the eyes, and their own eyes were fixed intently on him, as both boys made their bow and salute.

"The excellencies do us the highest honor," said Penrod in the same easy manner as general Greathart speaks to his superior officers. Penrod then went to his own little round table at once and took from an oval shaped shaped drawer his papers and colored crayon.

"I should know he is from a foreign country, and probably a Gand Can dian too," remarked general Sengue. "But that does not matter."

Then the general looked at the Rattlesnake with his keen and deep set eyes, and pointed with his finger but said nothing.

"This boy," said general Greathart. "Is the one who terrorizes the enemy so much that he is known as the Rattlesnake by the glandelinian soldiers. He is one of the best boy scouts in our army, and a great favorite of the ivian girls."

The boy then spoke of gave a salute.

"Please tell the general your Excellency," he whispered. "That what I did does not matter now."

"This boy," said general Greathart, had been of his literally been able to train himself to the most extraordinary activity, ever seen among boy scouts. He can and had been doing everything that has well brought him the nickname he has."

"Both of these boys are a great advantage to the nation, and a great benefit to the cause," said one of the other generals whose keen eyes were still taking the Rattlesnake in.

And I thank you for...
and what...
of the child slaves...

The aide-de-camp had before this made a perfectly good drawing board for Penrod who used it in making his sketches, of plans, maps and fortifications, when he had nothing else to do. The aide-de-camp was during the conversation standing at attention at the doorway, but at general Greathart's orders he immediately entered the room, brought the drawing board from its place of concealment, and at Penrod's direction brought and arranged the necessary drawing material. Penrod stood quietly near the table, and waited the pleasure of general Greathart, and his visiting generals. They were at this very moment speaking to each other in the lowest tones possible, and therefore the boy waited until they were finished. At this time the Rattlesnake boy took notice of what he had always noticed before that Penrod was able to be in perfect ease, and also silence, while he could stand as still as a statue.

He did not say a single word, or ask any questions, or look at the generals as if he was becoming restless, because they did not speak to him or notice that he was waiting. Penrod did not act as if he wanted them to notice him, and the Rattlesnake boy had a vague feeling, that young as he was for his years, this freedom very freedom Penrod had from any anxiety to be looked at or to be spoken to by any of the generals made him somehow appear like Emperor Livian.

In a moment general Greathart, and the others approached to Penrod's round table at which he stood with the drawing board, papers and colored crayons laid neatly upon it.

"Draw the outlines of Fort Ross Lucille Rickson rapidly," general Greathart said.

At the word Penrod began to make sketches of the fortress named with a rapidity that amazed Benguine and his staff. He even then on a separate piece of paper began without copying from anything else the exact picture or portraiture of the stern faced general Rickson Furgatorian with the delicate high bridged nose and the black eye brows and heavy beard. As Penrod did it so rapidly the generals came close surrounding the little table, and carefully watching the boy work over his shoulder. It only took a little over two minutes to sketch the two, and when the boy finished it, the aide-de-camp who was acting as inspector turned and after giving general Greathart a strange and steady look nodded twice and saluted.

"These two sketches are remarkable for a boy of his age," he said earnestly.

"In both of these sketches neither the outlines of these fortifications nor the portraits of general Rickson Furgatorian can be mistaken by anyone," general Greathart bent his head in a noble manner, then mentioned the name of another fortification in another section — and again Penrod started his rapid sketch. This time there was a much larger picture than before. All of the generals bowed, and looked looked looked Flahbergsted. Then general Greathart gave Penrod signs to sketch rapidly the Glandelinians of the different varieties, and after that the various formations of the positions of the in insurgents half a mile west of gunbeam Creek, and Penrod did the work well to a finish, and the aide-de-camp stood near with a big handful of sketches which he had silently removed from the table to take charge of, and each was rapidly trust as he made.

"You would know by heart the faces of these generals, and the various seats of rebels and the outlines of all the fortifications surrounding Livian Wickey wherever you happen to observe them," asked general Benguine. "If one of these rebel generals was within our lines and you saw him pass you in this Company St rest, or was in this room among us, and you did not know it, and we not you would recognise him at once!"

"As I know of you sir or my own face or sir," answered Penrod without sound of pride in his tone.

Then he followed immediately by a number of serious and important questions. General Greathart asked Penrod these questions, as he had often asked them before. They were very important questions indeed, as to the height, and build of the originals of his sketches, of the color of the fortifications, the hues of the hair and eyes of the Glandelinian officers, and the order of their complexions.

CHAPTER TWENTY THREE

THE BOYS HAVE ANOTHER VERY THRILLING ADVENTURE.

To all the questions Penrod gave steady and correct answers. He knew everything by heart the general asked, even the names and their situations. It however was not necessary that Penrod should have known them, but it was his desire. After the general finished with his questioning, general Sengulne pointed to the Rattlesnake boy who had stood with his back to the wall, his eyes as fiercely eager as a ferret.

"And what about him?" The general demanded. "What can he do?"
 "Let me make a try at it," said the Rattlesnake boy eagerly. "Penrod knows what I can do!"

Penrod looked at general Greathart for a moment and then said:

"May I be allowed to show the general your Excellency?"
 "Yes you may," general Greathart answered, and then as he turned to general Sengulne he said in his own usual low voice:
 "He is one of our well experienced boy scouts."

Then Penrod began at once a new form of the examination. He held up one of the sketches of the fortifications, and a picture of general Po Purgatorians face before the Rattlesnake, and the latter once named the fortifications. Fortifications and the connecting approaches to it, he detailed the colors of the eye and hair of the glandelinian general, the height and built, all the personal details as the boy Penrod himself had done or described them. To these he added the description of all sections of Vivian Wickey, and the points with the connecting fortifications, and also the various sections of the glandelinian armies, and their various sects, such as the Growleywogs, Phantoms, Whimsies, Scoddlers, Zimmermannians, Omarians, Mis-Mollatinians, Gargoylians, Amarcinians, and the fierce Gargoylian Kurds, and Condorcetians. His face seemed to be twisting it into strange lines, his eyes glared like coals of fire, and there was a slight tremor in his voice, but he ceased the general with his readiness to answer every question asked, and his great and unusual exactness of memory for a boy of his age.

"I can also draw very well," he said at the end. "And I can remember mostly anything I did not like to have any one be thinking that I was still trying to learn the same things. So both I and Penrod know."

As he spoke there was a sound as of an appeal in his voice.
 "It was the Rattlesnake boy who invented all these plans," said general Greathart. "I showed to you all his strange maps and plans as you asked."

"It is as good as a winning game," general Sengulne answered in the manner of a man whose interest was more than unusually impressed. "They know everything well. They can some day be trusted to be the appointed guardians of the Vivian girls too. I'll say."

"No such thing can be done without permit or without their permit," general Greathart said. "But they are worth it." "Their plans are daring and very simple."

"Therein lies the safety of the Vivian girls," answered general Sengulne. "Perhaps their plans will also cause the recapture of Vivian Wickey." "said general Greathart. "And perhaps no other boys could have ever imagined it."

"The generals are very thankful to you," he said after a few more words were spoken aside to the officers. "We all thank you very much. Now you may go back to your sleeping quarters." "The boys obeyed willingly."

CHAPTER TWENTY THREE.
THE BOYS HAVE ANOTHER VERY THRILLING ADVENTURE.

ONLY A DAY HAD PASSED when Colonel Penrod brought to his companion the Rattle-snake boy scout in their bedroom a large yellow envelope, which on opening they observed contained a number of pin pink slips of paper with yellow borders on each of which there was something very important written.

"This is something that general Greatheart received for me, from the Emperor," Penrod said in a very grave tone. "Let us two sit down together by my table, and look it over." "It is something we are asked to do."

The Rattlesnake boy thinking it unusual, sat down by the table opposite Penrod, and they began to examine the contents of the slips. At the head of each was the name of several places around Jivian wickey with which Penrod had not connected the pictures of the various sects of the glandelinians they were to avoid. Below written by Emperor Jivian himself were clear and concise directions, as how those very places were to be reached, and the strange counter signs to be used when a glandelinian sentinel was to be encountered.

"This section of the enemy's lines is to be located in the vicinity of Jennie Jivian," was the writing. "You first must be careful beyond the enemy's scouting parties at Kahl No. One; they are Gargoylian Kurds. In that location hidden near the insurgent lines is a Gemini Secret Service Agent. You must attract his attention by getting as near as possible, and using your Secret signals. When he approaches you touch your forehead slightly, with the fore by the forehead, with your right hand, and then make the signal when he comes up to you, utter in low but very distinct tones: 'Heaven Leave enemy's territory as soon as possible, before you are discovered. Big attacks to be made upon the foe lines at Jennie Jivian. That is all you are to do.'"

Most of the other directions were not quite so simple, but every one were strict instructions of the very same kind. All the originals of the sketches of the foe lines in that very quarter were to be carefully caught out, but with the utmost precaution which should conceal all suspicions that they were being spied upon and always in such a manner as would cause a disastrous or tragic encounter to appear to be out of the question.

Then if they spotted the Gemini Agent, the boys were to utter certain words to him without attracting the attention of glandelinian sentries, or scouting parties. The two boys carefully worked at their new tasks throughout the day, which was stormy and boisterous a fierce blizzard raging. Despite the exciting uproar they concentrated all the power in their minds upon it. They wrote down what they read, and reread it over and over again like two school boys being made to study after school for bad behavior.

They even repeated to each other what they committed to their memories, like children do who expect a punishment if they do not learn their lessons. However Penrod was working with greater rapidity and more ease than did the Rattlesnake boy, because this kind of work had been his frequent practice and entertaining exercise, from the day he came to Abhis-unia, and entered her Federal armies. The Rattlesnake boy however did his best to keep pace with him, for all Abyssinilian lads of like age had been born with a strange phenomenal memory, and therefore his eagerness, and desire were furious.

But throughout the whole day however, neither one of the boys had time to even refer to what they were doing, as anything else else but the Gemini. At the approach of night however, it is truthfully said, that each of them were lying awake, and while looking out of the window, and hearing the noise of the raging blizzard, they were thinking.

"It is what the daring and clever commanders of the Great Gemini, and their Secret Society would be so doing if so ordered, when they are sent within the foe lines, to learn the intentions of the rebel generals," said the Rattlesnake boy suddenly breaking in the silence. "And I made up some of these plans the first day I recruited my company of boy scouts did I not?" "Yes it is true," answered Penrod.

After another two days of studious concentration, they had learned by heart every thing that Emperor Jivian had sent them to learn. Early that night before the two boys retired, general Greatheart put them through a cross examination.

"Can you write all those things without looking at the copy?" He asked after each had repeated them, and pulled through the cross questioning without a miss. Each of the boys quickly and neatly wrote and drew them as Emperor Jivian had sent them. Then general Greatheart said to Penrod:

"Write your in English, French, German, and also Spanish."

Penrod did and then said:

"I have finished all that you have told me to do. I have learned every part as you see general, as if it were a part of myself, or of my heart."

"I believe you are speaking the truth," general Greatheart answered.

For some reason that either boys could not make out, the general's face was pale that evening, and there was also a strange shadowy look on the face of his aide-de-camp. General Greatheart's eyes that evening as he had been speaking to Penrod had a serious longing, as they gazed on the boy. It was just as the boy suspected, a strange yearning that had a great dread of something horrible approaching, some dread event, probably. When the general's aide-de-camp, did not act or seem as he usually did, and neither general Greatheart. They were red faced instead of appearing white or pale, and they moved about the rooms with much an uncertainty, that Penrod or the Rattlesnake felt sure they were terribly excited or restless. The aide-de-camp who seemed worse of all cleared his throat as if he was more than nervous, and more than twelve times as left his couch as if to go out of the door to look for something else.

It was nearly nine o'clock at night, past Penrod's bedroom time, when general Greatheart arose from his chair, and standing near Penrod for several minutes in silence, suddenly placed his arms around his shoulders.

"He told you to make," he began in a hollow voice, and then for a full minute was silent again, while Penrod felt the general suddenly tightening his hold. At this moment both Penrod and the Rattlesnake boy felt their hearts throbbing faster than usual in their breasts, for they suspected something thrilling indeed. Probably because he felt excited, and because the pause was so long, Penrod broke the silence by speaking.

"The tour I am to make—yes your Excellency," he said.

"The tour will have for you some thrilling work to be done for both of you too," said Greatheart. "And Penrod noticed that his voice shook and seemed hoarse. The aide-de-camp cleared his throat again, as if he was trying to draw up a frog or fish, and then he walked over to the corner of the room where the drawing board stood.

But he only looked at one of the engravings on a piece of paper, and then returned to the table with it still in his hand.

"In another six hours you will be sent to the location named in the copy you learned by heart, and locate that Gemini Agent—as you" to the Rattlesnake boy—"planned it all."

"I planned it all!" the Rattlesnake boy barely breathed the words.

"Yes indeed you did," answered general Greatheart. "You will be needed to carry out all you have already learned these three days. There is probably no more to be done than to manage to approach certain Gemini Agents, closely enough to be able to signal to them, without being detected by the rebel guards or scouting parties."

"And only two young boy scouts in perfect disguise, whom no disguise renders among the rebels can suspect," he put in the aide-de-camp in a rough and shaky voice, that astonished the two boys. "They could pass near Emperor Jivian himself without their true features being known despite their disguises. Now Penrod—" his voice became so hoarse that he was on obliged to suddenly clear it loudly. "Penrod to avoid being detected by the disguise renders must stop carrying on in so fine and dignified a manner of appearance. Every appearance, Penrod's manner of walking, standing, and air is well known to the enemy, so to

to avoid being discovered, he must walk with a little shuffling gate gait, carry himself less finely, and slouch, as if he was a lad of the land of the shuns.

"Yes indeed," said the Rattlesnake boy determinedly. "It is necessary for the sake of his life that he must do it. I know how it is done and will teach or teach him. He holds his head and shoulders like some emperor's son. He must look like a shun kid."

"I will make myself look like one never fear," said Penrod, and there was determination in his voice.

"It will be my duty to tell you that I still trust you can do continually remind him of it," the general said to the Rattlesnake boy in a grave voice.

"That will be your duty."

As he lay on his hard cot that night, and which was very cold, about twenty eight below zero, listening to the roar of the wind, and the snore like him of the snow against the window pane, it seemed as if a load had been lifted from Penrod's heart. It was the load of longing, embarrassment, and of uncertainty and fear. Ever since through the pull of general Greathart, he had entered the Angolians as a member of the boyscouts corps, he had had for the long time the painful feeling that he could not be allowed to see in any way because he was too young, and because he was of foreign birth, and from Canada.

During his sleep he had never suffered from the effects of wild dreams, in fact he never had any dreams that were not pleasing, boyish, modest, and romantic. Now he had something more wonderful, than the most romantic dream-- he felt that his thoughts have passed through his mind, which have been as great as this-----that now the very hour of his time had come---- and that he himself Penrod, a Canadian, was to be an important messenger for Emperor Avian. However he knew that his work was to be done without any dramatics, and was not to be accompanied by any flourish of heralds. No one not even among the Angolians Angolians, would know what he was about to do. And if he was to accomplish his achievement without perils, impossible to escape from, his effort could only be successful, by remaining completely and darkly obscure, and unknown, and seem to any one he met, to be an ordinary shun boy, who knew nothing whatever of things he observed, to know nothing of the war going on, to speak very poorly in his language, and pretend to be scared to death of soap and water. Indeed Emperor Avian, had given him an order, so surprise and surprise, that Penrod felt himself the shun boy with awe and joy as he kept thinking of it. His hopes were now fully realized.

He and the Rattlesnake boy were to disguise themselves, conceal their weapons, and carry with them a most important message to a secret service Agent of the Gemini, and Penrod felt that it would be like carrying a tiny torch to set aflame a small fire, which would soon be blazing from one hill top to another, until the whole world seemed to be on fire. As he always awakened out of his deep sleep, when the side-de-camp touched him, so he suddenly awakened near three o'clock in the morning by some conscious feeling of some one being in his room, and by his bed. He had not however been aroused by any one touching him when he awakened and opened his eyes, he knew for some reason or other that the it was the look, a searching worried look which had penetrated the boys' deep sleep-----a look in the eyes of some beautiful person, who was standing by the right side of the bed if you please to mention it, her was general Greathart, and this side-de-camp. Outside there was the utter silence, the boy remembered of the night he had met the emperor for the first time, there being no light to night either, though the stars had somewhat faded, but nevertheless there was a small light burning in the room, and he it Penrod was able to see general Greathart's face clearly enough, and also that of the little girl to know that the mere intensity of their gaze had awakened him. The little girl stood supported by crutches, and he knew she was the little girl he had rescued....

The Rattlesnake boy was still sleeping soundly, and as general Greathart bent over the bed he spoke to a Penrod in French and under his breath.

"You are like to me a beloved son," he said. "It seems to me that you are too young to be sent on this dangerous journey or fool hardy adventure. Because you see me to me like a son and I your father---- just at this hour it seems as if I am sending you to your execution. I know I have trained you for an adventure of this kind as well as I could and through all the years I have been your guardian. I and the whole nation is proud of you and of your maturity, your strength and your very-- but my beloved one---you are a child, a forlorn one, your strength and your shrewdness of the wicked Glandairians, and I more than fear the rebels, who are said to be mean mind readers, and able to detect anyone even by their manner of walk, disguise, speech and face and by the very appearance of their eyes. Can I do such a rash and wicked thing as send you and your companion dangerously close to the enemy's line?"

For a moment Penrod noticed that the general's face was sorrowfully like his own, and neither his voice either. And the little girl's face looked very sober. Indeed, the general suddenly dropped down in a kneeling posture by the bedside the little girl sitting down at the foot, and as he knelt down Penrod half sitting up caught his general's hand, and held it hard against his breast.

"Your Excellency I know it all," he cried under his breath also. "It is true about the danger. I am a very young boy indeed, but in deed, and your courage as I feel a man also. You remember that you told me that yourself. And I always knew that you were teaching me to be like a general yourself--for perhaps only known to you and me. And it was a secret of mine that I had knowledge of it. I learned everything well and knowing that it was for my safety during my adventure to come, I tried never to forget anything, and I succeeded in remembering every thing. And everything I learned in school when I was there in Canada I learned well. I did not forget your Excellency."

And as he said this Penrod was so eager that he looked more like a warrior boy than he really was. But nevertheless his courage, youth, and strength were indeed splendid to see, and filled the general with respect and admiration. While Jennie, who felt thrilled as she gazed at him, as if he were her hero. General Greathart knew the boy a through and through and was a man who always could read every boyish feeling, and every thought of him.

"Yes that's true," he slowly said. "You did your part well, when the two spies had you in their power---and now if I, your general---drew back--- you would surely feel that I had--- the backbone of a jellyfish, and---that I--- that you trusted me had failed you---disgracefully failed you."

"You," Penrod breathed the word proudly. "I don't believe you could or would fail any one in the world yet. You have never failed the most weakest thing in the world."

For a few minutes there was absolute silence, in which the two gazed on each other steadily, with the deepest meaning, and then general Greathart slowly rose to his feet.

"At the end of the night will soon be here," said the general. "To-morrow you may begin your first real adventure. You may go to the rebel outposts near Jennie Avian. But my heart's most present wish is that you come back safely to us under any conditions."

When the escort column was to meet the leading ship of the fleet that crossed from a pavilion to Jennie, the first Avian rode out of the Christian lines they had with them two of the most dirty and shabby dressed children that any one has ever looked upon. One of them certainly would have been a very handsome lad if he did not have a slovenly appearance of a real shun gutter-snipe, with a careless and shuffling gait. The other appeared to be his crippled sister for fastened to the saddle in front of her was a pair of crutches. And there was no remarkably or anything picturesque about them to attract attention from any one. They sat on two splendid horses and they did not speak to each other all just now, and did not seem to be at all interested in each other, or the journey they were to perform when they were on board the great dragoons they were soon lost among the merriment and merriment, and to fast found for the merriment, a most secluded place, which was not wanted by any one else.

"What can those two boys be going to the rebel outposts for?" a gun officer asked his companion. "Don't they know it's exceedingly dangerous?"

"Maybe they do, but it is probable they are tired of life." Was the answer.

In order to reach this section it was apparent that the small fleet would have to run a gauntlet of Gibraltar batteries on both sides of the Huron gun river near Band No. Two and therefore as soon as the fleet started, all on board the ships began to make rapid preparations to run by these batteries. The shells crashed the decks, to cause shots to glance off, while to protect the decks from rebel bullets, heavy timbers and bales of hay had been placed. Therefore when everything had been made ready for the hour looked for signal to start forward was made. The numerous vessels, two of them in a number took their stations, the ship the crippled boy and girl and others were on, being in advance.

As soon as they started all hands were called to quarters, all the ports were then closed and everything made ready. Fear and his disguised companion stood beside some of the men who stood by one of the guns motionless as if they were statues, and in the silence awaited the issue of events with feelings that only those can describe. The moment most of the men had been dreading was soon approaching and as fast as a storm could any of those on the ships survive the experiment. The ten big warships were fairly under way, the engines being stopped and the vessels allowed to drift along with the swift current of the Huron gun river. Outside the noise of distant siren whistles no other sound was heard. The two boys were becoming more and more excited, with the passing of every moment until the suspense finally seemed greater than they could bear.

That awful silence was worse to them than the noise of the most severe battle. They began to feel very much out of patience, and paced up and down the deck anxiously waiting for the first crashing thunder of a number of guns that should announce that the slowly approaching fleet had been discovered. And both of the boys turned to look out and see what progress the fleet was making, but the ports had been closed with orders very imperative that they should not be opened without the orders of the commander of the fleet, and therefore the boys were obliged to remain in ignorance of what was going on outside.

At length after all was quiet for nearly an hour after starting, though it seemed to the boys an age, there came from the distant shore a loud noise like the booming of wild thunder at the approach of a severe storm.

The noise came upon their ears with almost stunning effect. The pilot of the leading ship at once rang the bell to go ahead full speed, and as a loud puffing of the engines told the boys that the fleet was moving the rebel batteries. Soon from another direction came a second sound like the rolling of ty thunder, close slower than the other, accompanied by a horrid shrieking tumult passing overhead. Overhead when in the water behind the ship there was twelve gigantic water spouts, followed by dull reports, and the ship reeled a torrent of water, and some big blocks of floating ice landed on deck.

This was followed by a single cannon crash, and a tremendous report overhead. Then this was followed by a most crashing roar as if all the artillery of the heavens and the din of all the most terrific volcanic eruptions in the world crashed into one and had been suddenly let loose at once, and the shells exploded in the air, and about the ships with a noise that was fairly ear-splitting.

There were hundreds of big eruptions in the river, which produced great waves and it did not seem at all possible to the two boys that the fleet could succeed in running the batteries, besides the two boys did not like being shut up in this manner without seeing the fleet return broadside for broadside.

The fleet following the whole fleet, to be made a target of by rebel gunners, when so many thousands of brave hearts were waiting so patiently to give as good as they were receiving did not at all suit the boys. Until they reached the batteries the leading ship did not receive any injury, and Farad began to believe that the fleet was not in so great a danger as they had first supposed, when just as the ship in advance arrived near the bend and opposite the foremost battery when a shell came crashing through the side of the vessel. The entire deck was lighted up for an instant as if by a blinding flash of lightning, there was a black cloud of smoke, and a deafening thunderous report.

This was followed by an extra noise, as of some heavy weight falling down, mingled with groans and wild shrieks, which showed that the shell had been directed too well. The gunners were confined in total darkness, and therefore it was almost impossible for any one to be able to see those who happened to stand next to them or him, and so when such explosions occur it is well calculated, to throw them all into the most terrific confusion. It was probably that every once the battle ship was frightened, but nevertheless there came the signalled order:

"Everyone stand to your guns." And this order was also delivered in a firm voice by every executive officer on the fleet, and this immediately put an end to the confusion. Then came thundering through the loud trumpet the order:

"Open ports, and return their fire in perfect broadsides." And then

Now Farad's heart bounded with joy when he heard that order cannot be described, and all the gunners also were very anxious to be on more equal terms with the enemy, and they sprang at the words, the port shutters of the gun turrets flew open with a crash, the bigger guns were also lowered into position and the massive rebel positions burst upon the astonished view of the two boys themselves if you please to mention it.

It was no doubt certain that the rebels had profited by recent experiences for instead of seeing a region as clear as an ocean war as they had expected, there was mounting skyward huge rolling clouds of various colors as if some gigantic volcano in violent eruption, and it being still dark there was seen beyond the horizon a mass of intense glare equal to a strong noonday sun which lighted up both the wide Huron gun river and the opposite shore beyond the latter seeming to be one terrible blaze of fire as if the world itself was burning up or changing into a molten planet. Along the shore on both sides of the river there was a thick shroud of white smoke pierced by countless lightning like flashes while the cannon just rolled in great crashes like the loud booming roar of a splitting earth.

The other ships were rapidly answering the tremendous fire of the batteries, and the waters of the Huron gun river usually quiet and very smooth in calm weather were ploughed in huge splashes, water spouts or kayser geyers in every direction by great shell explosions under water.

For Farad and his companion it was indeed a most magnificent and thrilling sight, once which they gazed in rapture and excitement.

"Fire away with those guns as lively as you can!" Shouted the captain "Give the Basally Insurgents as good as they send."

For more than an hour the awful ear-splitting uproar continued, the rebel gunners sending forth their tremendous volleys of an immense shell thick and fast about every one of the devoted vessels, and the ships with all their guns directed their fire against the river batteries which lined the shores on both sides as far as eyes could reach, when all of a sudden and all the dreadful din there was a loud screaming of whistles which was followed by a command shouted down through a horn to "back the ship quick!" We are looking for a mine."

The two boys scarcely noticed the circumstances, and one of the men exclaimed suddenly:

"We are drifting down into a malar mine right under the rebel batteries."

Indeed a fact was evident. The moment was appalling. It was evident the leading ship was fast approaching a mine, whose explosion could blow the whole ship out of the water and hurl all on board into the next world, and the engine appeared to be working in a vain effort to back the ship from it.

And I thank you for the... divided my brother...
and wanted to be...
be forgiven by the...
exchange...
of the child...
of the child...
of the child...

A cry of horror burst from the lips of the men who in their panic deserted the guns and made a general rush for the after part of the vessel. Penrod and the Rattlesnake were astonished, and also appalled. He also could observe that the ship in the center of the fleet had been totally wrecked, and was fast approaching the shore. Penrod was not allowed much time to be asking any questions. The conduct of his men on his own ship recalled both boys to their senses. And after considerable difficulty, Penrod succeeded in exploding the mine by a shot at one of its electric bulbs before it got to within two hundred yards of the ships. The blast it made, caused a column of water three hundred feet high into the air, and caused such big waves that the whole fleet rocked as if in a tempest at sea.

Hearing the great explosion and seeing the mighty eruption of water the sailors and gunners came running forward one of them demanding in a hoarse voice; "Has the ship struck the mine?"

"Just at this moment the captain in command of the war ship yelled; "Back to the guns you men! have not received any orders to cease firing. Stand to your guns and let them have it. Bring grape and canister to bear on the shore. If it be possible get to work most lively now. Hammer away for all your worth."

A in the meantime the other warship had still continued to draw nearer the river bank, and therefore one of the nearest rebel batteries directed its main fire upon her, while the plantations believing she was about to go aground; came running down the banks in an immense swarm calling out;

"No use striking your flag you christian bulldozers. We'll give you no quarter for running past our batteries."

"No we are not going to." came back the answer in a clear clarinet voice coming from that ship's captain. "If you want to know, this flag will be still floating as long as this ship exists."

A volley of shells followed this answer from the ships broadside guns which burst with loud explosions in the very midst of the crowd of rebels that was pushing toward the ships in boats with the purpose to board the vessel the moment it touched the hidden bank but this time the ship fortunately had been placed in full control of her engines and commenced moving away from the bank. The rebel who were fully astonished from the shells they received retreated hastily to the cover of their breastworks, and one of the smaller batteries of the ship succeeded in pouring a volley of grape and canister upon them.

After some effort the war ship was seen at evening down the river again full headway with the purpose to get out of reach of the thundering batteries. They soon succeeded in getting past the first range the passage being accomplished without material damage or destruction to the fleet, and it indeed was with a light heart that the officers of each ship repeated the order;

"Secure your guns lads."

The first portion of the battle was over, and therefore the decks were cleared and a thousand and thousand wounded were taken care of, the dead dead being laid out in the engine rooms of each ship, and covered with the flag in defense of which they had given up their very lives. The small squadron was still under way steaming down the river at full speed until the leading ship came to and within range of the Heights of Konr Gormanns Bend. Any onshore looking at those high bluffs would not have suspected in the least that those bluffs which arose so majestically on both sides of the river were like grim sentinels, watching over all approaches of the river, and the smaller hills below them were bristling with dangerous plantations batteries ready to dispute the further advance of the Angelinian fleet.

Indeed so carefully were these batteries concealed that nothing that could draw any one's suspicion could be seen. But those in the fleet were not still deceived. The captain of every ship knew that the leafless maze of trees which covered the very bluffs and whose branches were so gently waving back and forth absolutely concealed rebel fortifications of the most formidable kind and that the blood of many on board ship must be shed again before the fleet could even pass those bluffs held by the traitorous rebels who held them.

during the hour of inactivity that followed the impatient gunners directed their eyes toward those heights which now so quiet were soon to be disturbed by the noise and confusion of battle (rattle).... At length the flagship was seen approaching and every one became alert. All at once almost without warning the two bluffs became like thundering volcanoes in eruption. The ship the two boys were on, led the advance. For two hours and three quarters the battle raged with great fury on both sides the rebels holding their positions with the greatest stubbornness in spite of the storm of shells and high explosives that thinned their ranks, and made scores of maimed eruptions, about them and their positions.

During this time the ship in the advance had become very unmanageable on account of the fierce eddies in the river, ice floes, and the current had driven it into a position scarcely two hundred yards from Battery Battery F. from which all the efforts of the on engines could not extricate her. And it was utterly impossible to either advance or retreat without running into the bank, and if the pilot attempted to round the warship, her destruction would be absolutely certain. Of those the gunners in the turrets or manning the guns below were too busy manning the guns to know anything of the danger, while the admiral although a brave man was very much disturbed, when he found his ship in this perilous position. And he had no hopes whatever of bringing his dreadnought safely past those thundering rebel batteries, but nevertheless he stood in the pilot house issuing his orders with as much coolness, as if nothing serious was occurring, and yet his ship was under the hottest fire, the enemy could rain upon his vessel.

During this time both boys were behind the gun crew of one of the ships batteries watching the men sending the shells as rapidly as possible toward one of the plantations batteries and among its men whom the boys could see moving about. Up to this time the commander of the gun crew, had not lost a single man killed or injured if you please to mention, but just as the boys saw his crew in the act of loading the gun, there was a most frightful stunning crash, a vivid flash like lightning shone upon for an instant in their eyes, accompanied by an ear-splitting explosion. The two boys saw the air filled with a dense cloud of smoke, and a shower of splinters, heard appalling cries of terror and anguish, and then all was blank.

A grape shot shell had entered the casement above the port, killing and wounding the entire crew of three guns, and mangling their officers, and a heavy piece of three by six timber which had been detached from the bulkhead by the explosion struck the captain on the head, and laying him out lifeless on the floor of the turret. The boys themselves had been knocked senseless by the detonation, but otherwise were not injured in the least. When they were restored to consciousness, they found themselves lying on the hammocks in their own room, and anxious faces bending over them. Finally the remembrance of the scene through which they had passed, came back to them like a dream.

They began to wonder how the battle ended, and who had come out the victor. As they were wondering a sailor who had been appointed to take care of the boys, entered their quarters on tiptoe. From him the boys learned that the flagship had been under the heaviest fire for seven hours and forty nine minutes, that the fleet had not succeeded in passing the batteries, that the fleet excepting three vessels had come out unscathed, that the flagship had been struck a hundred and forty five times, by heavy shot, and by one shell, but although quite badly cut up was not permanently injured, but it was aground near the bank.

The other ships were close by sending in shells into the batteries, to prevent the rebels from concentrating all their fire upon that one ship. The terrible fight had convinced the admiral that in broad daylight the batteries had been manned well that they could not be reduced without the co-operation of immense land forces. Therefore the other ships having a plan past the batteries, found it necessary to tug the ship off the bar at all costs. Therefore the ships drew near again and under cover of a fierce fire approached the stranded vessel as close as possible.

Alone was thrown out, and fastened around the bulkhead, and then the tug and pul started.....

In this attempt the rescuing ship was struck four times, but no one was injured though all four masts were down like a deluge and the cabin was damaged and one of the turrets blew up into the air. But no effort could dislodge the straggled ship. Feeling better now the two boys, hastily started up, found the engineers at their stations, and knew by the man speed of the engines, and by the excited trampling of feet on the immense deck above them, and the wilder uproar of guns, and the salvoe thunder thunders of exploding shells, that the ship must be stranded.

The boys had such a strong desire to go on deck that they quite forgot how dangerous it was, prying up they put on their clothes, and then peering up the stairs that led to the main deck, and ran forward passing the door of the ships dispensatory, where they were suddenly confronted by an officer, who held up his hands in dismay and said:

"Boys, boys, for God's sake don't you know what you are doing! Are you crazy in your heads? And where in the world do you think you are going?"

"Going to see if we passed the batteries sir."

"Get below you boys instantly," was the captain's answer as that one came up all of a sudden. "Get below and don't you two let me catch you on this deck again until you are given permission. Get below I tell you boys." He continued in a much louder tone seeing that they had hesitated. "Have you not got sense enough to know that we are under fire, and that you are placing yourselves in the greatest danger. I am the captain of this ship, and have the authority to enforce all my commands."

Of this the two boys were well aware, and they were obliged to retrace their steps to their own quarters, where they lay down upon their beds. Then the captain himself entered the room and after regarding the two boys for a moment with an expression that they could not understand said:

"You are two nice little reckless boys, aren't you. Are you tired of life?"

"Why Captain, what's the matter now?" Penrod asked.

"You don't wish to live any longer I guess."

"Oh yes we do, but we did not know that we were still under fire, as there was no more noise outside. But there was nothing to hinder us from doing our duty."

"You two boys will have to allow me to be the judge of that if you wish to continue your journey with us." Returned the captain. "But I must tell you that if you do not believe in suicide, you'll do as I say. You know very well those Glanuelinian wild cats have no regard for the prettiest children. So why do you not take care?"

"Certainly," said Penrod. "I'm willing to do the right thing, but I received command from Emperor Ivian and have his written words here with me that I'm not to be une under any one else's authority."

A GAME WITH GLANUELINIAN SHIPERS.

THAT DOES NOT MATTER to me at all." said the Baptist sternly. "I'll say that you will not be on dock as long as we're around. The enemy will put a big hole into your ~~his~~ heads, just be good wise boys, and take my advice now, or you'll be injured and on the sick list for a long, long, long, time, and then you won't be able to accomplish your mission either."

"Well please don't keep us off the deck longer than is necessary," answered the Rattlesnake boy knowing surely he and his companion would be compelled to submit to the commands of the captain whether they wanted to do so or not. "We are not used to a life of inactivity and we detest it. We want to be always doing something."

The two boys were given two single beds in the wardroom for their own quarter deck room for their own cabin had been almost demolished during the two recent fights with the batteries, and during the hours that followed they felt miserable enough.

At half past seven the next evening while Penrod was still asleep he and his companion were awakened by a loud noise as if something was being splintered. At once both boys jumped from their cots and went investigating the cause. They discovered that his looking glass was in countless fragments, and the shattered glass all scattered all over the floor. He wondered exceedingly what had happened to the looking glass, and what had caused the accident. He happened to find out that something had splintered the hulkhead behind where the looking glass had been. It looked as if some rifle ball had done it, and, beginning to think that some one was doing target practice and was a poor shot, Penrod was about to go back to his bunk when there came a loud whistling scream with which Penrod was very familiar. Penrod had just yelled in Angolani;

"Hey you mutt look where you are shooting at," then there was a rustling in the bunk above him, and one of the men roaning with him, sprang suddenly down upon the floor exclaiming in a most excited tone,;

"My goodness gracious boy, that's no man at target practice. It's the wicked Glandelinian snipers shooting at us." "....."

"I really believe they are," answered Fenrod in a cool tone as he again rose from his berth slowly, and commenced dressing himself. "Just look at my looking glass, and what is all that awful noise in the distance? It sounds like an approaching typhoon coming this way---say where in the world are you going?" He finally asked, finding that the sailor was hastily gathering up his clothing.

"I'm going below as quickly as possible las lad," as the answer. "on't you know those rebels use bullets that penetrate sheet iron, and this room i is only protected by thin wooden walls instead of iron ones."

"Yes I know it, but why are you in such a hurry? The other world is better than this one!"

But the sailor did not stop an instant to reply, but collecting his clothing, immediately opened the door and sprang out on deck. One bound would have carried him to the gang-gang way that led to the main deck, but your man was in a moment more he had been prostrated on the deck with a musket ball in his head. His clothing flying in every direction by a gust of wind. Penrod was shocked at this sight, and turned his face away, when suddenly another shot struck and tore its way through the bulkhead, and lodged in his own mattress, so showing how narrow had been his escape.

About fifty of the most remarkable glandelinian marksmen had taken up a position in a hidden works on the river bank, where they could see into all portions of the cabin, and by their incessant fusillade of shots had compelled the admiral to leave his writing desk where he had been at work, and take refuge behind the bulk head. However when the two boys entered his cabin, they found him apparently taking matters very coolly, for he was stretched out on a hammock covered over with heavy wadded blankets, engaged in reading a News paper called "THE DOROTHY GALE TIMES".

"Boys, boys," said the admiral with a laugh, "so many have already entered here to see me that they have caused me much trouble already. If any more enter this cabin I'll be a ruined man. Now, one of the shots fired by the wicked glandelinian snipers go slap bang into my pantry, and I don't believe a whole piece of crockery has been left. What did you boys wish?"

"We came in sir, to ask your permission to take some small long range repeating rifles," answered Penrod. "I and my companion believes that we can drive those fellows away from the shore." He added glancing through one of the ports.

"Very well, boys try your luck at it, but as for me I'll not bother my head about them glandelinian rascals. They are not able to shoot through this bulk head to my own reckoning. However I am very uncomfortable in realising that I cannot leave the cabin without running the risk of going to what I may say Heaven."

And the admiral again stretched himself in the hammock and resumed his reading as if nothing unusual was happening. It took considerable and lively dodging and crawling on hands and knees during which thirty or more bullets were either lodged in the admiral's pantry or the bulkhead to the great disgust of that officer, for Penrod and the Rattlesnake boy to succeed in securing two repeating rifles, and a cartridge box from one of the racks in the cabin, and concealing themselves behind the bulkhead thrust the guns carefully out of the nearest portholes, and wait patiently for some shots.

The ship being stranded near the middle of the stream was but scarcely two hundred feet distant, but no rebel was just now showing himself, and the two boys began to believe that the glandelinians had either retired into a more secure position, or had discontinued the fight, when far to his right he observed a large glen about five hundred feet wide that fairly ran down clear to the waters edge, and near the bank on the edge of the gully near the glen, he saw against the whiteness of the snow the head of some man covered by a coronet shaped hat, and looking more closely observed a pair of eyes that were looking straight into the porthole. It was indeed a very small target to shoot at but Penrod and the Rattlesnake had killed rebel scouting spies at a greater distance away a time, so both boys decided to shoot at the same time, raising their rifles carefully, took quick aim and fired simultaneously, being almost overconfident that their shots would speed directly to the mark. The ball however only landed near the bank raising a cloud of snow and dirt that for a moment concealed the effect of the two shots, but as it had scarcely cleared away, when from the gully near the glen, a small puff of smoke arose, and another ball whizzed past the Rattlesnake and landed among the crockery showing the rebel was still in his same old position. Penrod looked on as cautiously as possible that observed that the rebel was hastily reloading his gun, but before either of the boys could give him another shot or two, the deadly rifle of the glandelinian marksman was thrust over the bank in readiness for another shot.

"Oh ye little English Jackass, I'm still here in the Gully yet once heem," shout shouted the glandelinian soldier in as much English as he could assume thinking the lad only understood that and nothing else, for he only saw Penrod regarding him as if he could not believe his eyes sight. "I'm still here once again yet. And youse want to keem heem closely hidden, you and your companion there in heem in the cabin, or you'll go to the new world, where heem the angels did it their singing songs mighty queer once yet, is he not so. There here rifles smart to it the shooter."

As the sniper finished speaking both the boys fired again at him, but still without success, for the rebel always answered the shots, and dodged back into the glen to reload his rifle. For an hour and a half this singular contest was maintained by the two boys and the hidden Angollian rebel, and both the boys were now wholly and terribly exhausted, and not a little provoked at their apparent poor marksmanship. They were just about to fire two more shots, when the rebel suddenly announced again in English:

"Heem must be about time to end our grab my two leedle christian keed puppies is he not so? So let heem try it the target practice again sometime this afternoon is he not so? I'm hungry as a bear. Heem is one grand shoot, between me and little boy is he not so?"

The impudence of the glandelinian sharpshooter was indeed a good cause of merriment on the part of the admiral who laughed heartily at his remark, and forgot the loss he had suffered in all his crockery.

"Admiral!" said Penrod as soon as he was sure that the glandelinian sharpshooter was gone. "I believe it would be a good time now to have those portholes closed."

"Don't dare go near them you boys," answered the Admiral. "I won't trust the Angollian traitors. Have word send to the officers that they and all the men are at liberty to return the fire with rifles, but the y must not waste too much of their precious ammunition."

The two boys immediately went into the officers quarters, and after delivering the admiral's order placed their guns over their shoulders, and marched out. While they were eating a hearty dinner, on scullied prok, and hard tack, the boys related the incident of their fight, with the glandelinian sharpshooter. They all listened with the greatest interest. The two boys had some difficult time finishing their (excellent) meal but it being done Penrod took the chance of going on deck to get a little letter he had received from Joice Givian intending as soon as the rebels re-commenced firing, to remove his own side of the battle.

For since the rebel sniper had left the gully near the glen, not a single shot had been fired, and when Penrod walked across the deck and entered his own room, not a single glandelinian soldier was in sight, and all was still.

He removed the letter from his suit case, and was deciding to go below to read it, when a bullet crashed through the bulkhead, and striking a large washbowl on the stand, shattered it into countless fragments. This gave Penrod the idea that it was the signal for the renewal of the ambush fight, for in a moment more the bullets whistled over the ship in a perfect shower concert. Penrod at once sprang to his feet and with impatience waited for an opportunity opportunity to make his way below, but received no such good luck.

As he cautiously opened the door to his own room he heard a number of sharp reports that he could easily make out from the rest, accompanied by a familiar whistle, and several bullets which seemed to come from the stern of the vessel itself, sped past him, striking the pilot house, and glancing upward with a wild shriek. At the same instant many more from the battery whistled close to him too close to him for any comfort. It was evident that some of the Angollian rebels had seen him enter his room, and knowing his own chance to escape was across the deck had made up their minds in the most determined manner to keep him a close prisoner regardless of the fact, that he was only a young lad.

Yet the boy wondered why they did not fire through the bulkhead. It was indeed probable that the glandelinians believed it was iron clad like the rest of the ship and that they would rather he would come out than to waste their lead for nothing. But Penrod was too wise for them. He knew also that the walls of his room were only of thin boards and plastering, and these gave him no protection whatever from the bullets of his hidden enemies, and this did not give him very comfortable thoughts. If he went out he would certainly go to his death, for although he might escape the bullets of the rebels in the distant batteries there was his rival of the morning in the gully by the edge of the glen, who was able to handle his rifle with the most remarkable skill.

And it was needless more dangerous to remain, for a storm of bullets might at any moment enter his room and that one or two of them might put an end to his life.

And I thank you for vivid my brother takes and what may be the of the child slavery no matter what will happen and how to get out

"Well I am certainly in a nice situation," he colloquized. "I've often read in books of hunters' treed animals, such as Racoons, or bears,, or of hunters and fugitives being treed by wolves and other wild beasts, but I never heard or read of a commissioned boy scout being treed by rebels in his own little room, and on board a real stranded warship, just because he wanted to read a little princess's letter. And I wonder what that strange noise is I have heard so long now. The officer's I've questioned declared that some fierce battle is raging along the sunbeam creek near Jennie Vivian. If so how in the world am I going to perform my mission. And just now I really don't like the chances of going out on deck, and having all these bullets whizzing about my head, and telling me to let them send me to heaven, and the like, besides I certainly will be shot, for there's that english speaking rebel in the glen gully, and I've found out that his being an excellent marksman is more than I thought. It's evident alright that I will have to stay here for a while. And if I ever get out, I'll make some of those glendelinians sweat for shooting a hole through my letter. My gun would do me no good here, therefore I must find some kind of a good protection better than this matchbox."

So saying he pulled his heavy mattress from his bed, and also the Rattlesnakes and lying on the floor managed with the most greatest difficulty to place one on each side of him, as a sort of barricade. He remained in this position until two o'clock two o'clock the bullets shrieking over the deck all the while, and making music entire ly too unpleasant to his ears. All the while he lay there he heard the strange distant sound. At some point the firing of the snipers began to slacken, and this made Penrod determined to make another effort to get below below if possible.

Besides he knew it was not a long distance to the gangway that led to the main deck, but nevertheless there was that impudent fellow in the gully near the glen who still was maintaining the fight, as an occasional crash in his own pentry proved, and Penrod could not help having a wholesome fear of him. He resolved however to make the attempt at any cost, and therefore waiting until the rebel had fired his rifle, he suddenly threw open the door, and after making a few hasty steps got below.

As he ran he heard a loud shouted blasphemy and knew that the rebel had seen him. After he was gone the firing was renewed with redoubled vigor by the glendelinian sharpshooters in the batteries and elsewhere, and it was at once answered by every officer, sailor and marine of the ship, who cracked away whether a rebel was in sight or not. All this while Penrod had not been able to remove the two thought of that dangerous sharpshooter out of his mind. And the audacity he had dared to display in taking up a position so close to the stranded ship, and the skill in which he handled his weapon, excited the boy's admiration, and he was determined that should the same sharpshooter again take up the same position, he would renew his attempt to put him out of business. He however decided to take no part in the fight until he had the opportunity to do so. He then provided himself with a better rifle, and after considerable trouble, succeeded in getting behind the same bulkhead he had been before, and here he settled down, determined to fight his enemy as long as he had any charge of powder left, or as long as it remained daylight. He saw that anew rebel was in the old position however, concealed as usual but a still better marksman, and as the ports of the admirals cabin had been closed he was directing his fire to the pilot house. He of course was not aware that a young boy scout had placed his own base of operations, but he did not remain ignorant of the fact very long, for Penrod commenced firing his piece without ceremony.

As nearly everyone on board was engaged in answering the fire of the rebels the new one in the gully could not make out which whence the shots came. For a full minute he drew back and then thrust out his head carefully with the purpose to reconnoiter.

Penrod who was able to fire thirteen shots without stopping to reload was ready for him, and another bullet instantly sped to the mark, but as usual with no more effect than throwing up a cloud of snow and dust.

mission to go on or all the entire shore in this region a large number of lights, as numerous as those seen along the broad Avenue des Champs Elysees in Paris were visible, glimmering in thousands of various bright colors. The lights were on the enemy side of the shore, and were either moving back and forth in every direction, believable. The sharp eyes of the battleships boy took it all in, he mainly noticed the red and blue light among the distant trees, the many many yellow lights on the shore. He believed he could hear the strange sounds of the bandolin officers, military music, and other strange sounds and voices.

"It seems to be brighter and clearer than any other portion of vivian wickes," he said to Penrod. "Or From so many colored lights flashing to and fro it seems that the only in to something. The lights look as if they were mysterious signals."....

The fleet was within sight of a section of the Puget Sound fortifications known as the De La Concordia, while beyond it there appeared an apparently perfect world of illumination and majestic beauty, in various colored flashing lights and fireworks display, and all this fascinated the Rattlesnake boy, and held him spell bound. He stood perfect ly still and kept staring at it, first from one point of view to another.

It was indeed a more wonderful sight and a bigger scenery than he could have ever picture, and Penrod described it to him, and told him there was some kind of celebration or amusement going on. Or it may be some kind of mysterious signalling, when for a while they remained standing watching the scene without speaking.

"I can see and imagine everything that may be happening," said the Rattlesnake boy at last as he pulled Penrod away.

The next day they left the ship after bidding all good bye, and started in full disguise toward their destination near Jennie Vivian. For all boy scouts who join the Angelinan armies, their lives of adventure is most fascinating, and also the most dangerous ever known.

serious responsibility of it also. Any one who ever goes on scouting tours, knew that mostly in all cases the safety and well being of the entire army depended upon all reports. And all scouts who go roaming about the fire lines, and their camp must not allow themselves to be deceived in regard to the size and strength of a foe army, or their position. If it would happen that an Angelinos soldier just happened by the reports the scouts would think himself able to surprise and defeat the foe, and upon finding that he had blundered from being misled, the scouts are held responsible.

And any scout who is so inexperienced as to misrepresent cases, and were the cause of the rebels making their escape, when they might easily have been beaten knowing that their commander would order an attack, no matter how small t he chances for success might be, knows the penalty. Penrod and the Hattiesburg boy knew this and so were very careful in approaching the southwestern portion of the rebel lines. It was just after the approach of darkness, when the two boys set out in their customary disguises to watch for the German soldier they were sent to 70 you it was certain that the "Glendelinian sharpshooter" was where the shots came from, and a moment afterwards a ball was again buried in the thick timbers of the hullwalk scarcely one inch from the place where Penrod was cautiously looking out, watching the motions of his rival, and Penrod observed that the rebel was obliged to turn over to reload after he had fired his gun, and therefore the boy was determined if he could not dialogue him, he would at least try to make it beyond his power to do any further damage, so just at the moment the Glendelinian sharpshooters exposed his right arm, as he was in the act of placing the last cartridge, and running down the charge, as he fired at him again.

The glandelinian sharpshooter was ignorant of the fact that his boy opponent had such a dangerous kind of a repeating rifle, and therefore redoubled his efforts, and made all haste to reload his gun, but once again a bullet struck in the snow close beside him, and covered him with a shower of snow. The glandelinian sharpshooter was completely puzzled by this, for Penrod saw him raise his head and gaze most intently toward the bulkhead, where his mysterious enemy was concealed. That was indeed a fatal move for himself, exposed fully five inches of his head, Penrod immediately fired, the bullet sped to the mark, the rebel rolled down the bank into the icy water, and the deadly rifle flew from his hands. The glandelinian sharpshooter was dead, and his death completely ceased, and after

At the approach of darkness the firing completely ceased, and after supper was eaten, the only cooked meal they had had since the days fight, the officers and men assembled on deck to enjoy the crisp winter air, for at times below the heat from the engine rooms was almost intolerable. It was a little later that the stevedore ship was pulled from the sand bar, and floated six-fifty beyond the reach of the rebels.

The two boys had proceeded for about a mile in this manner, not even speaking to each other when suddenly found around a bend in the Jenson Turner road which lead to Delight's plantation they suddenly came without warning upon a strong sheltered Glandelinian pocket station. Over a fierce hundred fierce Omani gouldier soldiers were either lying around a large camp fire in spite of the storm eating an evening meal or standing around in groups talking or smoking cigarettes.

His reasons why the Wu boys had not discovered the rebels sooner, was for two reasons. Because of the heavy pall of falling snow, and on account of a small mound, with covered thickly with trees and bushes that obscured them and their station, and which also concealed the glare of the camp fire, so that any one coming down the road, would not know of it being there. They wondered exceedingly how they had not without their knowledge actually succeeded in passing the glacial line sentries, which they knew must have been been or even were posted some distance from the station.

It indeed was a deep snowdrift to the two boys, they however believed they had been traveling down the road, and quietly that those of the Oamaru Scouder pickets, had not heard their approach in the deep snow or else the rebel sentries were asleep. Then, however, the two boys had made their way into the enemy's lines and they realized it, and were in something of a trap. If the two boys made an attempt to retreat, they would risk certain death, for a volley from all of those po picket men would riddle them. Yet if they escaped the men at the campfire, they would be obliged to pass the sentries, and they might fall here for the clatter of feet from the persons running through the deep snow would alarm them.

Therefore the two boys found it was safer to walk up to the fire and to put a bold face on the whole matter which they did. The rebel boy and crippled girl had successfully passed the sentries, and seeing the pances they had, believed they were one of their own boy scouts, with his crippled sister. One of them who appeared to be a picket officer inquired;

"Well sorry seeing you made the trip in all this cold weather and storm, how are the little christian doggies getting along."

"They are said to be very close just now," replied Penrod, "for my part I've heard there has been some fierce fighting round here some time yesterday, and you'll be much wiser to haul in these pickets before long or I'm mistaken."

"Now is sentry No. One out there down the direction from which you came with your sister!" asked the captain, who was in command of the entire picket force."

"Oh he's all right" answered the Rattlesnake boy imitating the voice of a girl very loud. Then he carefully seated himself at the camp fire, and being invited to eat pitched in. He had also invited followed the Rattlesnake example, and both of the boys enjoyed a very good meal, while most of the Glendolians were smoking their cigarettes, it being a very rare case to see a Glendolian soldier or officer smoking a pipe of cigar or pipe or cigar. As they smoked and stirred the fire to make it hotter they talked of the probability of soon thrashing the "The Christian down" soundly, and recapturing the town of Jomoia Vivian, and wishing they were in general Pickett Purgatory army instead of Manley's, and that they might have the honor of carrying the Glendolian flag into gloriously quiet, Angelina Agatha, and all the other important cities of Abbia- run Abbia- run. This was a very valuable information in regard to Manley's generals and their intended movements upon the Christian lines along the banks of the gunboat creek, and finally making it as a conclusion, that their general was looking for them, the boys rode the pickets good boy, and Penrod picking up the spectacles for the Rattle-snake boy, both boys walked slowly down toward the rebel camp. As soon as the boys believed they had gone far enough to deceive the pickets, they turned off the road, and started through the woods, intending to make a very wide circuit with the purpose to pass the pickets unseen and start for their own destination. They almost lost their way in the woods on account of the density of the falling snow flake flakes, and therefore they stumbled about the woods for nearly two hours before they got out, and finally came upon a wide road that appeared to run at left angles with the one they had just left.

They followed this road for about a mile when Penrod pointed out a strange light that appeared to be shining from an open doorway of a house a few hundred feet ahead of them and which they could not see on account of the snow but just the light a burning from the open doorway. They at once decided to reconnoitre before going any further and therefore walked slowly forward for that purpose, walking in the deep soft snow at the left side of the road, so that their approach would be noiseless.

They had gone but a very short distance, when there suddenly came the sharp challenge, from a sentry who shouted: "Halt, who approaches there?"

"Boyscouts," shouted the Rattle-snake boy and then landing his crutches to Penrod he said: "Wait a few moments. I'll manage that rebel guard."

Penrod could say a word, he had slipped away into the intense darkness. Several minutes passed, when Penrod again heard his voice and going forward cautiously and wondering how he a boy had managed the guard, was surprised to see him with a rifle in his hand pacing back and forth along the broad road. Penrod instantly realized what had occurred, and went cautiously into the bushes, at the side of the road near the Rattle-snake.

"I could not help doing what I did Penrod," he whispered. "I went to capture the guard with the purpose to compel him to give us some information, but seeing I was a boy he threatened and fought so so desperately that I had to kill him to save myself." "How as it too dark here for the foe to see your natural size, you can pretend to be the sentry here, until some one passes up, and then we can find out what their counter sign is. When I'll go up to that house and see if there is possible."

Penrod then stood behind a tree growing behind some bushes by the side of the road, and in a few minutes the Rattle-snake boy said to Penrod:

"I wonder what the number of this post is? I don't believe it is right our hash is so bad for sure."

"It's sure I don't know," answered Penrod.

"Well how in the world will I be able to find it out?" He demanded fiercely.

"If some one should come happen to come along, and tried to come me without giving the counter sign, and it should be necessary for me to call the corporal of my bat and could not do it, I certainly would be in a nice fix."

And the Rattle-snake boy said those words in so perfectly a cool answer that Penrod could not help admiring him. Just then both of the boys heard a faint shout.

"Ten o'clock," said Number One, "it's well."

"Where they start now," whispered Penrod. "The line of sentries are passing the call. Now look sharp for your's."

Penrod called passed along the line of the sentries until Number Twenty was called but a short distance from the two boys. Then there was a pause.

"You are Number Twenty-one," Penrod said, "whispered to the Rattle-snake."

"Number Twenty-one," said all a well," shouted the Rattle-snake boy at the top of his lungs, and then he broke the side of a man, "so far so good." He continued in a very low voice "Now I guess we are all right. Halt there." He shouted loudly, the sound of approaching horses rapidly advancing through the barbed wire on the road. The whole column at once drew rein and one of them at the Rattle-snake boys challenge answered:

"Major General Stanton returning, with a large scouting party."

"Dismount on left side of your horse Major General Stanton, and give the counter sign."

"Just allow me the permission to pass Mr. Sentry will you," said he in a major general. "I'm in a great hurry, being on important business, and do not want to be detained by the storm in your growing too fierce."

"If any halt," shouted the Rattle-snake boy again. "Dismount on the left side of your horse."

"But I tell you I am Major General Stanton returning from a scouting tour and the Blizzard!"

"I don't care what you were returning from, or who you are, or what's it doing. Just climb down off that horse instantly, or I'll shoot you on the spot. I would not let you go by me without giving me the counter sign, if you were the ruler of Glendelina himself, or if it was blowing a cyclone."

The major general saw that it was in vain to argue, and therefore reluctantly dismounted as he was ordered, and gave the counter sign:

"Norman Catherine."

"The counter sign is correct, you may pass Major General Stanton," said the Rattle-snake boy as he brought his rifle to his shoulder with a prompt motion. After the rebel had dismounted and disappeared with his column, Penrod sat in a whisper to the Rattle-snake:

"Now be careful and look about you sharply. I'm going up to that house to see who is in it. Keep a sharp look out."

Penrod then shook the Rattle-snake boy by the hand warmly and then started toward one of the lighted windows of the house. He walked up to a large group of glendelina soldiers with a careless exit. Most of the soldiers despite the storm were standing near the open doorway talking and smoking cigarettes. They even paid no attention to Penrod as he glanced in at the window, excepting remarking to one another that the boy never had a bath, or was afraid of soap and water, or something dirty as long as he lived.

Penrod saw twenty Union officers seated at a round table being engaged in some very important conversation. Penrod listened for a few minutes at their debate and found that he was within three miles inside of the enemy's lines under general John Hanley. If Penrod had been alone at this time, this discovery would have made him very uneasy, for he was fully acquainted with the nature of Hanley's soldiers, but knowing that he had a friend on whom he could rely, looked upon the fact as merely a very small difficulty.

He therefore remained near the house picking up a good deal of information, until he heard the relief guard called. Penrod knew therefore that he and his companion must make a hasty retreat, or they would be discovered, and therefore hurried back to the place where he had left the Rattle-snake boy, and found him pacing his beat in an industrious manner. They had just left the place, and were strutting down the road, when they heard the clatter of hoofs from a single horse coming up the road and heading toward the house (mouse) and the boys at once concealed themselves.

The answer to the challenge was from a child's voice, between a boy and a girl. He boys did not say pass. "Pass" thinking it may be a glendelina boy scout and therefore the Rattle-snake boy sprang out from his place of concealment and seized the horse's rein, while Penrod who instantly comprehended the situation placed his bayonet dangerously close to the riders' heads.

"What does this mean you boys?" demanded the lad on the horse.

"It's no time to talk much now," replied the Rattle-snake boy. "Even if you was a dumb beast you could realize you are our prisoner. Go hand over your weapons, and don't make any fuss or start a commotion."

As he spoke he proceeded to search the boy and put the two small revolvers in his belt, and the cartridge belt in his overcoat pocket, then ordering the prisoner

"Why it's Angelina Aronburg," He exclaimed in alarm. "Is this the way we reward her for saving me from the Rattlennakes den. I thought we were arrested a gludge glandelinan spy or boy scout."

The boys then asked her to please accompany them on their first mission, and after telling her what it was they were to do, she readily agreed to their wish. As soon as they were sure they were not being pursued, they headed for the town of Jaramila.

Here they bought some good food at a very cheap price. After they ate their fill they went to a rooming house and here they obtained a room and bed for each night. They could share for the rest of the night.

Before they thought of looking for breakfast they left the rooming house after paying the room rent and made their way through the deep snow (the storm still continuing) toward a large house which they knew stood on center street.

Those four six disasters occurring within the space of sixteen years are the greatest ever written in this long manuscript. The disasters caused by the landelinian hordes in Calverinia and of the gloo glorinia calamity are the most horrible of all the combined together and the fiercest. It effected the entire province of Calverinia as we will see in volume three. Jeopardizing and crippling her so badly that the Angelinian and Abbiennian governments had been forced to use all extreme measures to crush the frightful landelinian hordes and drive them back to where they came from. The real loss in killed and injured on account of these ravages and carnage of children exceed all the children killed in the typhoons listed. In the entire path of this storm of war devastations and horror it was estimated that thirty six thousand cities and towns were almost totally wrecked hundred of which were totally wiped out by fire with the annihilation of the inhabitants at the hands of these gray coated savages. Angelina crushed to atoms by heavy seas during a storm had its ruins invaded by the sea. The landelinians and three quarters of the surviving inhabitants mostly the children were killed or flung into the still raging seas. In Calverinia it was reported that within the three years of the war five hundred cities many magnificent ones at that were wiped out by fire and after being wrecked. Three quarters of the city of Lorinia was wiped out about ten million men and women and children reported killed. Glorinia was the center of all the wars horrors. The fury of the battle of Lorinia will be told, the velocity of the air waves and earthquake waves caused by the concussion have known but it was estimated that its velocity was about a mile and a fraction a second or five thousand two hundred eighty million hour. As the battle had animated progress the greatest strength and fury was in the center. The battle storm area in reality extended one hundred miles in length, the full duration of the main action being eighteen hours and fourteen minutes. At one section of the line a Aronburg sun horror occurred where at the Mc-Hollister woods fourteen big divisions each ten million strong were torn to fragments by the landelinian fire storm. All the cities and towns in the immediate vicinity of this frightful battle were practically or entirely wiped out. The total of towns and cities wiped out exceed five thousand. Five nations were affected heavily enough to damage cities or towns. This is stated in full detail in the glorinia series. See battle of Henrietta, Aronburgs and of Lorinia.

"On account of the cruelty to children during the child slave trades the landelinia government had to pay the heaviest fine of any nation before and if they would not within those two weeks the countries of northern Calverinia would belong to Abbiennia. It was the purpose of the landelinian government at first to request the loan of money from her friendly allies as she could not pay it in Abbiennian money at all but Abbiennia herself warned that such money would not be accepted and that if these nations loaned landelinia money or help of any kind they would be charged with harboring the child slave trade and would themselves risk war with the three Abbiennian countries. Blomlinia and Condennencia were Angelinian allies but nevertheless they protested to what they called landelinian savagery stating that Angelina was a fool to make landelinia pay a fine when it was her duty to go in and crush her wicked for without even fair motives, but Angelina replied that though landelinia had caused the devastation during the rebellion and ruthlessly massacred child children and that though landelinia was guilty of savagery it did not seem christia like to go at landelinia without sufficient reasons, that the Angelinian governments did not want bloody war if they possibly could keep out of it.

And further more it was not just to go to extreme measures unless the two civilian governments permitted it and that also the actions of Angelina and Abbiennia were not to be as barbarians, and that if landelinia knows what is good for her own safety she will mind her own business concerning the affairs of the two civilian governments. However Blomlinia and Condennencia were never enemies of Abbiennia or her christian allies, never intended to be and also favored the Abbiennian cause during the war of eighteen and forty one. If other allies of landelinia did loan landelinia money she could be no better off as she would have to pay the sum back and within a very short time at that. And so landelinia knowing this borrowed nothing but stated that her allies were ungrateful to her, were afraid of Abbiennia and Angelina, and their allies, but the governments of those landelinian friends answered back, that they feared no nation whatever that if landelinia would pay the loan back within ten years they would give her the money to her in defiance of the whole world under any conditions whatever in facing the wrath of the other nations, but in case serious trouble brewed over the giving of the loan landelinia would have to fight on their side or be destroyed with them.

Condennencia stated to the Abbiennian government this defiance of the allies of landelinia and the defiant nations notified Abbiennia that to them it matters nothing whether their money be accepted or not and that in fact landelinia deserved to be treated more civilly and that if landelinia ain't able to pay the fine it ought to be paid with an iron ball of cannon at Abbiennian doors. Blomlinia and Condennencia stated that landelinia was able to pay in Abbiennian money as far as it was seen and that it was true and their help of rebuilding the ruins ought not to be the only punishment and that landelinia was or ought to be made to pay at the quickest opportunity.

The Angelinian governments decided to consult this matter before the two governor generals Hanson and Vivian. And if this was true to the seizure of northern Calverinia would follow. So two weeks after Hanson and the others returned from their second trip on the seas violet and her sisters came to them in the garden, telling them that there were two men in the reception room who said they were the president of Blomlinia and Condennencia who wished to see him and Hanson.

"I'll be there," said Governor Vivian "And you and your sisters with Jack join us."

"I will pay," (She answered, and the two governors arose going into the house. Seeing the little girls the two presidents were filled with admiration and though generally wishing to be alone when in important conferences they had no objections of the presence of the little girls and sternly objected when Hanson requested the little girls to leave the room until the conference was over.

"I have important subjects on the landelinian suit situation," said the president of Condennencia. "Are you sure that the landelinians are going to pay the fine without our suspicious of treachery on their part and that her government is not hiding anything. We came to warn you governors on this matter as our governments requested us to see you on this matter."

Hanson and his brother were silent for some minutes with astonish and then the main governor Hanson himself said:

"I'm sure they can and we have already received two hundred thousand counterfite from landelinia. We are suspicious children by has caused more slavery of a children known, massacred children by thousands committed thousands and millions of atrocities and causing untold misery to Violet and her sisters. Landelinia has two choices. Either pay the fine within two weeks or lose the northern part of Calverinia. I'll accept no help from no landelinian allies unless unfounded proofs are known that landelinia is unable to pay. And she is because she has billions of dollars made on her child slave trades."

The president of Blomlinia looks surprised and asphat. The Condennencia was filled with consternation. For some minutes no one spoke. Violet and her sisters were throughoutly interested and they wondered and waited impatiently to hear governor Vivian's decision. "Good to hear it," said the visitors. "You are wisest officers than we thought. Who is the main governor?"

"Well," said Hanson, drawing I'm the main head of this nation. I thank you for your good advice. I'll follow the governor's advice. My brother takes decisions from me. I'll follow his advice. And what he says or what I says to the governments is the same. I'll be very obedient myself as very obedient as even the landelinians. I'll be obedient to the child slavery matter there will be no war and her sister will she pays the fine or not. I have spoken. You have proven yourselves our friends for giving us this warning of Glandelinian treachery and if possible I will return this kindness."

"And it's not merely my opinion that she is able to pay but she can and won't." Said the Blominian president. "Up to two presidents rule two very powerful nations which with your help could crush Glandelinia to atoms if she refuses to pay the money she even owes us for the slaves she has made of our own children and does not free those still in her possession. As long as she has given you thothopia money it's a sign she will not pay you the fine but added the refusal by an insult and she as I heard has drained the Galverinian banks and ties to make the nation face a famine. That's what we protest against. It's not the money matters but the famine that is threatening Galverinia. And many of the Galverinian homes in ruins."

"I don't see where drains her banks, when she has so much money wrested from the child slaves." Said Hanson sarcastically. "They gotten money some where as fast as they lose it, and besides a little touch of famine ought to strike them instead of the poor Galverinians and it will teach them what famine among the helpless among the helpless want in Galverinia. All the firm farms in the west have been devastated and we had to drain the Alleghenia wheat mills till they almost shut down to feed the starving millions during the Galverinian horror just past."

"Then I suppose you won't relent." Said the Condensationian president. "No." Answered Hanson. "The Glandelinian government pays the five hundred million of or the northern Galverinian country will be seized and taken possession of by the Angelinians and war will be declared."

"Ain't there any terms that could be given?"

"No."

"Why not?"

"I'll not submit to no terms." Answered Hanson. "What I saw during the rebellion gives me pain still. I'll never allow no nation to pay the bill for Glandelinia under any conditions just now and the nations that does so will regret it."

"What do you say about this?" Asked the Condensationian president of the Blominian ruler.

"The two Angelinian governors are wiser than we thought." He answered.

"What do you say, Governor Vivian?"

"Something about my little girl here." Answered governor Vivian. "They were persecuted by the Glandelinian authorities all since they were three years old, kidnapped twice, and my government officials scoured the whole world for them before they were recovered. One of them little Angeline was left on a desolate island by Glandelinians to our parish miserably and was found half starved. They were cruelly persecuted during the child later rebellion scourged, a, almost massacred, with thousands of other children at Adrian three years ago when so many children were literally strangled, smothered, tortured and cut to death and their very entrails torn out, this also happening at Galverine, and then left to perish when the Galverinian revolution set fire to the city of Pullaway. They were unjustly accused of the Bell-Mell-Ten-Mell disaster, left to perish miserably when a storm of fire burned Adrian when the volcano there threw clouds of destruction upon the city and what else need only know. They suffered horrors and frightful tortures after that, and during the Glandelinian horrors which is too shocking for every angle to hear Violet stricken with severe illness after the Chamberlains tormented a year ago suffered the separation from her sisters who were used by their captors most harshly, while a rascally Glandelinian disguising himself as Luckwick Walden almost killed Violet herself from harsh treatment while she was sick. Other horrors which they went through I cannot dare relate. But after all that they suffered, after the reign of terror in Norma Catherine, Pullaway, Jamarin and elsewhere where the child slavery in those cities were at its height, and the very Galverinians were filled with the tortures tortured and murdered children and the most frightful manacles of children found incapable of working ever witness, why so should I relent and allow Glandelinia off so easily when she deserves severe punishment. No. Glandelinia shall pay us that five hundred million within two weeks from the start of next month or lose the whole Galverinian country entirely. Nations like that nation shall pay dearly. I'll never relent."

"We can let them be done then." Said the Blominian president looking at the little girl. "Blominia will give you all the coin she can if you get into war with Glandelinia. And we ourselves I will see to it that she will pay you as you wish."

"The two then ardes to go the Condensationian president saying to governor Vivian."

"The sorrowful history of the Abbeian girlware unknown to my nation. But they shall know it as soon as I informed them they do know I assure the people I will feel as little as you I depend they will in case of your waring with Landelinia contribute as any as possible to your cause and help you crush Landelinia."

The governor, canon and Abbeian followed the two uniformed presidents to the door, and watched them silently leave the yard and mountain their carriage. Violet and her sisters had heard every bit of the conference between the four, and had been very interested, and also realized that nothing now could turn back on their father from the purpose of punishing Landelinia to the extreme after what they heard from these two royal visitors. They went out into the flower garden where Evans who was greatly impressed with the interest shown by the president to speak of the subject turned their thoughts to another channel. That day also Evans interested Violet and her sisters on the situation that he presented in Abyssinkile and Abbeian before the great Abbeian war of eight, in four, one broke out with Landelinia...

Even in the meantime, Abbeian and Angelinian ships were being sunk by Landelinian submarines. Even during the rebellion ships had been continually sunk by these Landelinian submarines disguised as Abyssinkilian U-boats and nothing withstanding all this Abyssinkile and Abbeian protested against this slanderous work which even sided with Abbeian and Abyssinkile, despite the dangers they faced as alien enemies. Children of Abbeian relationship or descendants residing in Abyssinkilian cities and even Abbeian were ruthlessly massacred occasionally in their homes by secret Landelinian agents, mysteriously Catholic ngu chi churches were ruthlessly ravaged, children of both sides were seized and either slain or secretly sold into slavery and all this though done by men in Abyssinkilian and Angelinian clothing caused the three christian states to be very suspicious.

Finally through the villagings of Angelinian and Mormanian spies the treachery was discovered, Abbeian started to hurl her armies into Abyssinkile and Angelinia and proceedings were at once started to seize the whole calverinian provinces and to reject the Landelinian tribunals. The fine was even increased to one trillion dollars and war seemed inevitable.

Governor Abbeian and his brother held a council over this with King Cannon of Abbeian, Abyssinkile, Gondobin, Tripolygonia and Concentinia, all agreeing that if it was discovered that Landelinia was showing her treacherous character and refused to pay the full fine which was now ordered to be paid at once, Landelinia could be considered as an enemy treacherous in the extreme and relationships would be at once severed.

Abbeian and Abyssinkile were mad through as to call it and now Landelinia would be shown no mercy if the fine was not paid at once.

Violet and her sisters who were also before the king believed that wicked Landelinia was hiding something from the Abbeian government and that it would be best to watch the Landelinian aliens in Abbeian and Angelinia more closely. The little girls had already believed to be escaping suspects many of whom were believed suspected of the murder of the Landelinian christian of alien enemies suspected of the murder of the children in Abbeian but none of them were familiar to them. One suspect arrested, was a Landelinian who had tried to seek refuge in what appeared to be a cave inhabited by Plengiglonenian carpenter many of which fairly swarmed Abbeian thicker than flies swarm all over the United States.

He was seized and dragged out, Violet and her sisters being sure they saw him somewhere before but could not think who he was. After he was led away, they with Evans, and several policemen made an investigation of the huge tunnel way and cave but could not find no evidence, and only came upon three huge Plengiglonenian serpents with young who only looked curiously at them but never moved. Violet and her sisters played with the little ones for a while and stroke the heads of the big ones tenderly and when leaving Evans said with a laugh:

"I don't believe this would have been much of a refuge for the suspect if he had wet in as far as we did. These creatures especially the Crimedian and Tuskorherian hate the sight of the wicked Landelinians and would have made him hurry out faster than he went in, and surrender to his pursuers. I've heard of these and wrecking Landelinian submarines before succeeding in wrecking ships loaded with the heptages, plunging into waterspouts, spinning with the wind directing them against a Landelinian battle ship with fatal effect. I tell you Violet and you sisters they are your main protectors if you let them be."

of many great glandolinian fortifications. So in his efvo efforts to still weaken the glandelinians, general Hanson had resolved to free the child gloves by main force.

The freeing of the child slaves was hoped to be a most severe blow to the Mandolinians and a corresponding benei benefit to the christian side.

EVENTS ARE AFTER THE BATTLE OF EVANGELINIA CRANIA.
SHOWING THE FURIOUS DESPERATION OF THE ENEMY.....

[illegible]

The people who had not entered the war at first had known nothing of its great violence or of the horrors of the child slavery, the massacre of poor little children, the despoiling of all Catholic Churches, the grant acreage and other things committed by the foe. I imagine how surprised they were to find out that always famous white men wish in olden times since Eighteen fourteen one had been able to go on land upon battle to withstand the commanding of its own battleships or friendly christian fleets should be in the hands of the wicked and enslaved by its own nation Angolina.

enemies of god, and besieged by its own nation Angolinians.

All kinds of soft fine silk, and other rich clothing to wear, spices which made their food taste better, rugs to make softer the floor, and many other comforts of life had already been lost by many countries on account of the rebellion and so many nations wished to be shed blood to join with Angolinia and help to crush the wicked rebellion. From all sections of Iyian, Jockey since the battle of Julio Gallio to Angelinians Granda great fleets of ships had sailed frequently down the river, and a ll kinds of goods secured from trains passing underground to Iyian Jockey from Galverine had to be brought into the city under fire, on the backs, of camels, horses, and mules, from the ports and trains, where ships were waiting them to convey them to all parts of the monstrous city. Picture to yourselves long lines of those poor beasts of burden guarded by soldiers as under fire from christian besieging guns they wound their way down every strait of the city. On account of this underground tunnel from Galverine the Angelinians realised they could not stop the enemy from obtaining provisions, and many who had seen the horrors of the siege almost blamed general Janson for losing the battle of Galverine. From Julio Gallio to Iyian Jockey however there were three main routes by which the continual caravan reached the main city called Wad-Wad here. All on account of heavy shelling, christian snipers and calvadoses who as ambushes were costly and full of extreme danger, for it was even the custom of raiding christian troops to plunder and capture the caravans, or force them to give up their goods, before they would let them go on. The Angelinians were bound to do anything to bring the siege to a quick termination. The most northern rout led through the g-a black sand by way of which was known as the Julio Gallio and Jorman Catharine Route. At a little later a force of christian troops and gunboats had managed to cut off this rout. This was a hard blow to the Angelinians for the Angelinians to obtain provisions from Galverine had always used that rout to the secret tunnels. But it was a blow felt by all of Angolinia to for it only made the enemy resistance more fierce and dogged.

For a long time since the beginning of the siege men and spies, and officers, secret service agents, and army engineers had been trying to find a way to discover these secret tunnels, so as to destroy them and cut off all supplies from Galvestone so that they could reduce the war resistance to the siege by famine. Now as it was past December and as civilian wisdom in particular had made millions upon millions of christians feel the sorrows of an unhappy christmas day and newyears the Anglinian generals becoming desperate felt that such a discovery must be made at any cost of lives and money or provisions. So the siege the food supplies must be cut off.

General Portugal during the same day the battle of Evangelina Granda managed set out to find one of the secret tunnels by sailing down the west coast of Yuma Run under fire from enemy batteries on shore. It was slow difficult and dangerous work but at last a brave admiral whose name was Vasco da Gama, reached the most northern end of the nearest war of Julio Gallo and succeeded in landing a large force. Such fierce and sanguinary fighting followed for a day before he was repulsed that he afterwards called it "the Port of Hell. You can guess why," but General Hansen said "It shall be called the River Port of Demaration!"

Can the readers think why he gave it that name?

Can the readers think why he gave it that name when the general Portugal had found this rout by straining north and losing so many men and priv prov a provisions, general gain who had accompanied him did not dare proceed onward for fear of risking annihilation for not far away he could see a small small section of fortress Angeline.

So they had to find another way to discover the outlet of the tunnels. The first great Angelinian soldier who made the most daring attempt was general Columbus. He was not an Angelinian naturally by birth but a Moromonian but he being of Spanish nationality had joined the Christian cause and had proved himself to be a regular general. Christian spies had seen hundreds of Angelinian vessels coming and going even under fire, and the spies had spent many hours under risk watching these ships and wondering how they secured the supplies as they could not dare attempt blockade running. This general had when a little boy lived in Ivian wickiey with his father who was a very poor man, who had learned to earn his living by working in a wool factory. The boy had learned his father's trade, and also had went willingly to school, where he was a good studious boy learning reading, and all the things schools teach, and was so excellent at that learning that he gained the admiration of all the boys and girls in school. Early in his life he had heard older people talking frequently about the horrors of the whole world's trade after the Angelinians in an effort to crush the wicked Angelinian rebellion had slung up all Angelinian and Angelinian ports combined, and had closed all ports of Ivian wickiey and other seaports of Calvernia and Abyssinikile. He also realized the desperate need of finding those damned secret tunnels which gave the enemy so many provisions.

Many days before Evangelina Granda raged he had consulted with many wise men and generals, studied all maps of Ivian wickiey and her surrounding vicinity toward Calvernia, and here during this time he heard much talk, about finding those secret tunnels and he decided to make an attempt himself if he died for it. General Gloom Columbus listened earnestly to all of the generals and other wise men's stories about the secret tunnels, he studied many maps and charts, he thought a great deal. It seemed to him that the tunnels coming down from the northeast from Calvernia were five in number and two hundred and fifty miles long, and entered into northeastern Ivian wickiey and not direct east as many Angelinians supposed. He tried to get all the proofs that he could find this out. He also had made at great risk a visit with three ships disguised as Angelinian merchants also had made a voyage up the river himself but for a time discovered nothing and could not dare get information. After many long days of study sometimes even at night, he felt sure he could get to one of those secret tunnels by going with ships straight through Ivian wickiey to the northeast on the Nooman run river. He would go right in the opposite direction from that in which the mighty fortresses of Angelina lay so as not to be in range of her terrific guns.

"The way by the tunnels is by the northeast," he would say.

If he should be able to reach northeastern Ivian wickiey in this way without loss, he would be able to prove where the mouths of the tunnels come into the city streets, and he could thus find some means of stopping the provisions of the enemy and have them starved into submission. The more he thought about this great and desperate plan, the more he longed to carry it out. In fact he thought of it continually by day and fairly dreamed of it by night.

But it was a dangerous undertaking and he feared he could not get any one to make the expedition with him, and how could he get provisions and men to help make this great dream come true. At last on the second of December he laid his plans before general Hanson Ivian. General Hanson having everything in his own hands just now could not promise to help him. The general then took his little daughter by the hand, and started across the hilly section of the Christian positions to general Spainer. We may picture father and little daughter hurrying along the rough hilly roads from camp to camp and position to position. The general could hardly stop to see whether his poor little daughter was tired, so eager was he to find someone to give him permission to make the expedition. When he came to a place within the Christian lines near general Underlines headquarters, he left his little daughter with a guardian, and set out alone in search of general Great Heart. At this time a severe artillery duel and series of cavalry conflicts were going on in the southern portion of Great Heart's position, so general Columbus had a hard time getting general Great Heart's attention to him. At last the great general gave him a hearing. He asked a number of advisers to be present. Some of them laughed at the poor general saying that he was attempting to commit suicide. Others said "We believe he is right but it is an exceedingly dangerous undertaking and he would have to pass the Angeline fortifications."

General Great Heart thinking it foolish to make such an undertaking would not help him or give the permission. Sick at heart therefore, he planned to leave this portion of the Christian lines and to go general Spainer and ask for aid. Up to this time he had failed. When he walked through the Christian lines with sad face and threadbare uniform, boy scouts and girl scouts thought he was crazy to ask to attempt such an undertaking, some saw things of pity for him and others asked that he be executed and others laughed.

But general Columbus did not give hope but prayed. He had faith in his desperate plans, in the help of God, and believed that sometime he would succeed. He started bravely therefore for general Spainer's army and headquarters taking his pretty daughter with him.

At that time as he passed on many who saw the general realized he was a fine looking man indeed. He was tall and strong, and had a noble face with keen blue eyes, and there was something in his manner that made people and all Christian officers like him and thus the reason they did not want him to risk the undertaking and lose his life. They felt they could not spare him. After father and his little daughter walked about a mile and a half through the Christian lines, they stopped at the Encampment of St Mary's. Just then general Jackson Evans the friend of Ivian wickiey and her sisters was riding by and the two generals stopping began to talk together. General Columbus reasoned well about his great plans. General Jack Evans listened closely and saying that his friends Ivian wickiey and her sisters were in Andean doing some desperate work of their own which he believed it decided to help him and having a good pull with general Hanson because he and Hanson were like father and son he at once wired to Hanson, who really woulding something must be done felt the general a wise and good man. Thus the aid of general Jackson Evans proved a help to general Columbus for general Hanson summoning him to his headquarters told him he would furnish him a small strong fleet with men and transport for the voyage up the river. But even with the general's help he still had many trails before him. The upper part of the river having not been navigated on account of being in full possession of the foe navy was not known in the situation. All soldiers were afraid exceedingly afraid to go farther from the Christian lines. The lines upon those deep dark waters and run past the dreaded fortress Angelina, and also Silverbell, Red Riding Hood, and the Three Bears. On the course of several days however three large battleships with one hundred and fifty small guns and eighty twenty inch guns, and ten thousand one hundred and fifty men were ready to start, and Admiral Thomas himself had volunteered to lead the expedition. The three dreadnoughts were the height and width of the American battleships but some what longer and had more guns, and was accompanied by a number of gunboats and transports. The leading ship was called by the Angelinians the Santa Maria, and was commanded by Admiral Thomas and the general was on board. It was about nearly a thousand and ninety feet long, and was the only dreadnought of the bunch which had the most monstrous guns. A half hour before sunrise on Friday morning the little expedition started and the fleet steamed out of the port of Jennie Ivian. It was a sorrowful time for the poor sailors, marines and their friends. All believed that the warships would be lost, and that the soldiers marines and sailors would never again see home and family. The guns of the enemy fortresses it was feared could annihilate them easily.

When about an hour later, they left St Anne Island and the furthest portion of the Christian shores faded from sight, the marines and sailors and others on board prepared for any emergency and from excitement and emotion almost cried like children. Fresh worries lay before them. Could the expedition succeed.

They all determined to accomplish it or die. The end of a day run they came in sight of the fortress of Angelina. Simultaneously the fleet entered a vast stretch of submarine sea and indistinctly in the dark, and the sailors were much troubled fearing that the expedition was now a failure but their ships were so well disguised that neither the fortress or the submarine attacked.

They had even feared that the dreadnoughts would strike the dangerous mines stuck fast on chains in the river or run upon some of the Angelinian mermines in the dark and receive a volley of cannon shot, or struck by the rams in the dark and with ships sinking be either killed or taken prisoners. But when the wind blew a little stronger, it was seen all foe vessels gave way for them with salutes, and the disguised ships were able to pass on their way. Later on as they entered the Port of Damnation where not far away could be seen a long line of batteries placed for close range the men and marines thought to themselves:

"If we are discovered we are lost and will never see our friends again."

Though they managed to pass safely and began to see the first section of the city not eight miles away a Angelinian ship appeared to follow them and the officer on board signalled and begged to know who the strange fleet was. As Admiral Thomas refused to answer, the crew and officer on board the rebel ship became angry and suspicious and one of the men said within hearing:

"Let's fire upon the strange ships and sink them for they may be Christian warships in disguise."

General Columbus knew his life and the lives of all in the little fleet was in danger but no one would give up and Admiral Thomas said:

"You won't dare to fire. You are one ship and we are ten. If one is shot if is fired at us we will sink you with our broadside so beware."

The enemy ship then in alarm fell away and the fleet on its expedition was allowed to pass without being molested. The greater the danger the more firmly the general set himself to meet it with an iron will and a high purpose. He still had faith and hope and already they had safely passed three of the fortresses without being discovered. At last at the approach of ten o'clock signs of another approaching river port, and broken bits of trees appeared. That night no one slept at all. Every one on board every ship was straining his eyes, to catch the first glimpse of the distant shore to watch out for actions of troops on command of foe shore batteries and other cannon. About eleven o'clock general Columbus himself saw a moving stream of colored lights in the distance, looking like waving fire.

sparkler flares in the hands of many men running along the shore a back and forth and it looked mighty suspicious. Early in the morning a number of little boats were lowered and everybody went ashore disguised as Glandelinian bandages. General Columbus dressed in a rich silken uniform of grayish green, carried in his hands for disguise of his purpose the flag of Glandelinia. As soon as he reached the opposite shore and found no Glandelinian soldiers to question him he fell on his knees, and with tears in his eyes he kissed the Cross he wore and let thanked God for making the expedition safe so far. He encountered however many child slaves and their masters, and the children at first ran into the woods because they were afraid, but they were forced to come back by their masters, and though the children were soon curious about these strange visitors the masters were not and being suspicious of them compelled them to go back to their ships. The whole band could have easily gotten away with all the children but then their expedition and its cause would have been discovered and no one could have escaped the foe. Steaming on for another day they soon reached the first outer section of Vivian Wickey. On the next morning however he had a serious mishap. While it was still dark, one of his little transports struck a mine, and was blown to pieces and many on board killed or drowned. Neither of his vessels had been set on fire through some mysterious reason, and he had only nine ships left. But he doggedly continued onward for the coast Vivian Wickey. After a very stormy voyage, he entered the first Vivian Wickey Harbor called Palooes. It at first appeared to be a joyful day for many child slaves for they believed it was a Christian fleet come to deliver them from slavery, and a perfect parade of children swarmed toward his ships unrestrained by their masters.

Having made the trip as far as he did with so small a fleet he returned to the Christian port of the harbor as soon as possible where he was now honored by a great parade. General Hanson Vivian and even Goncentinian Aronburg sent for him, and when he came into their presence they honored him by rising. As he stood to salute them, they commanded him to rise and sit with them as an equal. At last General Columbus had become a great man. Everyone in the army was eager beyond measure to share his honor and his fame as a great soldier. It was now very easy to get the most powerful number of men in the Angolinian army to join him on a second expedition. Early in January he went down the half choked river with a fleet of battleships. This time he had with him over a eleven thousand one hundred men, and many of them were from the best regiments in the Christian army. They were decided to camp in the city of Vivian Wickey.

Long enough to find the secret tunnels, and then go back again to General Hanson's lines and report the fact to the general. They also expected to use gangs of child slaves to betray the tunnels by revealing their true identification to them alone. On reaching the nearest portion of the city, the fleet did not dare proceed any further but landed them on who were in a disguise, and he leading these men set out to find the tunnels if possible. But trouble and suspicion met him on every hand. The Glandelinians were not friendly as they suspected him and his followers as suspicious characters and from fear of being suspected and detained some of his own men were unwilling to even obey him and left the expedition and went back to the ships. They declared they had not come to commit suicide but to find the tunnels at once by easier means. At the end of three days he reached a section of Vivian Wickey called Gundi Street. Truly during the long and trying time of keeping in hiding by day and moving by night all their provisions and food had been used up so that his men were almost facing starvation. But at last he reached the northeast portion of Vivian Wickey. Here more troubles were waiting for him.

Here he found all things were going badly. All the child slaves not trusting him or his men because they looked like Glandelinians were very unfriendly, and serious rotings had occurred and children threw stones at him and his men. For two days the poor general tried to make things right but could not. At last a Glandelinian officer suspecting him as something unusual for entering Vivian Wickey sternly ordered him and his men to leave immediately or be taken prisoners and sent to Julio Gallo in chains. Seeing that nothing could be done as none of the child slaves trusted him or his men he abandoned his attempt and at heart heart, and went back to the Christian lines after having on the return trip met with trouble after trouble and disaster after disaster. First one of his ships struck another mine and was wrecked, and he received a painful wound when a grenade exploded on deck near him killing and wounding a number of men.

When he returned to the Christian lines General Goncentinian Aronburg and Hanson Vivian sent for him to come to their presence, and when they learned of the failure of the expedition, the generals wept, and he also broke down and wept. The poor general however had received a mortal wound, gangrene set in and he only lived eighteen hours after this, for he was also broken in health, and felt that such his expedition was a failure he had little to live for. He finally died of a broken heart.....

burns in the city, or abandoned shacks and long houses not occupied by Glandelinian soldiers and guards or citizens.

sparkler flares in the hands of many men running along the shore, a boat and boat.

At the time when general Columbus went on his first expedition another Angolinian officer who was a captain was planning to steam up the Sunbeam River in search of the very same tunnels. This was Captain John Slater. He had before the war traveled much if you please to known, and had spent some time of his life in western Yivian Wickey. After the battle of Evangelina Gran, Grandia he asked general Hanson himself if he might go on an expedition and try and discover the tunnels and the general after some debate finally gave the consent. But it was not until December 30th that this captain put out to the water route with only one small disguised vessel in the form of a strange raft and only eighteen men. He sailed straight northward and landed on one of the best river coasts of Yivian Wickey heavily guarded by: crossed shore batteries and sailents and other positions. He was the first captain of any portion of the army or any man who was able to reach this portion of the river a shore without being discovered by the enemy, for general Columbus did not do this. On his return to the Christian lines and when he told that he did discover a way to one of the tunnels from information received from several child slaves whom he took with him by slick work he was called 'The Great Angolinian Admiral. For his success he was treated with much honor. The simple captain of a regiment was given a higher commission.

The following week, with six small vessels he made another expedition where he went, what he found, whether he ever came back no one knew. For he never returned and it was feared he had been captured by the enemy. From what we have already learned you will dear readers probably think that the river of the Yivian Wickey should have been named the River of the Post. The reason why it was not can be told in a few words. After general Columbus at the risk of his life and great troubles and losses led the way, many others simultaneously attempted similar expeditions elsewhere by other routes, among them was Admiral Vete. How many expedition he made, and just when he made them not one of the main Christian generals would reveal. But it was thought that he sailed along the river coast coast for more than fifty miles, or perhaps along a portion of Battery Line River shore, lying close to the enemy's lines so as to make an impression on them that he was only a transport. He wrote letters also in which he told of all the dangers he had seen in his expeditions, and what he said in these letters general Hanson on account of so many spies around a did not reveal under any conditions. The many good accounts that the admiral wrote, of what he had seen were read also by Angolinian and Abyssinikilian geographers. They liked the accounts because they were so interesting. So the river was called the 'River of Expeditions'.

CHAPTER TWENTY SEVEN.

HOW CHILD SLAVES WERE SEEN IN WAYS INSIDE OF YIVIAN WICKEY BY THOSE MAKING THE SECRET AND DARING EXPEDITIONS.

As we have learned general Columbus and others had during their efforts inside of Yivian Wickey tried to get the confidence of many children to help them in their plans and the way the child slaves lived inside the city was more peculiar than the way the American Indians ever lived. They did not even be confined close together, but were scattered all over the city itself so that relations and brothers and sisters were separated far. All who were related had been torn apart and those among boys and girls were formed into groups of five or six, and each group had two slave masters or overseers watching over them and guarded by one soldier. Those which we must know about were those confined east of the Yivian Wickey (maybe she did run). This was the southern section of the child slave territory, and these were confined in a district lying between the river, and extending toward Lake An Angeline and Wickey Bay. These child slave districts were divided into many sections, and although all the child slaves did not look alike and appeared to be of many different nationalities we may say as a rule the girls all wore short bobbed hair and the boys hair was clipped short. Not one little girl was seen to wear her hair long, in braids, pig tails or curls. And the majority of the children were compelled to go half naked and those that were dressed were made to wear rags, and were always compelled to go barefooted summer or winter as they were never allowed to wear shoes.

None of the child slaves were allowed to live in the houses during the siege itself. In most districts the homes of child slaves were something like big wigwags in the streets, more like large Indian tents, and the cold stone bricks of the street was used as a floor. Or a door a bear hide or a good sheet was used. Here in the centre of the tent wigwag, a small fire was built by the child slaves themselves, and the smoke was let out through a hole at the top. There was no warm carpet for the floor, but the children were allowed to wrap their feet in blankets and quilts to shield them from the frozen ground in winter time. One of the districts where masters were a little more better in conduct allowed their slaves to have other kinds of dwellings than common tents. They were outhouses and barns in the city, or abandoned shacks and long houses not occupied by Angolinian soldiers and guards or citizens.

about two hundred and fifty due disguised Abissinians, and several hundred Angelinians. This was in January 1913. On his way across one of the straits of the city on that early morning he climbed a big snow drift hardened by thickness of packed snow. At the top he stopped and gazed, for stretching far away before him stood a vast beautiful building from whose entrance and stairway came and went many generals and other rebel officers. He had made as he believed a great discovery for he was the first Angelinian officer who had ever been able to behold general Mic-Allister Stanok's headquarters, but the rebel troops around were so thick in numbers, and the journey was so dangerous that he had great difficulty in getting a chance to enter the building without being discovered, then with his sword drawn ready for action, and his pistol ready in the holster he managed to secure some important dispatches, the generals full dress uniforms, his hat and sword and other valuable things and two geographies and big map and plane, and a map of Vivian Wickey and the fortresses and then slipped away without being discovered and finally rejoined his comrades. This daring Angelinian general almost risking the fury of hell as to say secured important things indeed, and when he reached the Christian armies safely without pursued and presented his prizes and one was surprised and afterwards he was known as the man who kidnapped the Angelinian generals full dress uniforms.

But no one knew as yet if any one could reach the secret tunnels or their mouths by going north on the rivers. The honor of making sure of this belonged to general Hanson Vivian and Jacksonia Evans. Hanson sent captain Magellina a word to make an expedition into Vivian Wickey from the northeast with a strong fleet and even fight his way through if necessary.

Here's a proof of the dangers of fortress Gertrude Angelina. This Angelinian officer did not like the idea of going out on a such a dangerous expedition and he went to general Hanson as begged to be excused. General Hanson refused to allow the order to be suspended declaring that the tunnels at any cost must be discovered, but nevertheless he did declare that if general Jacksonia Evans really would suspend it he could be allowed to let the matter drop. But general Jacksonia had heard much talk about the other expeditions being almost successful with the rescue of many child slaves, and that one of the most successful expeditions had been made by captain Jacksonia de Gaudin, who managed to sail up and down the Norma river through Vivian Wickey to the north and all its length to the south and succeeded in obtaining many slaves to free though he lost a number of ships and nearly two thousand men for the daring attempt.

For several years before the war Jacksonia Evans himself had been all through Vivian Wickey by river routes and which had taken long trips. He had studied maps and charts, and he was sure that if some one could find a passage through Vivian Wickey and discover the tunnels on the northeast section, the siege would be much shorter and be brought to a speedy end at that. Of course general Jacksonia himself had no proper map of Vivian Wickey or all her hundreds of surrounding Calverinian and Abissinian fortresses in the hands of the enemy, for to him it was almost like an unknown land. But he himself had been once during the siege with a little fleet sail into every bay or river till he found one which went clear through and in his experience with violet and her sisters in Norma river he had discovered that many large streams were close by.

So general Jacksonia Evans knowing all this refused to grant his request but even notified general Hanson that when a man has been sent on an expedition he must go and to back out would mean treason and cowardice.

The captain then turned to general Spain and Mansion but these would not listen to him. He therefore had to go and general Jacksonia gave him a command of a fleet of five hundred strong dreadnaughts and two hundred gunboats, and two hundred and eighty mercenaries. The strength of the crew was about seventy thousand men. With these Magellina put out down the river from the north in January 1913.

Many dangers awaited him. He had to face sixteen heavy conflicts with enemy fleets, the fear that food and water would not hold out, and angry fortresses on both sides of the river who were only too ready to blow his ships to smithereens if they dared to pass them and make the expedition fail in order to prevent any Christian fleet from steaming down the river.

Not until after six days after leaving the Christian side did he find a well sheltered harbor not far from Vivian Wickey. There he cast anchor, and there for the first time since the beginning of the expedition did his wounded men get proper treatment, and enjoy a great meal for once, but many of them were still unfit for further service, and they many of them begging the officer in command to turn back and abandon the expedition but as much as he had been afraid to go on it, he was that much more afraid now to abandon it and he refused. Once unknown to him three sneaking Angelinian spies discovering his intentions had secured a footing on his ship and plotted to kill him but were captured and shot just in time. He was more than a match for them all, and the ships though nearing the forbidding fortress of Gertrude Angelina steamed onward ready for any fray that was expected.

As a most anxious general, the governor general Evans refused to give the order, the poor general would have to stay out of the battle and still if the Christian ships could not stop the enemy's advance, he would be forced to wait all the while.

Soon the storm came. In passing the six mile fortress teeming with great centimeter center and krupp and motor guns, the fortress suddenly so shook and roared like a volcano erupting and was clouded in smoke and flame. The thunder was a million times louder than all the racket in the most violent thunderstorm, and though the whole fleet added to the din by responding, one ship after another was torn to pieces until only five hundred were left and terrible were the number of killed and wounded. The commander knew that to escape annihilation he must pass the fortress and by desperate efforts he managed to do so, and soon as his fleet or what remained after picking up many of the survivors entered a new passage of the river and came high into the city, they were fired upon by shore batteries and also found to be pursued by many Angelinian warships and forces of troops on shore.

Torpedo boats and submarine came also after them shooting off their deadly missiles and the storm was a roaring inferno as another ship was blown up with all on board killed.

Now near the city on every side was great seemingly mountainous fortresses. They were as he soon learned before his death the great fortresses of Vivian. Again and again the many guns of these fortresses thundered in an ear-splitting roar, and many soldiers and sailors made effort to reply but the ships were already badly wrecked and many guns disabled and strewn with thousands of dead and dying and many begged the admiral to allow them to raise the white flag rather than face annihilation.

"I will go on," said Magellina. "I was so minded to make the expedition at any risk and I'm going to do it if not for an act of bravery but to show the Christian generals what results when such an expedition is made."

"I will go on if we have to eat the leather of the ships yards in order to keep at it..."

When a little later he passed through the gauntlet of fortresses and came to the outskirts of the city where there were no fortresses, he was wapt for joy. He had only sixty ships left many of his men having been killed or wounded or taken prisoners, but still he headed through the city. When began a most terrible voyage. The admirals troubles were thick about him. He was yet to come.

Destruction of more ships from mines, shore batteries, terrible hunger wounds and death. Those who did not die of wounds or shot and shell, grew sick of the expedition and begged once more to be allowed to give it up. The wounded only managed to keep alive by hiding down in the holds of the ships and eating the skins and leather wound about the great ropes. At last they reached the Andean section of Vivian Wickey, but here death was awaiting for the great Angelinian captain who had been reckless just to spite general Hanson Vivian and Jacksonia Evans because they forced him to make the expedition. In a desperate fight with another Angelinian fleet, the brave Magellina was slain, his flagship sunk with all on board and a number of other ships set on fire, torn up and disabled and one captured. Those of his men now who remained escaped the foe fleet and continued onward for now to turn back meant complete destruction. His voyage through the hostile city was a long one. Not until February nearly a month after setting out did they finally arrive at a Christian port far from Vivian Wickey as to get back to Hanson's lines they found it impossible. Only one vessel, with only eighteen men starving and wounded sail sailors got back to the Christian side safe. Such was the end of the most wonderful, and daring expedition, that probably had ever been made through Vivian Wickey. The glory of it though unsuccessful never failed. It meant a great deal to general Hanson Vivian and his generals for there was no longer any doubt that the rivers through the city were almost impassable. All the generals knew that the fortresses were worse than talked about. So you know how they soon came to call all the fortresses "The Fortresses of Damnation."

Twelve days after Admiral or general Columbus made his first expedition up and down a portion of the Norma river another Angelinian captain by the name of Cortez Hermades went on one of the other fleets of an expedition bound for Julio Calio. After a stormy voyage on the river with the enemy fortresses firing at him, he landed a troop not far from the city section of Vivian Wickey where he planned to secure a number of child slaves by force and make an attempt to discover the tunnels. Here was something about this Angelinian officer that made many generals admire him and look to him as one of their best generals. So when a strong commander was needed to head an expedition through Julio Calio, he was chosen.

He soon made his way to the eastern war of the river section of the city reaching it early in January. One of his first acts showed that he was bound to have his own way. Soon after landing he gave the order to:

"Sink all the Angelinian boats you see." This he did to prevent any bodies of Angelinian soldiers from making a surprise attack upon his troops. He felt he could not afford to lose a single man, for he only had 10,450. Yet with this small army, sixteen cannon, and many horses, he dared to face any danger he might meet in his effort to free children right inside of Julio Calio.

And he had not far to go before danger came. He met strong opposition, and the glandolinians who showed such hatred for the Nationals withdrew the child slaves to such quarters that it was for a time impossible for him to rescue them. Even the glandolinian citizens of Ivian wickay showed hatred for the Angolians, and fear of their rifles and bayonets. Later he found that all the citizens who favored the glandolinian cause, even the ruling people of Julio Gallo, and their leader general Montesuma felt the same way, and he soon learned why his expedition was so well known. It seemed that during the other expeditions many child slaves had been kidnapped from this section and one force following an expedition had been driven back to the river with great loss, and when he left the christian leader had said: "Some day I shall return, and take all the child slaves from you and set the f them free."

The glandolinian citizens and others believed that general Cortez was this same christian officer, and the glandolinian leader jealously thought; "Now I shall have to give up my power over the child slaves in this community unless aid comes to me from the soldiers."

So you see why even all the citizens who favored the glandolinian cause hated the Angolians warriors with their purple and red uniforms, and their shining swords and bayonets. But even the citizens were not people who gave up easily. So the first bunch of people he met gathered into a crowd which soon became a mob and they offered fight and started robbing. Their way of formation and their t their strange dress excited the wonder of the Angolians commander, and his men.

They wore clothing mostly like Sepiards, and having secured long sticks, bricks, stones, lances, slings, and heavy wooden boards and swords and rifles and daggers butcher knives and even pistols they fought desperately against the soldiers who were compelled to use their bayonets. Cortez won the victory however as they could not fight like real soldiers, and the mobs seeing that they could not fight Angolians soldiers fled but reviled them. A great surprise awaited the Angolians when they first looked upon the houses of the monstrous and beautiful but besieged city. They were astonished at its beauty.

One section of the a part they were on known as Julio Gallo was so divided by the gorm river that it seemed to be standing on large islands in the middle of a lake. From the shores across the river three great fortresses of solid mason work, from twenty to thirty feet high and from four to five miles long, led to the outskirts of the city terminating into the great series of the fortresses of Lucille Jackson Janette. Where these fortresses met stood a more huge fortress with a large number of battlements on it, and in the centre of this fortress stood a building armed with guns that shaped much like a gigantic temple.

Around it seemed to be formations of fortified steps, one hundred and fourt een in number in all, leading to a strong temple battery on top. They appeared to be a long flight of steps but were nothing but fortified bulwarks and it took ladders to climb each one which were six feet high. As the Angolians arched on toward the great fortresses, they were surprised to pass beautiful floating islands with fortresses on top, and within the city they found canals which were teeming with glandolinian gunboats and cruisers. Here many gunboats gliding to and fro, remindd reminded them of a fortified Venice, and even on all the house tops along the river front were found batteries of small cannons, and now it did seem to this party of Angolians that Ivian wickay appeared to be impossible to be captured at all. As soon as they reached the destination, Cortez and his men took quarters in a large building within sight of the great fortresses. To weaken the power of any attacks upon his little band Cortez had seized many of the non-combatants and held them as prisoners especially those who dared to claim they favored the cause of the glandolinians. They were though prisoners treated as guests but not allowed to leave the building. The glandolinians in this portion of the city realizing the mission of this bold party and their intentions were jealous and very angry for they knew they had been outwitted, and they were eager for revenge, yet they feared to make an attack because the Angolians held the citizens prisoners even women and children, and the enemy leader in this section did not dare give a command to make an attack for fear that the Angolians would expose the non-combatants to their fire. But when at last during a glandolinian Religious festival, the glandolinians by promises by other leaders attacked them, and killed many if of their leading men the Angolians could hold themselves out no longer and opened a destructive fire upon the rebels filling the streets with many dead and wounded. The glandolinians however ever gathering in great numbers and attacked the Angolians with the greatest fury, crowding the streets, and swarming over the roofs as they tried to get at their hated christian foes. General his house and order the glandolinians to stop fighting. But as the foe officers and with a shower of bullets that filled the air, they struck him down. A few days later he died of a broken heart. After a whole week of hard fighting from house to house, general Cortez saw that he must leave the city or face annihilation.

most serious mistake. If the general had refused to give the permit, the poor general would have stayed out of the city and the christian would not stop the... all the...

He tried with his survivors to steal away from the city at night, but the few who were on the watch, and attacked him furiously by land and by water. The fighting in the dark was most frightful and though attacking only a handful of christians the losses of the glandolinians was astonishing. Cortez barely got away and wounded fatally the main glandolinian general, after half of his small army had been either killed captured or wounded. The next morning after he was abandoning the fatal expedition he was so overcome with grief for the loss and suffering of his men that he sat down upon a chair on deck of his ship and wept bitterly. At he did not give up the idea of showing the enemy that he would take revenge. With another fleet a little afterwards he returned and made another fierce attack upon the river section of Julio Gallo. After five hours, a section surrendered to him nearly 10,000 child slaves but he nevertheless had to make his get away and succeeded in doing so and half of the buildings in that section was now in flaming ruins. General Cortez had succeeded in conquering a part of the city but what he captured he could not hold though he did succeed in taking away with his ten thousand child slaves.

Not many days after general Cortez conquered and captured a number of child slaves another Angolians general whose name was Francisco Pizarro Spaward, equally daring went to capture fortress Peru where he learned important dispatches could be secured which would reveal the positions of the many secret tunnels. He had served in other battles. Under general phoson Ivian, and had been with him when the bloody battle of gorma osamin occurred.

Having heard many stories of other expeditions up and down the great river even at the beginning of the siege he was eager to attempt a daring feat of his own and accomplish wonders if possible.

So as soon as he was permitted to make it he went on the expedition with three battalions and six thousand three hundred and fifty men, and many provisions. A few days later his troops landed on the river coast near fortress Peru south of Lucille Jackson, and began to march toward general Cortez glandolinian encampment where the glandolinian leader was not suspecting any attacks or expeditions and raids. This general was called Inca Cortez. In the region of the Peru fortress, general Spaward came upon many strange sights. They saw fields of artillery guarded by deep steep walled canals teeming with mines, with great points upward long sharp objects like knives or bayonets but longer, and scores of thousands of men were digging rifle pits and making secret pitfalls. Though enemies as they were of the glandolinians the Angolians wondered at the fine walled and long fortresses of Peru. The fortress was about two hundred and twenty feet wide, and the tops almost as level as a roadway except having bulwarks above and teeming with cannon and battlements. So you could see that the christian general saw it was not so easy as he thought to capture this strong fortress with his small small troop of men, which many hills near by the fortress, high mountains, and deep broad valleys were guarded by smaller fortresses and many batteries and encampments.

An general Spaward and his men climbed higher and higher on their way toward the distant fortress they saw here and there many encampments on the hillsides. Although the marching was slow and hard the little christian army kept going forward. At last when the enemy generals in the fortress learned that a small christian force was on its way from the river to try and assault the fortress, inasmuch he sent messengers to general Spaward with derisive taunts and words of defiance. On meeting general Spaward the messengers were however held as prisoners and only one of them was allowed to go back, and from his ways the messenger almost thought this christian general had more power than those of human beings.

After the messengers were seized and taken prisoners general Spaward marched to a small recently abandoned fortress called Caxamaran and entered it with a small army. He at once sent colonel De Soto London with thirty five cavalry men with a flag of truce demanding the glandolinians to surrender the fortress. This colonel found many glandolinians both soldiers and citizens surrounded by many toiling child slaves, and by many children who were girls wearing quilted cotton clothing, and all the citizens themselves for fear of being attacked by raiding christian soldiers carried lances, clubs, slings and muskets. The child slaves of course treated the Angolians very politely, and many of the Angolians promised to rescue them the next day.

But when general Spaward learned after some investigation the size and strength of the foe garrisons and the strength of the fortress, he felt that his expedition was not only useless but that his little body of men was in great danger foregoing too near the foe lines. Brave as he was do you think he slept all that night? It was more than likely that all the Angolians expected the next day would be the last.

But the Angelinian gave no sign of fear. He hid his men in the outposts of Casuarona and sent a messenger with another flag of truce to demand of the foe leader to surrender to him the child slaves, promising if this was done he would leave the region and go back to the christian lines. When the two foe leaders met however, the christian general began a long speech, and handed a peculiar book to the rebel chief. In proud a rebel threw it upon the ground and refused to surrender the child slaves. No sooner had he done this, than at a given signal, the Angelinians rushed from the outposts, where they were hidden, seized the landolinian officer, in and in a fierce conflict of two hours mercilessly cut down his followers rushed the child slave places killing and wounding many more and carrying off all the slaves. The landolinian officer was shut up in a room of one of the forts about thirty two feet long and ten wide. Reaching as high as he could, he made a long wir written line on the wall and a numeration. He told general spaniard that he would give many more slaves up to him and his christians if they would let him go. The crafty Angelinian leader agreed to do so. At once messengers were sent to many parts of the region round about, and many of the promised child slaves began to come in. In or six days the landolinians thus held so mercilessly were tolling away bring hour by hour great numbers of slaves boys and girls of all ages and many bags of gold and silver. They had to do this or their leader would be put to death. At last they got together about what would be worth ten million dollars, and twenty thousand child slaves. The Angelinians were greatly pleased over their astonishing victory, and though held prisoners they treated the landolinians kindly.

One of the landolinian leaders however broke his promise and ate attempted to get away with some of the slaves. He was recaptured brought to trial, and shot. In this way general spaniard felt sure of showing the enemy that they could not monkey with him. Finally as the christians began to go back to their ships the foe leader was released but general spaniard was not to enjoy what he had won so desperately. A tremendous encounter on the river soon brought him and many of his followers to a bitter end. One day at noon outside of Julio Gallo and not far from the christian lines, nineteen heavily armed gunboats and two warships of the enemy had entered the river from the southwest, and took his little fleet by surprise. He and his followers in order to retain the child slaves fought like demons on ships. With their three ships they disabled a number of the foe ships firing broadsides and making desperate rushes past the fleet of rebel Angelinians. He three christian ships cut down one after another of the foe fleet untill only eight were left, but finally during the height of the combat a shell struck the mast of the leading ship and it fell striking the poor christian leader and felling him to the deck. He lay a cross on the floor of the deck, he kissed it and breathed his last. With great joy the rebels shouted "The Angelinian tyrant is dead and now we have his fleet at our mercy." But the survivors of the foe did not get his fleet for a christian fleet suddenly appeared and the enemy had to flee. The foe losses in killed and wounded was two thousand. Twenty of the wounded were drowned. The christian loss in killed and wounded was only three hundred and fifty. Such was the end of brave general spaniard, the fearless leader of the Angelinians who had at the risk of his life compelled twenty thousand landolinians near fortress Peru to give up a whole army of child slaves.

Among the many Angelinian officers who were seeking to discover the secret tunnels communicating with Vivian Wickey and Galverine was another christian officer whose name was Juann Ponthin Dalacien. He had been governor general of the Galverinian State. Urner about the time that the siege of Vivian Wickey had started and he had immediately took up an army and came to Vivian Wickey to help in the great siege.

His health was very poor however from his efforts to help general Manston in the siege, and he was no longer young. Having heard of the wonderful way of which the besieged rebels obtained provisions despite the tightness of the siege, he longed to try and find one of the secret tunnels, for he believed if he could do so and locate its mouth he could under cover of some dark and stormy night place explosives in it and blow it up so as to block up its entrance. So after much effort he got the consent of general Jacksona Evans to explore and conquer the rebels guarding the tunnel. Sailing north from the direction of the Porto Rico section of the Lu i Lucilla picket fortifications under cover of a dark and stormy night with a strong fleet of Angelinian merrimacks and gunboats, he fought his way through two gauntlets of guns and gained some considerable victories but rebel generals knowing through the means of spies his intentions opposed his advance by help of shore batteries, fleets and by the aid of fortresses and infantry that he could not sail up the river far, and after sailing up the coast for many miles setting great fires with his artillery store storm he returned after passing Fort Porto Rico. He however showed the enemy that christian generals would dare attempt anything.

CHAPTER TWENTY EIGHT.

and a grave within the mighty besieging christian lines a sho-coming

But the Angelinian gave no sign of fear. He hid his men in the outskirts of Sammaroa

A FATAL EXPEDITION.

Most of the explorers had sought however not a way to the secret tunnels, but to find the main straits elsewhere so as to cause them destruction. So many of the survivors who had succeeded in getting back to the christianlines with wonder full stories of what they had seen and heard that men and officers were now more eager than ever to try attempts almost as similar but of a different nature. They knew if the tunnels could be destroyed the rebels would be starved into a surrender.

Among these was captain Soto Hernandez. You remember he was with general Hanson at Evangelina Grania. From there he went back to general Hanson's command with great hope and honor. Hoping to find a means to locate the tunnels where the others had failed but by a route different than on the river he asked general Hanson to allow him to do so. He easily found numbers of men to join his company for this daring expedition through the enemy's territory.

There were sixty thousand men in all, among them many gay officers, a band of general Gomez's men, and all other daring soldiers. After reaching the region near Jennie's river general Soto planted a small plant late battery there and pressed on for Florida gun. Two days later he came near the coast of Sunbeam Creek. Very soon their troubles began. The journey was full of extreme danger. As the enemy had destroyed all traces of roads there were none, and the Angelinians had to make their way through thick woods and tangled underbrush in danger of being fired upon by many glandelinian snipers, and they had to press on by following trails. Even these trails often failed, and then they had to cross small rivers or creeks, and wade through swamps full of hostile foes who fired occasionally upon them, and they did not know where they would come out.

The poor soldiers also suffered from severe hunger for they had little meat and salt for their provisions were becoming exhausted and they had lost a number of men already. Then too they had to fight an unknown number of glandelinian snipers much most of the time, for from the start many rebels had appeared to oppose them for they hated christian soldiers bitterly.

After a while some of the Angelinians lost heart, and go begged him to please turn back, but he said desperately:

"We must go forward!"

In the course of his march he reached the region of a small glandelinian encampment belonging no doubt to a small force of rebels which had been out on a long scouting tour. Here the Angelinians and the rebels encountered each other suddenly had a bloody battle. It was one of the hardest infantry actions ever fought during an expedition of this kind. The Angelinians however were victorious and driving the foe away in confusion they set fire to all their tents, and by nightfall of the next following evening had killed all the fleeing glandelinians but three.

Two of these fell while fighting, and the last one unable to escape hanged himself with a long piece of a rope. The battle was a serious one for the Angelinians too. Many of them had been killed or wounded about three thousand and most of their clothing, supplies and even arms were burned. In fact they had to do all they possibly could to obtain means to continue the expedition. They were now in a pitiful condition, and the survivors longed to return to the main christian lines and friends. Again they begged their general to go back but he would not do so under any conditions. At last the Angelinians after pushing through in spite of a proposition from snipers and other rebel soldiers reached through a narrow river, and after crossing it under cover of darkness, and avoiding the glaring enemy searchlights, marched daringly along northward on its western bank, still searching for their goal.

The winter proving to be a severe one from the start was making the suffering of the soldiers greater than they could bear, and even their main leader now began to give up all hope. He decided to go to the main coast retreat to the opposite side and signal for aid. When he reached the mouth of the Sunbeam Creek, he went with a rebel chieftain he had captured, and here sick at heart, and weakened in body and ill with a cold, he was shot dead by a glandelinian sniper in the top of a willow tree. At first his followers buried his body in the forest and prepared to start for home but they feared that the fierce glandelinians might attack them if their leader's death became known. So they dug up the body, wrapped it in blankets and in the dark darkness of midnight stole cautiously down the sunbeam Creek and after three days toilsome traveling reached their comrades near Jennie's river half frozen and starved. The poor christian officer came to Jennie's river in his endeavor to find the secret tunnel. But he found was hunger, extreme hardship, disease and a grave within the mighty besieging christian lines a sad ending indeed.

Thus far nothing had been said about the work of brave Calverinian explorers. But the Calverinians were not going to be left out of the struggle for her freedom from glandelinian either. He too wanted to have the secret tunnels captured and destroyed so that Calverine would be cut off with communication with Vivian Wickey. Yet it was not until January 15th that a Calverinian general sent an explorer to find the northeastern tunnel. He named this bold and skilful seaportian was Antonio Cartierston. He sailed along the christian side of the river coast, passed into the gulf of Wickey Bay, and carried back to the Calverinian encampment an enormous number of child slaves he had secured and whose freedom he had gained at enormous cost of men and provisions. The following week he made another voyage this time up the Sunbeam River. He believed this river to pass through Andean which would lead him to the northeast of Vivian Wickey and turn the secret tunnels which he was seeking. He landed a troop at a small child slave plantation and seizing them fought off their masters and got away on board the ships with them safely. The children did not want the glandelinians up the river to know of the intentions so they told absurd stories of awful tempests of shot and shell hurled upon ships passing the fortresses, and islands of floating fortresses and merrimacs and other foe ships, but after land landing them safely he pushed on. On his way upstream he came to another but strongly guarded child slave plantation with a very steep hill fortified back of it. Here despite the efforts of their masters the child slaves flocked down to the shore screaming for assistance and begging to be taken away, all eager to escape the bondage and get back to their fathers and mothers if they were yet alive.

After they were set free by force they danced and sang, and brought gifts of fish and corn. After a strong force of Angelinians landed and drove the masters away from the scene the children all ragged and forlorn crowded about them, feeling in wonder of the soldiers purple uniforms, and touching their arms and sabres. After a brief stay they started back toward the christian lines with their third catch. On their way down the river they fell in with a foe fleet and in the engagement lost twenty five of their ships, but fortunately not one of the child slaves were on board of those, though the numbers of men killed or wounded was terrific. At one time during the conflict some of the elder children tried to care for the wounded. Five days later after this expedition he again tried desperately to either secure more child slaves and free them or find the secret tunnels but in both he failed.

After these gallant expeditions of so many brave christians had been so disgracefully and disasterously repulsed, the leaders of the expeditions especially those who had survived got from many places they had raided, a very great quantity of provisions, gold, silver, ammunition and many prisoners and rescued child slaves. General Hanson, Vivian himself had a very strong desire to crush the enemy at Andean, and bring that section of Vivian Wickey under his power if possible. When so many Angelinian and seamen were captured by the rebel gunboats and infantry, some were thrown into dark prisoners, some hanged as spies whether they were spies or not, and others burned to death at the stake.

You will not need to be told them that general Hanson, Vivian had come to have bitter hatred for all the glandelinians at Vivian Wickey, and no one hated the glandelinians more than general Jack Evans himself.

He was both a great christian general though he went under the title of "Colonel" and also was a great spy, and seaman, and could manage any ship, cannon and any seavary division necessary. Indeed since escaping from the foe when a child slave himself he had spent most of his life in the christian army, and for many days during the siege of Vivian Wickey had fought desperately against the besieged glandelinians, doing all he could to weaken the power of the many defenses of the fortresses of all sections of Vivian Wickey.

Seeing that his friends had failed in their expeditions, daring general as he was he did decide to make one himself, and find out the secret section of

He made his first voyage to the outer section of Andean where Vivian and her sisters were having their experiences in one day. While he was thus going forward to make an attempt to enter Andean by water, a large number of glandelinian dreadnaughts and gunboats suddenly swooped down upon them, took many prisoners in the conflict many amounts of ammunition, and destroyed all but two out of his hundred ships. Of course to meet such a disaster Jackson Evans was very angry. He became more bitter than ever against the glandelinians and began to lay plans to attack their settlements and other fortifications, and capture prisoners in return. On one of his other daring voyages he steamed to the Panama junction, and while there adding with a force of infantry he pushed across. On that day a number of child slaves he had rescued took him to the top of a very tall hill outside of Andean and from under the branches of a large and tall tree where he concealed himself from spotting eyes of thieves, he gazed upon the vast expanse of fortifications known as Fortresses Gertrude Angeline and "Phillip" on the opposite side of the river making a junction with "Andrew". He was the first Angelinian army officer or even private to look upon that great northwestern section of the "Vivian Wickey" fortress.

Two and wonder he fell upon his knees after climbing down from the tree and prayed that God would allow the christians to capture and capture Vivian Wickey as soon as possible for he knew that these fortresses and all the others in the hands of the rebels had been made by "billionaires" and was impossible to capture by assault.

It was several days before he could make another voyage to Andean. Then by the help of his generals, he got together a fleet of five wooden ships and disguised them as glandelinian merchant ships. To fool the enemy as to the real intention they were richly fitted out, and his table itself was set with dishes of gold and silver if you like, and he himself dressed in the richest glandelinian uniform that could be secured from rebel prisoners. . . . .

The first sail: "If you please to know, in the day of January Thirtieth, after being nearly two days out of sight of the dearly beloved christian lines, Jack Evans and his men reached the coast of Gloriaia.

Sailing along however on toward Andean, they met with so much severe resistance, and suffered such severe losses, that they were often forced to turn back, and nearly eighty of their vessels were lost. On the first of Feb. Feb. the number of ships that were left continued on into the river and began to move through Andean. Here for two long weeks they were tossed about at the very mercy of bombardments, and driven in many routes by the enemy fleet. They feared their ships being wooden might go to pieces, but as Evans was brave and skillful, they passed of what remained safely on. It was a time of trial and had heavy loss. One of the ships of men through cowardice deserted, and after a while six more were lost under a storm of cannon fire from Fortresses Silverbell which they encountered. Soon Evans had only one ship left out of his five hundred, the flagship which he called the "Jennie" runner, but he would not turn back now any how. After sailing through and almost out of Andean there was no more to be feared from the foe here, and going northward passing along the western coast, things began to look brighter now, for he began to find symptoms of what he was seeking.

In one river harbor of Andean he captured a foe ship loaded with wine, gold and provisions for the besieged, and in the main harbor called Elm a Harbor, he came upon a hundred transports lying at anchor, and took from them under cover of darkness everything of valuable means and set the ships on fire. But he did not stop long because he heard that a fleet of glandelinian gunboats was in pursuit. Eagerly he started swiftly on his retreat, promising a golden chain to the first man who would sight the first rebel gunboat and have her blown out of the water. The last one of his men saw her, and Evans realizing that no matter how hard he was trying it was impossible to escape the encounter he let go with broadsides and the gunboat fell back. He now began to think of making his way back to the christian lines by land. It did not seem possible to return the same way he had come because many rebel ships were laying in wait for him. For this reason he landed the men he had left and taking the provisions with him he set fire to the ship after removing the cannons and started his homeward march by land in deep snow. On his homeward journey he stopped at Jennie Vivian, and after several narrow escapes with the foe he reached his own army in the middle of Feb. Evans for this daring feat was treated with great honor. His expedition was completely successfully, made for he had discovered the tunnels but in his reports he declared that they were impossible to reach without hard fighting as immense forces guarded them at the mouths.

A GREAT EVENT EARLY DURING THE SIEGE. DURING THE MONTHS OF DECEMBER AND JANUARY.

One of the foremost Angelinians that was at the early part of the siege of Vivian Wickey was General Walter John Harrison. He was commissioned in the town of Sacramento Abbeonanda, in the southeastern part of Abbeonanda, near the border of the state of Goncentinia. He was a fine looking man and soldier, full of life and though being a real soldier and a general full of life and outdoor sports of any kind.

In his command lived many thousands of old soldiers, who could tell the bright wide awake general stirring tales of battles at sea near the Blengiglospan and Boy ding islands, and of hard fighting with the rebels near Jennie Irian. At the outbreak of the war when he was still a youth of twenty years, he immediately went to Sacramento Abissamin and became a soldier, and later when he joined the army of the gonsentinkians he went to the Abyssinkilian border to repel advances of the foe there and then was transferred into general Unions lines and received his commission.

A few days after he was sent to Vivian Wickey after his return from the Abyssinkilian border, he attracted the notice of Angelina Aronburg the little girl heroine of Angelina, by a simple act of courtesy. One day as the little girl heroine with her squad of boy and girl scouts was passing along on horseback, the general Walter Harrison happened to be on his horse who was standing by. On seeing her stop when she reached a small bridge, he quickly urged his horse forward and led her timid horse across the narrow bridge.

As a girl officer of the boy scouts and a good one this won her heart and made her a staunch friend of general Walter John Harrison, who soon during later parts of the war became one of the first best christian generals known.

He was, then a tall handsome man, with dark brown hair, a high color and dark blue eyes. He was dressed in a uniform of striking manner. On his big round hat he wore a pearl pearl covered band, and a large black plume docket with all pretty spots. His shoes also which were tied with white ribbons, were striking in appearance. In those days Angelinian generals dressed more brilliantly than even kings of our days. Although all the kings of this world were dressed most splendidly, yet the lowest christian officer which was a corporal outshone even them.

While general Walter John Harrison had an immense force, and much money and provisions he did not waste either. In fact he always knew how to manage any thing and how to spend money wisely for the christian cause. As the story goes on you will see that the Angelinians owed him much for what he did in preventing the enemy from ever succeeding in making a break in any of the besieging sections of the christian lines anywhere. Early in December he joined general Gilbert and John Johnny Anderson in an expedition to assault one of the foe forces fortresses made of wood called Fort Warfounder, and with the purpose of burning the fort down and break the rebel line in that section. But this plan failed.

Six hours later Harrison fitted out two disguised vessels which he sent down the Sunbeam Creek to find out something about the strength of some of the Vivian Wickey's Fortresses. On their return the men in charge of these vessels said they found the fortresses extending for miles, but that the child slaves were friendly and would be willing to give the christians any amount of information needed. General Harrison was so pleased with this report that he declared a new expedition must surely meet success.

The next few days general Harrison sent out a division of one thousand one hundred and eight men, with a fleet of ships. Admiral Granviller was commander of this small fleet, and general Ralph Laner was to command the army. The troops landed near Roanoke junction. From the first they were most unwise, because in their wild attempts to gain their goal they treated the glandelinians captured prisoners so hard harshly that even though prisoners they became dangerous in the extreme.

As the danger from hostile prisoners was not the only trouble the christian troops on this expedition had. Food became scarce and general Granviller had to send to the main christian lines for more. And he had to go in person to get it. While he was away general Laner started out to explore the region of Roanoke junction of which he had wonderful tales from the rescued child slaves.

This stream floweth through land where stands an old abandoned glandelinian fortress made of wood. They said. It stands on the edge of the stream and not far from it is a small plantation surrounded by a palisade. Here many child slaves are confined.

But Laner and the men who went with him found the way unapproachable on account of the hostility of foe snipers and cowardly resistance. That they did find, was fierce resistance, great hardships, and suffering from cold. Their food became so scarce that they had to eat squirrels and rabbits and dog flesh to keep themselves alive. When Laner returned all were sick at heart, the future looked so dark.

By this time Colonel Hanson broke, with twenty three gunboats, cast anchor near the junction. He had come from a small expedition up the sunbeam river where he had been plundering glandelinian encampments in the dark, and was on his way to the main christian lines. He agreed to leave plenty of food and a part of his fleet with the Angelinian regiment. But when a heavy overwhelming attack made by Glandelinians came upon them with severe fury, the survivors in their fear retreated, and began to return to the main christian lines, and so to save them from annihilation he sent his men to repel the attack, and took the survivors and their wounded on board.

They had found no way to accomplish their plan, but they took back to the main christian lines things of far more value. These were a hundred rescued child slaves, a good quantity of provisions, and ammunition and a number of rebel prisoners. Long before this little regiment had arrived back to the christian lines Granviller had returned to Roanoke junction with food and provisions. Finding no one there he retreated back down the river. Most men by this time would have been completely discouraged, but general Walter John Harrison was too strong and brave to give up so easily. Two days later, he made another attempt more desperate and more energetic. This time he sent general White Head with one hundred and fifty thousand men, seventeen generals, and eleven other high officers. This immense brigade landed at Roanoke but could not find anything there but smoking ruins. Like the first regiment of men in a short time this immense division had trouble with glandelinians and in one night fought nearly fifty severe engagements. Very soon also food became scarce, the their losses in killed and wounded in that one night was simply dreadful, and the survivors begged general Whitehead to go back to the main lines or sent men to take the main lines for more food provisions, and men. He did not wish to leave the brigade a landless. Neither did he like to say good bye to his best friend Gertrude Angelina who had accompanied him on this expedition. But he knew they must have food and so he was compelled to start and took some men and officers with him. Then later he found he must abandon this expedition also and ordered the full column to retreat.

Whitehead and his column reached the christian lines just as Admiral Thomas was preparing to meet the attack of an immense glandelinian fleet. To defend himself this Admiral needed every ship he could get together, so every vessel not acting in the siege or blockade was held for this great river fight. Almost three days went by before general Whitehead could return on another expedition to Roanoke junction, when he at last arrived, to try and rescue the colony of child slaves. Not a single person was left behind the enemy had withdrawn all to so the christians could not get them. He found only some chests of books, some maps, firearms and clothing belonging to the child slaves and nothing else in the abandoned plantation.

You may be sure he lost no time in investigation. He found some messages written on traces by child slaves but he could not understand the words. Whitehead therefore begged his officers to lead an assault against the foe position near by and rescue the children by force, but though the attacks were extremely stormy in wilderness they were useless and useless. That been so of the lost colony of child slaves no one had ever learned. Five times general Walter Harrison sent out great troops of men to look for it, but he never heard from it again. Not long afterwards it was found out that all the boys and girls had been transferred into general Gathorne beyond reach of the christian besiegers, and that very likely a number of them trying to escape were killed by the glandelinians.

For a time general Walter Harrison's work in Roanoke junction was completely over. Although he had failed to rescue the colony of child slaves he had accomplished something anyhow. He had thought the glandelinians that the Angelinians would attempt anything at any risk.

Several more days passed by after general Walter Harrison's attempt but came to such a end before any one tried again.

Then a group of officers, nobles, and son captives and spies, made another attempt to rescue child slaves but this attempt was planned to be made elsewhere. It was known that the more children freed the worse it would be for the enemy. They hoped that the lessening of the number of child slaves might make the enemy be reduced to desperation and finally abandon or surrender Vivian Wickey. As a beginning the general sent out a force of one hundred and five thousand men. Half of these went down by river on boats, and the others marched through the deep snow by land. But they were not the right kind of men to attempt this dangerous expedition. About half of these were men who had never seen through a rough life and when now were set to work to cut down trees and chop a way to make trails they fell it overwhelming. Their advance was slow and timid. The first action not a shot was fired. What laner and his men saw and hardships was the journey, and at the end went down the river and it took them four days to land near Roanoke junction, their food was almost gone. Laner had intended to land near Roanoke junction, where Harrison had attempted his expedition, but pursuing rebel fleets drove them out of their course, and they were compelled to enter another way into the river. From here they sailed up the beautiful Sunbeam Creek, five miles from the mouth of the river under cover of the dark and in full range of rebel guns on shore they landed and after looking cautiously about, picked out a place of shelter. They hid under the very eaves of the enemy there in a great deal to do. He first thing was to reach some sort of shelter before day light or before the searchlights of the enemy should reach them. So some of them quickly put up rude huts made of ravines covered with bark or dried turf, some made tents of old sails, and some merely dug deep holes in the ground.

This was one of the objects of the expedition to secure as many child slaves as possible. A far as attacks had been made upon these defenses, for five years or months I mean during the siege the rebels had not been attacked here but with this expedition reaching the scene a change was about to take place. Bertrude Angelline suggested the place be surrounded, and the men began at once to work for the conquest of the defenses. The plan was to surround the plantation in the woods and that all the settlements were to be attacked at the same hour. The plan was to disguise all the men as glanolinians and to pretend to be "landolinians" and first make a free pretended friendly visit to the rebel garrison there. At the time when all the soldiers were to pretend only to be friendly. At the morning before the outbreak came the soldiers to make it seem even less suspicious carried provisions to the fortress, and sat down as friends at the tables of the rebels. At which the hour came the Angellians set upon them, and shooting down or striking dead every glanolinian that resists resisted took many prisoners in field, shop, or even at the breakfast tables where they had been eating as guests before the day had closed they had slain over four hundred rebels, and captured 20,000 glanolinians as prisoners, and left some seventy glanolinian plantations without a living soul upon them rescuing and taking possession of all the surprised but now happy children, here cannot hardly a plantation where all had not been rescued, and other glanolinian troops in the vicinity feeling angry at such daring success in their night and for a time tried to break up the expedition to rescue their comrades, rebuke the children and driving the christians out of the woods, but in being victorious the Angellians hunted down the fleeing glanolinians like wild beasts, killing and wounding them by hundreds.

The children were taken to the river and transferred on the fleet for safety. During the continuation of the expedition it began to prove to be a most terrible journey. After day heavy attacks were made upon the Angellians by rebarbative swarms at them through the woods to dispute their advance, and for every battle the christians were badly torn, and at times it seemed as if the christians would be annihilated in the great Red Riding Hood Woods. Every day of the Angellian officers must have been humbled for the safe though simple life that had left a behind before entering the army to help suppress the bloody rebellions.

In spite of many desperate attacks from the enemy however, they managed to defeat the desperate desperados of the rebels every time. What thoughts must have come to these many scores of thousands of brave men as they continued to plough on through the woods. Now tired and lonely they must have felt, yet a house or a friendly human being in sight but in the far distance many hostile encampments and growling batteries on distant hills. And only said hi, hi, and green and dreary stretches of deep snow. And sometimes during the advance and even fired at by snipers the men had to wade half frozen streams and swamps, and the weather was so bitter cold that their wet clothing soon stiffened with ice.

During the expedition one of the christian officers during another skirmish with the enemy had a very queer accident. As he was picking his way through the underbrush in pursuit of the rebels he was suddenly jerked upward and held dangling by one leg in midair. His foot had been caught in one of a series of traps set by rebels to catch occupying child slaves, and of course he was quickly set free, very likely when he was safe on his feet again, all joined in a very good he laughs.

The next day indeed was bitterly cold and a snowstorm was raging. While they were marching close to the banks of the mighty Noron river the spray of the ice and waves blown by the gale of wind from ice upon the snow clothing or uniforms. As they bravely went forward. Then it grew dark they secured an abandoned enemy's encampment of small size, and to protect themselves against the enemy and to keep from freezing they built in one single night a huge pile of logs, sticks and boughs five or six feet high and half a mile long, and inside kept a very huge fire burning with their army cloaks wrapped about them and their feet turned toward the fire, all but the watchful sentries lay down to sleep. The great trees of the forest were their only shelter through winter nights. On the second morning before daylight all were again alert, some preparing breakfast for the great number of men, and others putting the supplies in the wagon train. Suddenly a strange cry made every one stop to listen. It was the "Devil Yell" of the glanolinians.

Then a shower of bullets flew past the heads of Angellians and a number of them fell, or a time if you please the fighting went on briskly. Then when Captain Hannish wounded the leader of the beautiful rebels they quickly fled. This was the height of a day full of dangers. Late in the afternoon amid the furious storm of snow another attack by force was made. They were in great peril and found it hard to proceed forward. Just before dark a big wave of glanolinians away almost around the first column of christians defeating themselves as boldly but through a portion of their number were sent away they finally defeated the foe and a grenade thrown by an Angellian struck a tree as it exploded snapping it in two and the tree fell. Upon a number of the glanolinians killing and wounding them. During the last night when they were forced to halt again on account of the storm itself any one could have seen nearly 10,000 busy boys and men, many chopping or blasting down trees, others sawing trunks into logs of proper length and still others dragging the long pointed at the ends where they were to be used. They were building an abatis. All this was done by hand, for we must remember this too troops on the expedition had brought no horses except those drawing the wagons and these were not enough. While the men and boy soldiers were getting up a big appetite the rescued child slaves thus retained with the soldiers willingly were busy kindling small bonfires, cooking supper and doing the many things that need to be done to help the soldiers who had saved them from bondage among the enemy. It took many hours for the soldiers to form the abatis and two rows were made but the night was quiet and no foes attacked.

During most of the expedition their food was very plain, and there was none too much of it. Bread, made of wheat, rye or barley was about all they had. Once in a while when some one killed a deer or two or a number of wild fowl did they have any meat to eat and some times they captured chickens and cows from the enemy. Cold water too and a little brandy was all they had to drink. If you please to mention, they must have thought how good the milk which they used to have in the morning. Men in christians lines would taste it all year long but besides having too little food, and that not very good, the brave Angellians and even the child slaves who had been set free suffered much from the cold, scant food and a lack of clothing with many other hardships caused more suffering than was deserved for such a brave brigade of christian soldiers. One time only Colonel Brown, Captain Starnard and some of their other officers and even generals were well enough to take care of those taken sick with severe colds or half frozen. The generals and officers who were very kind and gentle in sickness and hardships such as this, made excellent nurses. Even the officers and generals cheerfully helped with the cooking, washing and other duties and saw to it the children were clothed as much as possible.

At times there was a death among the poor children every day but yet in spite of all this suffering not one would give up the expedition until told to do so. Although they were in constant dread of further attacks from roving bands of glanolinians it was nearly three more days before even a single glanolinian showed himself in the woods.

Then one day while hunting in the woods a dusky uniformed stranger was seen approaching the snow encamped christian troops.

His first words were "Welcome Angellians" "Reinforcements are coming to you. General Hanson wants you to succeed in this expedition and rescue as many child slaves as possible."

A few hours later he returned with another column of troops under general Squanto Herman. This new officer was glad to see his many friends once more. He liked the Angellians so well that he was willing to go through any peril with them. General Willan had sent out to meet the new officers and escorts and the troops to the new encampment. This was an important meeting. The Angellians spread upon the floor of the largest tent a great green mat, and covered it with cushions for the general and other officers to sit at upon. And the beating of drum, the screen of bugles and the firing of muskets and the blowing of trumpets the new general was brought into the room where he met the general of the expedition. The two generals agreed to stay together until the end of the expedition. With the army of the reinforcements now came much easier times for a short while at least. The army had brought much barley, plenty of wild duck, geese, wild turkey, and deer, which they had brought down with their guns.

On the same day that this meeting occurred an Angellian spy ran through the camp and brought to the general a note he had captured from the enemy. "What does this note mean?" The general asked general Squanto who could understand any mysterious code.

"It means that the enemy are going to resist our expedition as desperately as possible."

As they now had decided to remain here for a few days the Angellians had taken possession of a long line of palisade posts twenty feet high which had been set deep in the ground and pointed sharp at the top. Also not far from them was an old abandoned blockhouse of houses also, and a thick walled building a mile long with holes out of which to fire guns and cannon.

And in spite of all this they soon found hardship and the other miseries returning. The coarse food did not agree with them. Corn bread, bad and too cold drinking water, and poor shelter had made many ill before the twenty of December two hundred had died of hardships alone and yet nobody thought of giving up the expedition. Many of the soldiers to keep from freezing carried axes to chop wood and make fires. Many times during the advance when there was not enough tents the shelter many soldiers only had was a hollow tree, or perhaps a covering of brush and heat of bonfires.

Indeed the many child slaves who had been with the Angellians so long now as there had been no return of the ships, must have been very tired sometimes, but they must have had their frolics too. We must imagine them gathering and making snowballs to throw at each other or the soldiers, and listening to the sparrows, and all eating their meals as if on a picnic, under leafless branches of spreading trees.

The men carried their packs on their backs and guns in their hands. There were no roads just now nor even trails or of foot or wild beasts to follow through this foe infested wild region near Vivian Wickey. For many of the soldiers a compass was their only guides on their long perilous journey of which they had already covered more than fifty miles southward.

Finally as the expedition was about to continue a small band of rebels who had been out scouting stole some provisions from the Christians and a company of soldiers was sent forward to punish the encampment to which the rebel raiders belonged. It was a time of much terror and bloodshed and when it came to an end toward nightfall sixteen hundred Glandelinians, and seventeen hundred Angelinians had been killed and twice that many wounded. In this fight the Angelinians captured another small river fortress and then demanded the surrender of the encampment on the following morning.

This was a complete surprise to the Glandelinians but although the expedition force of Christians was much larger than the foe in this little encampment the Glandelinian general brave old soldier that he was begged his soldiers to fight again desperately for the encampment.

"I would even go down to my grave," he cried out in a rage as he stamped the floor of his tent with his left leg. "Rather than give up to the Christian dogs." "Read the notice the Christian general has sent you and find out our own want he demands," said one of his officers. This only made him more angry, and he tore it into bits and threw it into the camp fire. But after more desperate fighting he absolutely had to give up. The Glandelinian flag was pulled down, and the Angelinian flag waved in its place.

The story of this grandest of expeditions toward any point of beleaguered Vivian Wickey made a stir among the many Angelinian divisions. Already on account of general Hanson's arrival, and the arrival of General Antonburg's armies the Angelinians had full control of the full stretch of Gunbeam Creek. If they now could get control of Battery Line River as also they might build up a new line of besieging fortifications, and would be able to pour vast columns of troops upon the enemy works. So do this the they hoped the expedition then being made would bring great success, and so their third leader being wounded General Lasalle was placed in command and more troops were sent to reinforce them by river and land. The new leader was only thirty three years old when he took command. He too had had hopes of accomplishing wonders to the very finish of the expeditions, but meanwhile there were two great plans which he wished to have carried out.

One was to see to it that a chain of fortresses would be built along the Gunbeam Creek, and down a portion of the Norma Gun River, and the other was to concentrate an immense Christian force supported by fortified works and batteries and a number of new fortresses at the mouth of the Gunbeam Creek. After long and careful planning, the expedition was resumed, while he ordered the fleet which was accompanying the army to carry the rest of the army through the river on their way to the mouth of the Gunbeam Creek their goal. They resumed the advance on December 29th. The advance and voyage together was a stormy one not with elements but with the enemy resisting them, but they reached Green Bay Junction on the morning. Here General Lasalle secured a large quantity of furs which had been seized from a captured enemy's wagon train. At waiting for the advance of the first fleet, General Lasalle with fourteen thousand men, went ahead on his journey with the other portion of the army on the ships following. They advanced southwestward as far as St. Joseph's River which ran into the Gunbeam River. Stopping here for a brief period they secured an old abandoned wooden fortress, and then setting it on fire so it could be of no further use to the enemy they went on to the Sun Supreme Junction where they came upon another abandoned wooden fortress and set it also on fire after finding nothing of value in it of any value. All this time General Lasalle was expecting good news of his fleets which were following. As day after day passed he grew anxious, and finally gave up hope. Indeed he never heard from the fleets again. They had encountered the full fire of portage Gertrude Angeline and all the ships were either battered or sunk and captured. He must have ships so he planned to continue his journey and if possible raid and secure a number of enemy ships. It was however being a terrible journey, sometimes the deepest part of all the streams were frozen, and they had to plough through snow two feet deep. At other times during a general warm wave the ice was so melted that it was not thick enough to bear their weight, but too thick for them to break a passage for their boats and canoes which then had to be carried on the men's shoulders through the gloomy Red Riding Hood Woods.

When they finally reached the main stretch of St. Anne Creek they struck out across the country. The woods were thick and full of danger and many times rebel snipers fired upon them causing great loss in men and officers. Thorne underbrush tore their clothing into shreds, and cut their faces and hands. For three days they endured great suffering. The rapid journey of two more days brought them to a marshy country.

It was most anxious moment. If the poor general would have stayed out of the battle, and still if the Christian fleets could not stop the running of the blood, he would have been allowed to seize all the treasure and other things.

It was a most anxious month. If the governor general would have stayed out of the battle, the poor general would have been able to stop the running of the black fleets could not stop the running of the black fleets. He allowed to seize all the forts and fortresses.

One night they took off their drenching clothing, and wrapping themselves in blankets in ten below zero weather slept on a dry hill in a strong encampment made by themselves. But in the morning they had to build a hot fire or many of them so all the soldiers could thaw their frozen clothes, before they could put them on. For over a month this painful journey had already lasted. Yet the ending of the December month did not bring the end of their journey and they had not reached their goal yet, and neither did their troubles end. When he got to Illinois Junction with fresh supplies which he had secured from a raid on the enemy, he could find neither the fortresses nor any men he had expected to find there. So again he had to make a halt, then in spite of all discouragements he started out once more saying:

"We will go on even if we have to go on through swamps and through hell!" His remaining little fleet of only wooden ships armed with guns made a picture far different from the main Christian warships which were of iron and steel and looked like American warships only larger and longer and more heavily armed. He had wished to secure big gunboats and dreadnaughts but could not obtain them. After some days he reached Green Bay Junction, and here in the Name of Heaven and The Sacred Heart he planted a column and a cross, and declared that he would push on even at the cost of his own life. General Lasalle had carried out the first part of his plan, the capture of enemy fortresses and trading posts along his line of march. Now it remained to push on to his goal at the mouth of Sunbeam Creek. To get help for this, he had to send to the main Christian lines. His plan met with favor there, and with men and supplies another force of troops came to his aid. But despite all this new trouble awaited him....

CHAPTER TWENTY NINE.

THE FATAL ENDING OF THE EXPEDITION.

His troops missed the mouth of the Sunbeam River and a force of his troops from the boats which landed some four hundred miles to the west of it met annihilation as they encountered a foe shore battery. Here he secured a small palisade fort. When trials came thick and fast. For lack of food and provisions, many of his men became sick, and a large number died of wounds. He was the only one who did not lose heart. Day after day he had kept on looking for main help from the Christian army but on account of the watchfulness of the rebel generals it did not come. For nearly two weeks he had fought like a hero with dangers and great hardships. Most of the men on account of the frequency of the enemy's attack were becoming discouraged and afraid. Many were deserting, and to the rest the forest meant disease, famine, foe snipers, wild beasts such as wolves and cold weather too intense to bear. And gladiolins snipers were doing their utmost to murder the heroic Christian leader, and one morning as the advance was about to resume a sniper finally shot him dead. Such was the end of one of the bravest and boldest of Christian generals.

While this force of Angelinians were exploring the foe country, the enemy generals were planting great forces of troops in the woods along the Atlantic run from Sunbeam Creek to Green Bay, and these had been mustered in such strength as to carry the war so far as to break up this expedition. The Christians were finally halted before they ever got to the mouth of the Sunbeam River and there now began such disastrous fighting between the two Angelinian forces, one wearing red purple and the other gray. General Hooker Thompson and there was a fierce battle with the gladiolins under general Pequot. At the beginning of the contest a withering fire along the Christian line killed two rebel generals and this aroused the enemy to greater fury. At night the enemy carried a work on the right capturing many child prisoners, and murder all the children they had laid began to torture all the men prisoners, and the main rebel force realized their hands on. They killed over thirty children, and the main rebel force realized that they must either break up the expedition at any cost or leave the woods. So general Pequot prepared at once to send a body of men against one of the fortresses a certain section of the Christian troops held. A portion of the foe troop went down by ships on the river along the east coast and landed near the mouth of the Extreme River. The others pushed on through the woods in great numbers. There they pitched their tents for the night. Before daybreak the next morning they advanced slowly and silently upon the Angelinians at that portion where all were awake in their stronghold and prepared. This was a village of small forts of wood surrounded by a palisade ten or twelve feet high, having only one door just wide enough for three men to pass through.

The first alarm was the bugles the shots of the sentries the barking of dogs, and the cries of children. Quickly many landolinians with loud yells hurried to the openings to prevent the Angolinians inside from escaping. Many climbed or rushed into the fort and others threw fire brands among the small house forts from the outside and soon set them on fire. The Angolinians fought bravely and desperately but in vain. Many were burned alive in that mile wide inferno and thousands of others were killed as they rushed to the gate or jumped over the palisades. Out of five thousand christians here only fourteen survived, a of whom one was captured. The others with the children miraculously escaped.

The remaining body of Angolinians however were apprised to this disaster but fell back to better shelter and for a time did not have any further serious trouble from the rebels. Then the very able glandolinian general made a last and most mighty and desperate effort to free the Red Riding Hood of these troops which had made the expedition. His same general who afterwards fought the battle of Sunbeam Junction opened the general attack upon the expedition early in January on the little fort of Swansear a group of fourty small blockhouses surrounded by palisades not far from his positions. At the beginning of the attack a band of rebel raiders stole into one of the forts and set fire to two buildings. Then they killed, women and children, and drove a off cattle and captured provisions and a wagon train. During the following night another place was set upon by the rebels and many buildings and forts were burned. This thoroughly aroused the Angolinians. Very one of the Angolinians realizing their danger fought fiercely but were getting the worse of it. Some wooden forts were laid waste, and without food many of the Angolinians literally lost courage and either left the ranks or gave up.

In an effort to bring the terrific strife to an end general Clurecher of the rebels was put at the head of an immense force of wig-pollstinians. From that time general Thompsonas separate bands of christian soldiers was hunted from one hiding place to another, until at last he made his way with his biggest force to Mount Zion, in the sunbeam creek swamp. Here general Clurecher in a desperate fight raging all day in which three thousand were slain on both sides defeated the christians but lost his own life, and the glandolinians taking many prisoners realized the situation. General Thompsonas came near losing his own life.

"My heart breaks for the expedition has met with terrible disaster," He cried in bitterness. Now I am ready to die. "He escaped with the remainder of his big force however and found shelter in one of the abandoned camps he had occupied once before. But the Angolinians followed close upon him, and with the forces surrounded the camp. The Angolinians for one hour again fought desperately, and while retreating general Thompsonas tried to get away but was shot dead. This put an end to another brave christian officer, and already twelve or thirteen of the small wooden fortresses had been destroyed, and in this fight in the encampment one thousand Angolinians had been slain.

On the following night a force of glandolinians appeared to be stealing through the forest of Red Riding Hood, and waiting for the orders of their leaders attacked other villages of small forts held by the remaining christians, and so furious was the enemy now that they either killed the Angolinians outright or tortured them to death, and took many prisoners. One of the fiercest of these attacks was made upon colonel Schenectady's army and picture to yourself the scene. A tall thirty foot palisade surrounded the small town of fortresses in the woods, but as most of the Angolinians had not expected the attack, as none of the sentries were able to give the alarm from being killed or captured, most of them were asleep. The enemy had quietly disposed of the sentinels at the gate, which in fact were not even closed. It was a little before midnight, when a party of Omarians and wig-pollstinians were stealing a quietly upon the fortification, stopping every now and then to listen. One of the rebels entered one of the gates and silently filed about the little village of fortifications until they entirely surrounded it. Then suddenly their "Devil Yell" rang out, and the glandolinians began their deadly work. In a few minutes the small village of forts were on fire. Out of the soldiers who resisted desperately killing many foes were either slaughtered or made prisoners. The rest of the soldiers with as many children as could get away with but little clothing fled through the raging snowstorm to the main portion of the christian encampment in the woods seventeen miles away, twenty five hundred died on the way from cold and hardship or being shot down by rebel snipers. What a night of terror in those Red Riding Hood woods. Other fierce attacks followed. Seven minutes later a force of glandolinians attacked general Haverhill's troops, and four thousand and two hundred and forty of the Angolinians were killed and thirty others captured, and nearly nine hundred were burned to death including a number of unfortunate child slaves. Then the glandolinians began the attack by advancing and firing general gunstun was riding on horseback from Haverhill's division to his own command outside the lines. On seeing the advance of the Angolinian rebels and hearing the heavy firing, he hurried back to his command to repel the attack, and save his rescued child slaves even at the cost of his life.

It was a most famous battle. The poor general would have to pay out of the battle, and still if the christian fleets could not stop the running of the blood, he would be obliged to seize all the land and other property of the rebels.

"Boys he "He cried to his troops on reaching them. "Run the children for their lives to the fortress. The rest of us will hold back the rebels." They obeyed the order and he and the other troops kept themselves between them and the advancing glandolinians until they were safely within. His own wife and little girl however could not escape. They and even the red cross nurses were taken prisoners and put in charge of a number of child slaves, two boys, and seven girls. The glandolinians killed the baby girl, and then forced the rest to march with them with the rest of the foe division. After twenty four hours of marching the party came to a halt not far from colonel Alwynskilian boy was also a captive. He had been held with the glandolinians long enough to know their manner and ways, and heard them say that on the morrow they would torture the two women. But while the glandolinians attacked the other section of the christian force the two women and the boy and child slaves made up their minds to make an escape at what ever risk. So while the main force of glandolinians rushed against the christian line, the two women and the boys and even little girls seizing the bayonets from the halters of the rebels killed them all and escaped by paddling their way down the sunbeam Creek in a canoe they secured, and got back to the christian lines not far from it and told of the horror going on in the woods.

In the morning the glandolinians came upon the christian soldiers under Colonel Pearfielder. In the attacking force were twenty thousand and two hundred and fifty glandolinians. As it is being such a cold and snowy night, the attack was a unalied success but most of these christians in retreating steadily had got to the palisades and as they had made during the advance of their expedition, and great snow drifts had been turned into snowforts too high to climb over easily. Though ten thousand of the glandolinians scaled the long snowforts and got into a portion of the christian encampment and burned many tents and houses and killed and wounded many Angolinians their losses were becoming exceedingly dreadful, and when the assault was repulsed with still further loss the Angolinians had captured one thousand one hundred and twelve glandolinians and one general as prisoners and seized the dead rebels to use as parapets on top of the snowforts. General Johnston William pearfield and his orderly were the prisoners. The glandolinian general orderly was not strong, and by the second day he was unable to keep up with the hardships of being made a prisoner by the victorious christians at this point. Finally to end his sorrow the fool committed suicide. About twenty glandolinians had also attempted to make an escape but were shot down. General williams was sent to general Montra montreal's command where he remained a captive for the full duration of the war as he could not get an exchange.

Many other attempts during that night had been made by the enemy to carry the snow fort and abatis but met a murderous fire every time and during the first three assaults of the enemy the fighting was terrible and the front of the works was thickly strewn with fallen rebels. There was still another and more greater assault in which the works were almost carried. No need need be told of the great results of the fighting but it ended in favor of the christians and so what remained of the christian force finally burned down everything they had builded and abandoning the expedition fled from the woods and made a long tiresome harassed retreat to the main christian lines, where a concentration of more troops drove the enemy to a stand still. At long after this came the battle of sunbeam Junction and the whole Red Riding Hood Woods was soon cleared of the rebels.

WHY IS IT SO HARD TO CAPTURE ENEMY POSITIONS NEAR VIVIAN WILKIN?

WE have seen already however during the siege so far as it goes how the Angolinian in their efforts to not only extend the siege but increase its pressure had planted many fortresses of their own along every river and branch in their own possession, many strong fortified encampments, batteries and thousands of strongly fortified breastworks armed with batteries, and also bul build great fortresses along the portion of the norma river in their possession, and all around Lake Angeline's southwestern and eastern shore also in their possession and had great great floating fortresses on the lake as well as on Lake A Mic-Holster and Wickey Bay. They had other forts along the Angoline and great fortified positions and fortified encampments. Everything they had even encampments was hastily being guarded by fourty foot palisades hastily constructed or under construction.

So they had control of all the river valleys near Vivian Wickey and of three most important lakes and other rivers. The Angolinians had also secured a portion of the norma Junction river but the enemy still held it, and the portion of sunbeam Creek valued latterly line river by the rebels.

In order now to make good their positions the Angolinians under General Hanson Vivian was forming companies of great batteries of largest cannon, and began to concentrate new forces to occupy all the land thus seized from the enemy during the recent conflicts.

General Hanson's army making preparations to storm fortress Auradocallio had hastened to put up more palisaded forts in the region of Red Riding Hood woods which one quarter of general Hanson's army was now beginning to take possession of. One of their great forts was quite near the place where Jennie Ivian stands. Two others were further a long along near the distant foe fortress called the "T" Maine Fortifications.

In order to make a good route toward fortress Auradocallio general Hanson Ivian sent a messenger to find out what the main rebel armies were doing, to see what any of their movements might mean, but he also warned the messenger not to go into foe line and spy but only to scout outside the lines. The person chosen to do this was an orderly of general Jackson Evans. Finally general Jack Evans decided to accompany the orderly and help him through the difficulties and despite all protests from his men and best friends he went off on the mission with the orderly.

These written accounts also occurred before the battle of Norma Fossinia and even before Highburg Landing. General Jackson Evans who was known by Violet and her sisters as captain Jack or colonel Jack Evans was born in Abbeonnia in the city of Pandor on the month of December a day before Christmas and was the son of a rich Abbeonnian planter whose lands lay along the Kruidin river. At an early age he had been kidnapped by the glandelinians, and was sent to a landelinian child slave mill in Calverine, where besides working hard he managed on the sly to learn a little writing, and arithmetic and ciphering. That does not of course seem a great deal to us but it was a good beginning as he had no chance to go to school whatever. Despite being a child slave he was different from other slaves. He was rebellious most of the time, and when he despite all the hardships he endured grew to be a man of ten years old he made even then many a landelinian overseer and even his owners so afraid of him that he was sold frequently. In many cases despite his toilsome life he grew strong and hearty, had great fun at all kinds of boyish sports, such as running, leaping, jumping and wrestling, and he easily led in them, for despite his hard life he grew strong and rugged, and always played fair. He led the boy slaves not only in sports but also in thousands of other ways, and he was often called upon to settle disputes, nobody ever doubted his word not even his masters, for he was always truthful either on promises or even threats. What he said he would do he simply did and no mistake at that. He told his last master one day that he would soon be free. His master laughed at him and said:

"Yes when you go to the grave."

He was a very careful boy despite his bravery and neat about all of his work. He had the same motto as Washington, and he did all well even for his masters. When he grew up and fought his way to freedom during a child slave rebellion among the slaves themselves he was still fond of outdoor sports. He loved the woods and the fields, and a good gallop on horseback. He finally took up a position in a hospital in Abbeonnia and before the war became known to Violet and her sisters. He later entered a military academy and later when war broke out got the commission of a general and took command of a vast christian army and proved at the state to be a terror to the rebels. At the time of the siege of Ivian's key he had his headquarters at Mt. Vermoria, and near by was Hanson Ivian's headquarters. This tall stout handsome kindly and uniformed general had taken a great liking to the strong young Abbeonnian general who even then was only sixteen years old, and during the siege the two great generals had never been separated once.

They often spent the mornings and other times of the day in any kind of rough weather scouting and reconnoitering, and the evenings watching the concentrations of artillery and troops to various portions of the battlefields of sieges. He more general Hanson Ivian learned to know young general Jackson Evans the more he trusted him. He was the youngest general ever receiving a commission and proved later on to be one of the ablest christian generals despite his young age next to general Hanson Ivian himself.

General Jackson Evans was at this time of the siege barely sixteen years of age. Yet when he volunteered to go on the scout with his younger companion, both started out on horseback just before the outbreak of the battle of Highburg Landing. They carried rifles and two pistols, the pistols to use against the foe in case of pursuit, and the rifles to kill game for while they were away from the christian lines on this long journey they would have to depend mainly that terrible winter upon hunting for their supply of food. General Jackson Evans found his journey gives many pictures. Now we could see him and his companions riding along through the unbroken Red Riding Hood Forest with no path, not even a trail as the enemy prevented trails being made. When we could see them spending the night in a cave for shelter or a abandoned shanty or house, with nothing but a mat of straw for a bed and a single blanket for covering. Again they are compelled to make a large fire and each had to be his own cook. Their spits were forked sticks or branches of wood, and their plates had to be large chips.

There were many dangers and hardships enough to make a less stronger person abandon the expedition but in meeting them general Evans was becoming more and more manly and learning things which as a leader of men he had to know.

It was a most anxious moment. If the governor general Evans had not been so sure of the result, the poor general would have stayed out of the battle. If the christian fleets could not stop the running of the blockade, if the christian army be allowed to seize all the sea and shore, then the rebellion would be a success.

He was coming close to the distant hostile landelinian encampments, and learning to understand them more and more. He was also now becoming better known to the men of his own army, who were going to meet him in the future. One of those who were always watching him was governor general Robert Ivian the brother of Hanson Ivian. Now can the dear readers guess why some weeks after he returned from his trip general Evans was the one picked out to bear the brunt of some of the fiercest and most terrible battles of the rebellion.

It was already late Autumn snow was on the ground and Evans was already on a work on that dangerous journey to the gunboat valley. With only seven teen companions he had set out through the thick woods, and did all possible to avoid being seen by rebel scouting parties. They even had to push through the deepest snows in the midst of heavy storms and winds. Many times there were not even the slightest trail or roadway seen, nor the paths of wild beasts to guide them, in fact so many terrific battles had cleared a way out of the forests. It was late October when they came within sight of one of the foe fortresses about fifteen miles south of Lake Angelina. General Evans arranged to capture a rebel scout and forced him at the threat of being shot to tell something about the foe positions and then with the companions and the prisoner started back home toward the main christian lines. On the way they passed through still more dangers. Twenty times a sneaking landelinian sniper shot at Evans, and always came near killing him. At other times he or his companions had narrow escapes from drowning, for the gunboat river, which is or his companions had broken up into great blocks of ice. There was but one thing to do. Taking turns with the only hatchets they had and spent a day in making a strong raft. During this work two of them were shot and wounded by rebel snipers. Soon they launched it. The swirling blocks of ice lunged at their craft, and every time it seemed as if it must go under. Once Evans fell slipped and he went into the river but managed to swim to the raft and get aboard without help but his clothing froze to his body. It was one of the most desperate moments when a rebel gunboat pursued and fired upon the raft, and when a shore battery shot at them but they escaped without disaster. At last after being pursued for fifty miles they at last touched the shore on the christian section. The night was bitter cold, but they did not dare to build a fire for fear of being seen. Landelinians, when no morning came the hands and feet of all of Evans men were frozen and the prisoner had escaped. Now they must have suffered. Evans felt miserable with his frozen clothing to his body and he afterwards had a severe chill and cold. Finally after an absence of nearly two and one third of a month they reached the christian lines, but the answer which general Jack Evans brought made it plain that it would take desperate fighting to take the Norma river from the possession of the foe.

THE DESPERATE FIGHTS AND BATTLES BETWEEN OCTOBER AND JANUARY.

AT ONCE THE SECTION CALLED THE ANGELINIAN COMPANIES sent out a large force of men to build another fortress at a place called Highburg Junction where two great rivers united to form the Norma river. Shortly after general Jackson Evans was sent with a body of soldiers just a little before his expedition to defend it. But before it could be built, landelinian troops came down from Norma in gunboats and later heavy shelling drove away the few workmen and soldiers. The landelinians calmly finished the fortress itself and called it Dacanna. Then a large body of landelinian soldiers advanced to meet general Jackson Evans, defeated him in a battle at Greenburg Meadows in two days conflict and forced him to march back to the main christian line in two lines. The christian loss in this two days contest was sixteen thousand five hundred and sixty four in killed and wounded, and 10,000 in eighteen thousand in killed and thirty five thousand in wounded and 10,000 in prisoners. Evans lost no one in prisoners. A dearly bought victory for the enemy.

This was on the fourth of October if you please. He struggle to decide who should retain possession of Norma, and soon grew into a war within a war near Ivian's key itself, which would decide who should capture or retain Ivian's key. As you remember the Angelinians had made many concentrations along the river fronts, while most of the rebels still held all their inner positions. Here were fifteen times as many christian earthworks and fortified positions as there were rebel positions, but the Angelinian besiegers were working only in loose groups, while the landelinians were altogether some sort of unit very much needed among the vast christian armies.

Knowing the character of the most tremendous siege the world ever saw general Hanson worked out a plan to unite all the christian armies into one. He saw clearly that the Angelinian besieging armies would be much stronger if they would work together, and so proposed in October a little before Halloween a plan of uniting

This was a step toward the union which the Christian armies made later in the final struggle against the besieged. But early in the siege the many generals had not been far seeing enough to go get together and ward off the enemy troops. So the early part of the siege was pressed and fought out by the different armies, in five different parts of the siege.

THE BATTLE OF DUGANNIA.

On the day of Seventh of October general Hanson Vivian decided to make a movement against the foe as soon as his forces were established in the siege. General Hanson with a large number of Angolinian regiments and brigades came up to Norma gun and made plans to march against a portion of fortress Marcoussin. He invited general Jackson Evans to be one of his aiding generals. Hanson's task was indeed a hard one, he had to cut a road through a section of Red Riding Hood Forest much of the way, and at the same time fight scattered bodies of the rebels. He was used to making war in open fields, but of this woodland fighting he had at first knew nothing. General Evans warned him to be on the lookout of the way of the fighting the Glandelinians did in wooded country, but at this time poor unfortunate Hanson Vivian thought he knew more about the business of war than young Evans, and he paid no attention to this fair warning. After many tedious days of marching and fighting in the skinnish day and night by fifties, at last when within eight miles of fortress Gertrude Angeline itself, they came upon Dugannia Creek and here had a tremendous battle on the evening and night of Halloween itself.

First they suddenly saw a scene as of Halloween pranks among strange men. Some dressed like ghosts, hobgoblins and so on. A striking sight of the Christian armies one of the men turned and yelling waved his hat. At once a strong body of Glandelinian and Omerian soldiers dashed out from underbrush and retreated to a long line of snailents and fortified works defended by a strong battery and abatis, and a hellish devil yell went up. Then as suddenly as they had come the enemy vanished behind their works. They had run back and other rebel troops hiding behind shrubbery, rocks, and trees and bushes, and now forts repelled one Christian charge and shot down the Angolinians by the hundred thousand in three hours. Twenty charges were made that night but general Hanson's best men could only rush blindly into the forests and charge the snow forts and other works in vain. They could not secure a single position. After two more days and nights of sanguinary fighting the Angolinian troops became so stricken as to force once upon their flank, and in the retreat the Angolinians threw their guns away and fled for their lives. General Hanson received four wounds but fought desperately and bravely. He received two wounds and lost ten horses which were shot under him and forty bullets tore through his clothing, and he was wounded in the hand and shoulder. In the whole battle seven hundred thousand men on the Christian side were either killed or wounded, among general Hanson Vivian receiving a sixth wound and was borne from the scene of carnage by general Evans himself. The enemy loss was nearly a million in killed and wounded. The defeat was a terrible one to the Christians, but a dearly bought victory for the enemy. If Evans who had been compelled to assume command in Hanson's place had not managed under great difficulties to get the army back safely it would have been even worse. Such was the results of the first real battle in an effort to march against fortress Marcoussin. They had fought the troops belonging to fortress Gertrude Angeline and were disastrously beaten.

IN FEAR OF CHILD SLAVES BEING RESCUED BY HUNDREDS OF THOUSANDS THE GLANDELINIAN AUTHORITIES ACT...

During the sametime in which general Hanson Vivian was defeated in the battle of Dugannia the war around Vivian Wickey was going on with redoubled violence far to the north near Andrea and one of the saddest things of the war happened.

This was the removal of all the Christian non-combatants from their home land. They were mostly Calverlinians and they or their forefathers had lived there since the earliest centuries. They were Glandelinian descendants but did not favor the rebellion. They did not like the ways of the Glandelinians, and though on account of general Purgatorian and Stanek capturing Vivian Wickey, the city and the region all around it had come under the control of the rebels, they themselves remained Angolinians and Christians at heart, and loyal to the Abbeinnans and God. They would not promise to be faithful to Glandelinia, and when Glandelinian authorities had tried to make many of their men folk join the army by conscription they fought.

It was a most anxious moment. The governor general refused to give the permit, the poor general would have to stay out of the battle, and still if the Christian fleets could not stop the running up of the blockade until the rebel revenue officers be allowed to seize all the tea and other goods, the rebels in Vivian Wickey and sent it through the blockade.

They would not even promise to join the rebels and their armies against the besiegers. It was quite plain to the Glandelinian Congress in Vivian Wickey that if the Angolinians should attack all parts of Vivian Wickey in general the surviving people there loyal to Angolinia would rise and one man to help them against the rebellion. Then surely Vivian Wickey would fall, or this reason, and to guard against such a disaster, they decided to move all the Calverlinians who favored Angolinia away, and scatter them among all the prisoners still confined in prisons in Vivian Wickey and public Gallie, and then if they yielded not to commit another wholesale slaughter as had been made in July in 'orn'. However in doing this they tried their level best to keep the people of each district together on the many transports that carried them away. But in the griefs of partings and in the confusion of getting off and in the danger of husbands being separated from wives, and mothers from their children forever there was some delay and a Christian fortress on the river mistaking the scene for a foe rammer opened a dreadful cannon fire which tore all the ships to pieces and killed non-combatants and men and soldiers alike in dreadful numbers before the mistake was discovered. Of course then the firing ceased and as many as were possible were rescued but by this disastrous mistake brought on by the enemy's cruel act more than six thousand Calverlinian women and children alone and nearly 10,000 men and twenty thousand rebel soldiers were killed, and many of who survived and were rescued by the Christian gunboats never saw fathers, or mothers and brothers, or husbands again. It was one of the saddest occurrences during the siege. This also happened on Halawoon.

By this effects many foe works were burned, and any one who may have read the beautiful stories of the Acadians in the beautiful Poop Evangeline by Longfellow can realize the sorrow of this disaster at Vivian Wickey which was more greater than the Acadians ever been and by mistake caused by the Christians themselves.

This disaster angered many of the Angolinian generals, and many of those in command of the fort had been brought to trial but as no evidence of guilt was on them the full occurrence was blamed on the enemy and revenge was desired. For the first a day part of October and partway into November the wicked Glandelinians really got the best of the desperate fighting, but for a time now the Angolinian Angolinians fighting too desperately to be really believed began to win. They drove the Glandelinians in another attack in November from the works at Dugannia run, and moved this time drive the Glandelinians from some At northern sections of the siege they also drove the Glandelinians from some of their outer strongholds on Lake Gero Georgianum, and Lake Jamming. They next set out to conquer the Glandelinians in a certain section of Gunbeam Valley. So do this they had to capture fortress Quebec, the most important Glandelinian stronghold on the Norma Run River. For this great task general Hanson Vivian who retained command despite his wounds picked out general John Evans Jack brother, who was one of the best of his officers. He succeeded in all his great work of the world.

THE BATTLE OF QUEBECKER.

At this time he was only twenty years old. To look at him any one would have never imagined he was a Christian soldier. Of course he was tall and stout, his hair was dark brown and his face plain, but his beautiful eyes were full of thought, and showed as much fearless spirit as his brothers. His health never robust when a man had and often having been sick was now strong and healthy and though nearly one third of his men were suffering from sickness colds and diseases which must soon have ended their lives they still went with him to make this expedition. Their general had an iron will like his brother and a strong wish to serve his country and God in some way. Though general John Evans had a very hot temper, he had a most tender and frank nature, which helped him to make many friends and keep them. He did not as yet of course know the Vivian Wickey. All his soldiers and generals and officers loved him and were willing to follow him through any dangers, even to death. He was known as the Fighting Hooker of Angolinia. It was in November not far from Thanksgiving day that John Evans with an army of nearly nine million men concentrated before the fortress of Quebec. His fortress though made of wooden construction was nevertheless very strong and stood on a high rocky precipice cliff three hundred feet above the highest ground. General John Evans saw from the first that it would indeed be no easy task whatever to capture this rebel fortress so hard to reach, and the expedition must be made in secret or it would mean the annihilation of his army.

And there were many hardships to endure. His soldiers suffered from intense cold and blinding snowstorms. Many were sick, and Evans himself became ill with a severe cold, but he would not give up even for the devil himself.

Though an Abbeismman he had the pugnacious character of a bold Irishman, during his fortifying by this great fortress and although in great pain from his cold most of the time he went from tent to tent among his men, trying to give them courage.

"He said to one of his generals:

"I know nothing can daunt me, but I have always prayed to God asking him to keep me up in my courage and endeavor endeavor so that I would never shrink from my duty, what is all I wanted." Sometimes he feared that so many of his men being sick and weak in body that they would not keep alive long enough for them to finish the task. At last after much waiting and searching, the scouts discovered secret pathways up the steep cliff leading up to the fortress. Then he knew the best way to defeat general Whilliam Schleoder the rebel commander here was to get the Angelinian army to the top on the plains above by these secret pathways.

So general John Evans took a number of men in boats up the Norma river to a point twelve miles above the place he intended to make the attack. Two hours after evening passed, on Halloween the signal was giving for the advance. It was a clear starlit night but as there was no moon the forces of Angelinians crossing the stream by pontoon bridges and not reached by foe searchlights were hidden in intense darkness, while they moved slowly across the river and began to climb the cliff. Let us imagine ourselves standing by Evans while as the forces crossing the pontoons march on. He is speaking some commands in low tones, we listen closer. He hears a man repeating a poem he loves. A line seems to make him very sad. He has come to the end of the advance. He pauses and says gently: "Boys I would have rather written the verse that boy recited than take this fortress."

After all were across toward midnight the Angelinians by many parts struggled desperately up the cliff. Each man with musket over his shoulder, pulled himself up by clinging to the roots and bushes, or to boulders and tree trunks. At four o'clock in the morning, general John Evans had his army drawn up in line ready for battle. He had left his artillery below to guard his retreat and so had to artillery with which to repel the foe up above. It had been an anxious night for the sick young christian general. At it was no loss so for the rebel commander. He was also ill with a cold, but he was also sick at heart. He felt sure he was really fighting for a losing cause, and fearing this he felt miserable. He felt sure some years later child slavery would be no more and glandelinia would be brought back to the Union of Abbeismman by force. He even did not have men enough to defend this city of fortresses, he was short of supplies, and most of the garrison of the city were not in condition to fight as they should.

He declared once to his officers that he had not removed his clothes to take a rest since the time Vivian Wickey was captured. About seven o'clock that morning he heard heavy firing of rifles and cannons, and mounting his black horse he rode at once toward his firing lines. When he saw in the distance the long red and purple lines of christians moving forward to the attack, and the long line of smoke along his own line he said to his generals:

"This is serious business and we must repulse their attack if we can.

At ten o'clock after severe fighting the christian attack was torn in pieces and the remainder of the force driven back with great gaps in their lines. At ten thirty after a lull the glandelinians under cover of their artillery fire advanced upon the christians hoping to whip them as they realized they had no cannon.

The attack over a line of six miles was desperate, the struggle was a bitter one, and seventeen thousand men were killed in the onslaught but the rebels were repulsed. Every hour a new attack was made but the glandelinians lost the battle and were driven from their encampments. General John Evans was struck by four bullets, the last of which wounded him so badly that he had to be borne tenderly and lovingly to the rear. A moment later some one cried:

"The enemy are running. The enemy are running. See how they run the traitors." The wounded general opened his eyes as if waking from a most deep sleep and said:

"Are they really running at last?"

"Yes the enemy are, they are giving way everywhere. We are advancing on them and we have already captured their positions."

"Now said Evans, God be praised. I have accomplished what I thought impossible." The rebel general received a mortal wound however, yet supported by his soldiers he kept his saddle as he rode through his scattered troops trying to rally them. When told that he could not live many hours he said it was the best, for he had no desire to live and see the capture of the position and fortresses. Five days later after five days of fighting, the fortified heights passed out of the hands of the rebels into the possession of the christian troops. Not even then however did the did the main glandelinian force give way, and for a while it seemed almost as if the rebels might get back at least some of their own positions.

There was a most anxious moment. The governor general, who had just received the permit, the poor general would have to stay out of the battle, and still if the christian fleets could not stop the running of the blockade until the rebel vessels officers be allowed to seize all the tea and other goods and then allow it to proceed on to the rebels in Vivian Wickey, and sent it through the city of Abbeismman.

One desperate attack was made upon the enemy on the right, and simultaneously a force of glandelinians assaulted Evans batteries down below but could not capture it and suffered a disgraceful loss. It was too late to try and win back what they had lost and finally the enemy abandoned everything and fled panic stricken toward Fortrose Gertrude Angeline...

JANUARY 15TH 1913. ANOTHER DEMAND FOR THE SURRENDER OF VIVIAN WICKET.

The seige had already cost the Angelinian authorities over twenty millions of dollars and it was not even a year old yet. As the seige was now being pressed with unmounted energy, and as Hanson Vivian himself had already brought up to Vivian Wickey the most famous army the world ever seen to press the seige, general Hanson Mansion reasoned:

"It is only fair that the glandelinian army at Vivian Wickey should be demanded once more to surrender. The Angelinian generals being largely make up a Mansion assist a assistant was quite ready to carry out his wishes, and so after some time general Hanson Vivian passed the surrender claim. This first law was called the 'surrender Demand'. It provided that unconditionally the enemy at Vivian Wickey should surrender their armies and everything, and that when they had surrendered the authorities of Angelinia should do with the prisoners as they saw fit. When news of this demand of surrender had reached Mic-Allister Stanek and his rebel generals all of the foe generals were very angry.

"It is unjust to demand of us a second surrender when they know we so stoutly refused the first demand." They said. "The Angelinian dogs are trying to make fools out of us Confederates of glandelinia by trying to force us to surrender a city we have so gallantly held. And the charters which our king granted to us make us men free to do as we like in any war. In glandelinia it is the law that no free glandelinian or soldier of officer shall dare surrender unless they are ordered to do so by the authorities of glandelinia herself. We have no one to speak for us in the glandelinian Parliament and so we will not surrender any portion of Vivian Wickey unless general Mic-Hollister Johnston receives the order from Vandy Fair our capital. The only way we answer to demands of surrender if to show the christian dogs how to keep their distance."

The glandelinians were all the more ready to take this stand because for many days they had bitterly disliked all christian ways which they claimed were unfair to them.

One of the hardest trials that the besieged glandelinians in Vivian Wickey suffered was on account of the blockade, and of the frequent failures of blockade runners. They could not get any products in Vivian Wickey to be sent to glandelinia, and of course not only that but when they could not get it to go to the glandelinian country it generally fell into the hands of the christians. So in merchant and other products the enemy were at the mercy of the besieged. Besieged and angry christians who made it certain that no goods of any kind should slip out of their reach. And all this was making the glandelinians declare that the besieging christian generals was taking an unfair advantage of them. You need not be told that the demand of surrender was strongly opposed.

In fact the glandelinians thinking it unjust did not hesitate to send back a number of refusal. Some even in spite fired upon those who bore white flags of truce, and the glandelinians in Vivian Wickey tried blockade runners themselves, and even others did dare to take the chance of running, through the very christian lines to secure provisions of any kind they felt they needed.

"We will not be used as tools for the besieging christian dogs to make out of us all the fools they can." The glandelinian generals declared. "We are not slaves but free born glandelinians, and we refuse to comply with any demands which would make us give up the city of Vivian Wickey. We will hold it till doomsday if necessary."

Indeed when the second demand of surrender came great indignation was aroused. As Hanson Mansion and Johnston went to see general Mic-Allister to receive Johnston. When Mic-Hollister Johnston went to see general Mic-Allister to receive orders he found the greatest excitement not only in the many fortified rebel encampments but in the city itself. Soldiers and men gathered in large crowds on the streets and in the camps, talking in anxious tones. Serious questions were being discussed.

"What shall we do about the demand to surrender Vivian Wickey?" They said. "Shall we submit and say nothing. Or shall we send a petition to Mic-Allister Stanek asking him for justice. Shall we beg general Purgatorian to oppose the surrender demand and shall we take a most bold stand and declare that we will not surrender under any condition!"

Not only in all the intricate elements and encampments and in the streets of Vivian Wickley but also in the main general headquarters there was the great excitement. Out of the glandelinian generals had been very wealthy planters and factory owners, who lived on great estates and mansions while others were poor. They had much weight and dignity had they chosen a wiser course to keep them rich. The affairs of the armies of Vivian Wickley were largely under their control. All of them were loyal to the glandelinian country and her cause and they wished to obey the glandelinian rules as long as possible. So they had counselled; to obey the glandelinian rules as long as possible.

"Let us move slowly," he said. "Let nothing be done in a severe passion."

"Let us petition the glandelinian king on this condition and then, if he thinks it right it will be time for us to consider our own actions." He must not be rash.

General Mic-Holleston, Johnston the main glandelinian commander of all rebel armies in the war listened earnestly. But he could not see things as these older generals saw them. To him delay seemed dangerous to the situation of Vivian Wickley.

He was eager for prompt decisive action and nothing else. Tom Taking a sheet of paper he hastily wrote some resolutions, and rising to his feet he read them to the assembly of glandelinian generals. We can easily picture the scene.

At first they all gave listless attention as general Mic-Holleston Johnston began in quiet tones to read his resolutions.

Many of his generals and even Mic-Alister Stanek gas in scornful wrath and at first they wondered "how comes he what he thinks. He is he anyway to give us much hard harsh advice. We never heard of this before."

It was but natural that these generals whose judgments had been looked up to for years should regard as an insolent commander Mic-Holleston Johnston who presumed to think his opinion worth listening to in a time of great crisis like this in the rebellion.

But while they sit in scornful wrath his eyes began to glow fiercely. His figure became more erect and his fierce voice rang with fiery eloquence. The assembly of glandelinian generals in Mic-Holleston Johnston's headquarters were all alert.

"No one no matter who the christian dog is," he said "has any right to demand a surrender of any one but me, and I have full authority to accept the surrender and I have full authority to refuse to accept the surrender. And no one has the power to make me do either and I will never surrender the city and neither will I allow any other general here, or Mic-Alister Stanek to surrender under any conditions whatever. Only by the king's command will a surrender be accepted."

These were stirring words and they fell amid a hushed silence. Then the debate grew hot and furious, as many members arose to speak in opposition to his burning eloquence. But the glandelinian general was more than a match for all the dissenting voices. He disapproved with him. Like a terrific torrent his arguments poured out and swept all before them. He held resolute resolutions he presented were passed by the Assembly of generals. It was agreed thus;

"Surrender we will not. If General Mansion wants Vivian Wickley let him come and take it if he can. We will hold on until we are commanded by the King to withdraw. But surrender never."

It was a great triumph for the general and orator. On that that go day general Mic-Holleston Johnston made his name indeed.

"Stick to us old fellow or we are gone," said one of the very generals who had opposed his speeches an hour before giving him a friendly slap on the shoulder as he passed out at the close of the stormy session. General Mic-Holleston Johnston had suddenly made his decision and he meant to keep it.

Not only in Vivian Wickley but also in many of the glandelinian encampments, his fiery words acted like magic in stirring up the glandelinians all over against the demand of the christians to surrender. He had proved himself not only a bold and able glandelinian general willing to risk any danger for the rebel cause but proved also that he would and could have his own way in anything he wished. Of course you would expect that only in the glandelinian armies at Vivian Wickley there would be strong and deep-seated feeling again to the demand for surrender. But perhaps you will be surprised to learn that even in some parts of the christian lines a leading officer felt sure Vivian Wickley would never fall by the christian lines. And it never did. They even thought that general Mansion was making a great mistake in trying to force general Mic-Alister Stanek to surrender Vivian Wickley when the enemy fully well supplied from Calverline were bound to hold out to the end.

General Pitter wh Williamson a leader in the glandelinian Conf Congress made a great speech in which he said;

"I rejoice that the Glandelinians have resisted. He went on to say that if the glandelinians had meekly submitted, they would have acted like the child slaves themselves."

It was a most curious scene. The poor general would have to stay out of the battle and still, if the christian fleets could not stop the running of the blockade, the rebel revenue officers would be allowed to seize all the tea and other goods provisions and allow it to proceed on to the rebels in Vivian Wickley and sent it through the blockade.

General Burkin and Johnston Fox other great glandelinian generals also befriended the speech of Mic-Holleston Johnston. All through the forenoon the officers and men were greatly aroused. General Mansion having received an answer which proved to him the enemy would never surrender had sent a large force of soldiers to try and capture Horna Bridge. Many glandelinian brigades hastened to the spot to reinforce the glandelinian forces entrenched there, and with a grim determination to defend the spot the foe elected some of their leaders to act for them at this trying time. During the concentration of armies near Horna Bridge a great number of generals. Great is the excitement over the approach of a more fighting in this region, and though thoughtful officers and generals were very serious, for the shadows of the clouds of battle grew blacker hour by hour.

The glandelinians concentrating in great numbers had already begun to get ready to fight if they must. But many of the glandelinians hoped the Nationals would not attack and therefore acted with caution. General Mic-Holleston Johnston was not one of these. He believed that the time had come when everything should give place to prompt decisive action. He threatening battle he felt sure was at hand. It could not be avoided. The glandelinians must fight desperately here for if once the Angelinians could across this bridge they would be able to bring their main army across the river and the city of Vivian Wickley would fall for sure. So intense was his belief of the danger that he offered in this second meeting a resolution that all the glandelinians should at once prepare themselves and concentrate heavily against the christians. Many of the generals and officers stoutly opposed this resolution as rash and unwise as it seemed impossible to hold Horna Bridge now. At length general Mic-Holleston Johnston rose angrily to his feet, his face pale, his eyes flashing, and his voice trembling with an anger and emotion. Again he straightened to full height, and his eyes flashed. His voice rang out like a base horn. As he went on with increasing power, men and generals leaned forward in breathless interest. Listen to his ringing words which called the resumption of hostilities at Horna Bridge!!!!

"We must fight the christian dogs and not let them cross this bridge under any conditions or they will win the seige. I repeat it sire we must fight, and fight, and fight, and fight, and fight. An appeal to a 11 arms and the God of hosts in all that is left to us. They all tell us sire that we are strong but weaker than the christian forces besieging us, unable to cope with so formidable an adversary. Well we have not held out so long already, and how far have the christian dogs advanced. They only captured a line of woods in the gambusia river valley and the ore itself and that's all. But when shall we be stronger? We have even Manley to help us and Shoemannia and other armies helping us elsewhere outside of the seige. When shall we prove to the christians that they will not take this bridge and cross it? Will it be next week, or the next year? Will it be when we are totally disarmed, and when a christian dog of a guard shall be stationed at every door of every house in Vivian Wickley. Halls gather strength by irresolution and inaction! Shall we acquire the means of effectual resistance by lying supinely on our backs and hugging the delusive phantoms of hope, until our christian enemies have bound us hand and foot and freed all the darn child slaves. Sire we are not weak if we make a proper use of the means which the natural effects had placed in our hands. There is no need of retreat but fight. We have enough child slaves to compel to build works if necessary anywhere needed. Their chains are forged. Their clanking can be heard on then now. The big battle is inevitable-----and let it come--I repeat it, and repeat it. Let it come. We will show the christian dogs we can fight like hell!" onwards and others may cry peace, peace, peace, but there is no peace. "The war has actually begun and we shall win it or die. The next gale that sweeps from the southwest will bring to our ears the clash of resounding arms which will mean the battle is beginning. Our millions of brethren are already in the field concentrated before Horna Bridge. Why stand we here so idle? What is it that all gentlemen wish? What would they have? Is life so dear, or peace so sweet, as to be protracted at the price of surrender and abandoning a stronghold which our king means for us to hold till he is able to go, forget it all you fools. I know not what course others may take but as for me I'm to bring on all the brigades needed to reveal the foe at Horna Bridge."

What wonder that the audience swayed in his belief. He was a true prophet of the glandelinians for in less than a week the first gun of this coming battle was fired on the very bridge itself. Undoubtedly general Mic-Holleston Johnston's fiery spirit had done much to kindle the flame which then burst forth.

Not long after this he was made commander in chief of all the Mic-Holleston forces, and the next year was elected governor of Vivian Wickley. Without doubt the glandelinians had among themselves the most eloquent orators the world ever produced, there being thousands of men like Patrick Henry himself but more forceful in speeches.

While general Mic-hollister Johnston was leading the glandelinian generals and their thousands of commands in their defiance of the demand of surrender, exciting events were taking place in Julio Gallo under another glandelinian general. This was general Purgatorian. Purgatorian. Even before the rebels of Julio Gallo took any general action, he had introduced into the Assembly of Julio Gallo resolutions opposing all demands for surrender, and they were passed.

Small in size as he was no man could be more desperate. Many Angellian officers fearing his influence, had tried at many different times to bribe him with office under the Abbeismian king, and to buy him with gold. But he scorned any such attempts to turn his noble from his wicked duty to the cause of the Child Slave Rebellion. The great purpose of his life was to ensure the besieged glandelinians in any way, to stand up for their supposed rights to hold children as slaves, and to defeat all the plans of every christian general in trying to force the surrender of Vivian Wickay. In this he was busy night and day. In all the glandelinian assemblies, and in all the town meetings all looked to him as an able leader and general, and in the child slave workshops where he went on many inspections, on the streets, or in the glandelinian fortified ships shipyards, men and soldiers and officers listened eagerly while he made clear the aims of the many National generals, and urged them to defend the city of Vivian Wickay to the last man and never surrender. Even at the close of many a busy day this earnest child slave loving man gave himself little rest. He did anything even made sacrifices to uphold the wicked cause of child slavery. Often he was writing thousands of articles for the glandelinian newspapers, and often urgent letters to all the glandelinian generals in Julio Gallo, and in the other sections of Vivian Wickay.

Long after midnight those among glandelinian soldiers, officers and sentries who passed his dimly lighted windows could see general Purgatorian hard at work writing many articles against the so called "Christian dogs". Had any one who did not know him seen him at this time they would have never thought him to be a man remarkable among the glandelinians. He was of medium size with keen gray eyes black hair and his face had an expression as if he would tear the devil himself to pieces. He was a great power among the glandelinians, and not only did he rouse the armies against the christians demand for the surrender of Vivian Wickay, but he helped to organize in opposition to it societies of glandelinians usually known as some strange kind of Secret Orders, who refused to accept any letters received from christian generals, and often destroyed anything from the christians sent within their lines. In Julio Gallo as in Mic-Whither and Norma Catherine and elsewhere throughout Vivian Wickay, the glandelinians refused to do anything to reveal any of their intentions regarding their new movements in the vicinity of Norma's Bridge.

At the close of several days before it had really been put into operation some acts were not done in secret but this did not happen until many resolutions had been passed and after much excitement, when there was great rejoicing.

In every town of glandelinia and for proper property throughout California great bonfires were lighted, and every glandelinian general sent thanks to general Purgatorian. At the obstinate general Mansion was not happy about the refusal to his demand for surrender. In fact he had received such answer such against his will. He wanted to press the end of the siege in his own way and shorten the civil war and how could he do so if he allowed the stubborn rebels in Vivian Wickay thus get the better of him. So he made up his mind to force a passage way across the mighty Norma river by attacking the foe at Norma's Bridge once more.

In the first day of October general Mansion asked any of his generals to pass a message to form a greater and stronger blockade of Vivian Wickay as he had heard that blockade runners were import importing, tea, glass, paper, and a few other articles into the besieged city. This new law was passed and many more blockade runners were captured. The prisoners only said as they were examined: "We had no part in leaving it, and if we pay for our actions we will give up our rights as freemen, at how can we help ourselves. We got to have trade." "Well said general Evans himself. 'I such actions is harboring the enemy. We will resist any such attempts on the part of you blockade runners, by refusing to allow any good whatever to reach Vivian Wickay. You merchants are not any glandelinians, but there are among you Bohemians, Italians, and even Americans and have no right to do any such thing. So shame with you the Americans to have supply the enemies of God. If believe if the governments of your country the United States heard of this you would be exiled as traitors. If this happens again I will have you reported. You will be realize this time but you will have to promise not to make any attempts at blockade running again. As long as you were foreigners we excuse it this time. you may go."

So realizing their foolish mistake at last they finally promised to import no goods to the rebels, and the merchants promised not to ask or take any goods from any one taking part in the Insurrection.

It was a most anxious moment. The governor general, Vivian Wickay, refused to give the permit, the poor general could have to stay out of the battle. He said: "If the christian fleets could not stop the running of the blockade shall the rebel revenue officers be allowed to seize all the tea and other provisions and allow it to proceed on to the rebels in Vivian Wickay and sent it throughout the country to support the rebels?"

Realizing some coming trouble with even the Angellian country in general if they persisted in this the many nationlities stopped running the blockade, and many wealthy people of many countries agreed to wear anything not made in glandelinia and to stop eating any thing rich and special in order to have more provisions of their own, thus showing willingness to give up for the cause some of the luxuries which they had learned to enjoy. Of course the desperate stand taken by the besieged glandelinians at Vivian Wickay lasting so long had angered general Mansion, who was half plaid out already in his efforts to press the siege and felt tired, overworked, and ill. He called all the glandelinians rebels and traitors, and hearing that general Mansion was making another effort to concentrate an attack upon the army at Norma's Bridge sent troops to help him press it through. From the first the glandelinians at this point felt insulted at seeing such a strong concentration of christian troops and it was not long before the first trouble broke out. In a fierce skirmish on the bridge at night, the Angellians fired upon a crowd of glandelinians, killing and wounding a heavy number of men in gray. This caused the greatest excitement. The next day under the leadership of general Purgatorian, the very citizens of Julio Gallo in favor of glandelinia's cause demanded that all the christian soldiers should be removed from the vicinity of Norma's Bridge, despite fearing more serious trouble if the demand was disregarded. The officers refused to withdraw their armies, and by dint of sword and bayonet drove the angry citizens from the bridge and to the defense of the foe soldiers.

Still the feeling did not die down. The new concentration still increasing was a constant irritation. Only slaves would submit to such a delay in being permitted in attacking the christian dogs. "Said general Purgatorian, and his listeners agreed. In Julio Gallo and in other sections of Vivian Wickay, the glandelinians themselves were now trying desperately to escape blockade runners. Few days were growing stronger, and matters grew worse until at length after so thing like three days general Mansion to declare the enemy decided to take off half of the forces concentrated at Norma's Bridge, except the division under general Galdwell who had captured the Woods later. W."

"We must keep one division there to prevent the army from crossing over to our side." Said general Mansion. It was as if the christian generals staff had winked slowly at one another and said:

"We shall see indeed. We shall see indeed. Those glandelinians must have their say and a little flint like this one they will overlook. It would have been much better for poor general Mansion if he had not taken off any section of the armies concentrated near Norma's Bridge and then the coming disaster which I'll write later on would not have occurred. Many leaders among the christian armies thought it dangerous to make such a flint, but the stubborn general was bent upon having his own way saying: "I'm full commander of the siege. All orders I issue shall be obeyed."

Thus he and his generals worked up what seemed to them a clever scheme for hoodwinking the most desperate glandelinian generals. We will take half of the concentrated force away, you can the simple rebel troops think we are fooling them. They will not dare cross the bridge then for fear of an ambush."

Great faith was put in this foolish plan, but general Mansion and his generals were to soon find out that those seemingly simple glandelinian generals, were only Rebel Angellians across the River, that they too had strong wills and clever brains and that they did not care half so much about strong concentration of troops as they did about giving up a principal and moving forces forward against any obstacle they feared they could not carry. General Mansion was bent straight ahead to carry out his plan. It was arranged that a but general Galdwell's army should be withdrawn back for a mile from the region of Norma's Bridge. In due time this movement was made.

THE VIVIAN WICKAY CAUSE.

In the months before the outbreak of the war battle at Norma's Bridge it was arranged that the glandelinian Cause that many shiploads of tea and other provisions should be force of arms run the blockade of Mic-Whither Janet the northeast section of Vivian Wickay where Wickay pay forms the border of the California coast. It was arranged that the East glandelinian Tea and Food Provision companies should ship cargoes of tea, food, provisions, ammunition, and other articles at any risk to Vivian Wickay for the rebel soldiers there, to send sent ships to Aronburg and to send sent ships to restore a means to rebel rebuild the burned sections of Julio Gallo and Norma. In due time the tea approached the waters near Vivian Wickay. The rebel merchants saw what time what a time it was to run a blockade like this. Their eyes were opened. What did they find out by the spirits of the men and officers in command of the many blockading squadrons of all ships the world knows of, wooden and steel, what they simply would not let any ships strange or not pass then under any conditions that their guns could blow their transports armed as they were out of the water. The blo clading ships of gja-whirther J anet and Federal refused to let any ships by no matter who they were, and in Anna Aronburg many ships which run passed the bi blockade were perused. fired upon and captured, the tea and provisions stored in the christian i lines instead and the blo lade runners held as prisoners of war. put the most exciting time was in the region of Andrian a where the great Hio-whirtheria fortifications stretched part way here the glandelinian general Fran is Purragatorian was deter ined to have the blockade running carried out despite all opposition. Hence secured something that related something like the "Faulois posten Ten Party" - but a more stranger tea party, not only where no cups were used, no guests were invited, and to tea drink but during fierce fighting on the water and a sublime artillery storm of both sides. did you ever hear of such a party. Let us see what really happened, and which showed the danger of attempting to run the A gelinian blockade.

It happened on Halloween night itself when ten great gla dillinian transports guarded by six submarines, seven Herrmanns, a thousand fast long and eighty feet high, and a fleet of battleships and gunboats bound for Andrian Harbor, steamed toward the waters of Lake Angeline. The Angelinian sailors and marines of the besieging and blockading fleets were attending to their naval duties in the various cabins and on the decks when the cry "They are attempting to run the blockade with foe warships to help them." spread like wildfire. soon the decks of the warships were alive with marines and artillery. Just then a bloody Halloween night in Vivian wickey indeed. the officers quickly notified admiral notch Benjamin Herrmann the owner or admiral of the flagship fleet, and asked him advice of what should be done on the latter. Then while some others were getting a short ones meeting, preparations were made to prevent the ships were getting through. A sea fight of tremendous results was coming. the crowd of enemy ships was even so great, that their squadrons adjoined to the vivian wickey Bay also, and there they seemed to overflow the waters itself. here were five thousand rebel ships guarding the attempted blockade runners alone, besides the monitors, morriacs and other ships, some of them being true tremendous dreadnaughts but never in size to the ships of the christian blockading fleet. In addressing the sailors and the marines the christian admiral asked;

"Is it the most firm resolution of this body not only that the tea and other provisions shall be taken possession of by force or sent back, and that no ship of the foe shall be permitted to run this blockade."

"Yes" came the prompt and untied answer from those scores of thousands of bravest men of the christian fleet. go the marines and the sailors and soldiers on board of all the christian ships with admiral Adamson gamgal at their head were determined that no matter how numerous the enemy fleet of warships and other vessels shall not pass the blockade under any conditions whatever. The glandelinian admiral o in command of the monstrous fleet that was attempting to run the blockade was equally determined that it should be accomplished. A most stubborn fight t herefore on the waters of Lake Angeline was at hand. The christian commanders of the main ships appointed other craft such as their Herrmanns and onitors and gunboats, and floating batteries, and small bodies of infantry armed with muskets and bayonets to watch the direction of the approaching fleet of blockade runners, some by day others by night.

ix thousand post riders were appointed also who should keep their horses saddled and bridled, ready to speed into the main christian lines to give the alarm should a landing of the blockade runners be attempted near the shore. Hundreds of sentine sentinals were own stationed in many of the christian signal stations to signal the generals, and thousands of beacon fires were made ready for lighting on the surrounding hill tops. November sixteenth dawned. It was a critical day. If the enemy tea ships and other provision and t transport ships should still continue to persist in making the attempt at blockade running the rebel revenue officers would be empowered by law to land it forcibly and run the blo lade a even at the cost of a tremendous conflict. Men talking angrily, and asking their flats with excitement were throgr thronging the christian side of the shores from the surrounding encampments. By ten thirty o'clock over seven hundred thousand soldiers had assembled in the company strais itself nearest Lake Angeline and on the shores of the lake itself. they were waiting for the coming of general otcher who had gone to see if general Mansion would give him permission to join the christian fleets in the approaching conflict and hel repel the advance of the desperate blockade runners. General Rotcher soon came and told the angry crowds of soldiers that Mansion had refused to give the permission for fearing he would be killed in the fight and that he could not be spared. he soldiers told him that he must try and get a permit from the governor general himself. At three o'clock in the afternoon of the next day a gre ater throng of g owner soldiers and even wild slave refugees again crowded the company streets to wait for the return of general rotcher.

the poor general would have to stay out of the battle. ad still: if the christian fleets could not stop the running of the blockade shall the rebel revenue officers be allowed to seize all the tea and other provisions and allow it to proceed on to the rebels in Vivian wickey and sent it throughout the city to morrow morning. Many anxious faces showed that many men and even children were asking themselves this momentous question. but while in deep suspense the meeting waited for general rotcher to come they discussed the situation, and suddenly general rows Johnston asked:

"Who knows how the rebel provisions will mingle with the waters of Lake Angeline?"

At once a tremendous whirlwind of applause swept through the assemblies, and the masses of soldiers outside. A plan was soon formed. the afternoon light of the short winter day faded, and darkness deepened, the lights of myriads of candles sprang up here and there in the windows of the barr acks within the christian lines and in fortresses there was the flashing of roman candles and the roaring of thousands of skyrocket. It was past seven o'clock when general otcher entered the church of the christian encampment and with pale face said:

"The governor general refuses to permit me to undertake the dangerous risk. We must only be said try to secure the provisions but not join the sea fight if it breaks out."

An excited and angry murmur arose but the crowd soon became silent as general now stood up. He said quietly:

"This meeting can do nothing more to save the region from bloody struggle."

These words were plainly a signal. At this moment in an instant there came a tremendous rolling roar of thousands of guns on Lake Angeline, which announced the battle had broken out, and simultaneously a warwhoop sounded outside among the encampment and four hundred thousand Angelinians swung forward to their river fortified works and waited for troops of the foe were attempting to land the provisions on the river shore. the Angelinians in that bright winter moonlight made a fierce assault upon the enemy, driving them from all their provisions and capturing every thing. the city would not a second of being in the hands of the rebels. there was however great panic on the water and provisions were sent to the water of the lake. there was however great confusion everywhere. Rebel ships opened a stream of shot and shell fire and deadly missiles but nevertheless all was done in order. put what a strange ten party it was extending for nearly ten miles. certainly no other ever used so much tea, and so much water, or caused such losses in lives, and such loss in ships. the battle on the lake raged nearly three days and nights, the foe fleet being unable to break through the blockade, the transport ships being set on fire or captured, nearly three quarters of the rebel fleet was sunk with all on board and soon the remaining fleet beat it in hasty flight. the blockade running failed. Again the christians were victorious.

Soon thousands of waiting messengers were speeding to outlying set sections of the christian lines with the news and general Reverence St De Paul beated and spurred, mounted a swift horse and carried the glorious news through the col nics of the christian encampments as far as Hanoous positions.

This tremendous and bloody Vivian wickey Tea Party which prevented the running through of a hundred million dollars worth of tea and goods of all kinds and the cost of ten thousand lives was not a festivity which pleased general and the coast of the christian lines. In fact it not only made him very furious, but also a afraid, and quite discouraged. At first he felt sure vivian wickey was going to fall in a very few weeks and desired to resign his command but Mic-Holleston Johnston encouraged him to stick it out, and decided himself to punish the christians for the disaster. The glandelinian Congress therefore passed a degree by which all portions of the river at any risk must be closed to all the christian warships, until they would be compelled by force to raise the siege. Not Only this but he decided to rush a large troop of men across norm's Bridge and attack the christian lines situated in that vicinity. put the first thing he found very difficult to do. he own stubbornly refused to try and blockade the rivers in possession of the christians saying they came to fight in war, not commit suicide. So they stubbornly refused. Not the great vivian wickey Tea Party as one alone under the displeasure of the rebel generals. they hated also the threatening siege of the Lucille ri Rickson fortifications. So they put the whole region of that fortress and all its surrounding fortified works under military control with general Emory Page as governor general, and sent more soldiers.

This new glandelinian general gave orders that to prevent suspicions of the christians the rebel authorities should not hold no more meetings so openly openly. He said that no one should no longer issue laws that may fall into possession of christian spies or levy their own provisions. This indeed meant to be a severe punishment for the christian blockade.

In the meantime on account of the blockade vivian wickey was becoming very bad in its situation with no vessels of any kind able to run the blockade without disaster or annihilation and capture and all trade with southern glandelinia and Calverline cut off, the rebels arose soon began to suffer more. But not only the soldiers of vivian wickey but even the brave citizens men and women would not give in. they said:

"We will not surrender vivian wickey under any conditions, even if the city goes down into the innermost depths of hell itself, nor will we allow any christian troops to force their way in as long as we have Calverline to support us through our secret tunnels."

When the Calverlinians loyal to glandelinia in the city of Calverline heard of the suffering on account of the siege at Vivian Wickey, they sent by underground trains wheat, corn, sheep, fish, sugar, and other kinds of food, provisions and artillery and all provisions and ammunition and were soldiers to help out against the siege. The Angelinian generals were thinking that by punishing Vivian Wickey they would frighten the other rebel authorities in Calverline. But unfortunately they were mistaken. For they said:

"We will help the people and soldiers of our comrades in Vivian Wickey. Her cause is our cause. We must all put together in our resistance to King Cannon of Abbeismia, and his Catholic Authorities."

So the rebellion was really uniting all the glandelinians in Calverline. In order to work together to better advantage the glandelinian authorities in Vivian Wickey itself agreed that each should send to a great and final meeting some of their strongest men to talk over their troubles, and work out some plans of united action. This meeting was to be held at the Continental Congress at Norma Catherine. General Purgatorian and general Mic-Holleston, Johnston were two of the four highest generals that were to preside at the meeting. They began their journey from Andrian in a coach drawn by four army horses. In front rode two generals ten servants or orderlies well mounted and bearing arms, while behind were other officers and orderlies in livery two on horseback and two as footmen. Such was the manner of glandelinian generals. As they journeyed through the steepest streets of Vivian Wickey and across the river into Norma the rebel people and elders honored them in many ways. From some of the largest sections of the town, officials and citizens rode out on horseback and in carriages and wagons to meet them and act as escorts, and on reaching the main section of the city, they were feasted at banquets and greeted by hundreds of thousands of gleaming bonfire ex bonfires on streets, hilltops and elsewhere, the ringing of bells, the clamor of countless factory whistles, and the roaring of all kinds of trumpets, firing of rifles and cannons, music of many bands, and by singing and shouting. These celebrations showed honor not to the rebel generals alone, but to the glandelinian cause.

The glandelinian Congress to which these messengers were traveling, urged the people to stand together in resisting the attempt of the christian generals to force them to give up Vivian Wickey. They added: "We have the right not only to hold all forts of Vivian Wickey which we captured at the outbreak of the rebellion, but also to only govern ourselves."

With all these movements general Mic-Holleston was in great sympathy. He went even further for at this time he was almost or quite alone in his desire to retain child slavery at any cost, and he had well been called "The Devil over the Child slaves". Perhaps we can afterwards think of him especially in connection with his ferocious heroism in the tremendous battles elsewhere he soon fought in and where at Gains Fair he was disabled for life and Manley had to assume command in his stead. But his fierce influence for the welfare of his country fighting the rebellion lasted far beyond that time. Till the close of his life he was an earnest and sincere glandelinian Patriot. He died five months after his disablement in the late second year of the war, both a great general and a great orator he was a man of action better than any of the Manleys soon to be heard of more, for he had great power in dealing with his men. Truly his life was one of great and heroic service to his country despite the fact the cause was wicked and in the wrong.

ANOTHER TREMENDOUS BATTLE OF LONG DURATION BEGINS NEAR NORMA'S BRIDGE.... LET'S FIGHT IN IT AND SEE HOW IT GOES.....

When general Hanson, Vivian and his other generals passed the decree closing all the ports of Vivian Wickey more tight or the christians believed that such severe punishment would not only bring the enemy to quick submission, and put a stop to further rebellious acts but would cause all the rebels in Norma Catherine to feel sorry for what they had done in Norma early in July, and incline them once more to give up, imagine their surprise and indignation at what followed. As soon as the glandelinian generals had ordered their assemblies not to have any more open meetings, the glandelinians finally made up their minds they would not be put down by the christians in this manner. They said:

"The nations have forced us to hide our assemblies. Very well. We will form a new and more secret go to governing body and give it a new name which no one will ever find out. And what do you suppose the chief business of this new rebel Congress was to make ready for a strong concentration of big armies and artillery in the vicinity of Norma's Bridge. New brigades were called for, and fresh provisions sent for, and provision made that a great number of rebel brigades should be prepared to leave their works at a minute's notice and attack the christians at any time given. These were afterwards called the 'Minute Men of glandelinia.....'

Even while these glandelinian Minute men for so the rebels of the Angelinians south called themselves were making these preparations to concentrate upon the region of Norma's Bridge, general Richard Kindermine and Walter Jennings who was in command of the Abbeismian and Abyssinilian troops in Jennie, Vivian had received orders from general Concoordinian Aroburg to seize as traitors Adams Anelutseer Adams Sampson, and Francis Jandook who were discovered to be the most active leaders of a bunch of conspirators conspirators who had been discovered trying to betray an important work to the enemy. General Kindermine knew that these men were staying for a while with some other wicked friends of his near Lexingtonia junction. He had learned also through spies and the Gemini that the rebels had concentrated an immense battery of artillery and military stores near Concordia by the Norma Bridge, really twenty miles from Julio Gallo, and only eight miles beyond Jennie Vivian. This brave christian general planned therefore to send secret spies to arrest the four suspicious persons within the christian lines and then to push on and capture or destroy the stores at Concordia which he learned were not occupied by the enemy as yet. This he felt sure would give him an opportunity to secure a strong position before the main concentration of the enemy started at Norma again.

Although poor general Kindermine had acted with the greatest secrecy, he was unable to keep his plans from the watchful glandelinian Minute men. We shall see how one of the glandelinian generals during the outbreak of the conflict outwitted him. The general's name was Puttingham. This general had taken an active part in attempting the flouting to run the blockade, and the following days with about one hundred and forty thousand other glandelinians had formed a secret society to spy out all the plans of the christian generals and of their officers. I myself fancy that the daring and courage called for in this dangerous business appealed to the most high spirits and love of adventure for these young glandelinian generals and their officers. Always on the watch, they were quick to notice any strange movements and report to such generals as Mic-Holleston, Johnston, Purgatorian and others. On the evening before Thanksgiving Day general Revere, Warner and his friends brought word to general Mic-Holleston, Johnston that they believed general Kindermine was about to carry out his plan, already reported to the general and others of the capture of the would be traitors within the christian lines, and of taking and destroying the military stores at Concordia.

"There is heavy firing going on of the greatest intensity," He cried. "I believe the battle has begun."

General Mic-Holleston, Johnston quickly decided that general Warner and Williams Dawson should go on horseback to general Mic-Holleston's command and to the generals at Concordia and give the alarm. He sent them immediately by different routes, hoping that one at least might escape the so called "Christian dogs" or at least their many hundreds of strong patrols with whom general Kindermine, had carefully guarded all the roads leading from all sections of Vivian Wickey in the vicinity of Norma's Bridge. Soon general Dawson was galloping from Norma's Hill, and general Revere, Warner was getting ready for a long night's ride through the deep snow.

After arranging with some of his other officers for a flashlight and lantern signal to show by which route the advancing Nationals were advancing, "If by land, and two if by river and str across elsewhere." He stepped with a party of officers and escorts into a small gunboat with two other generals, who brought him from Andrian across the Norma River to Julio Gallo. Upon reaching the other side of the great river, he obtained as well as his escorts and other generals a few fleet horses, and stood ready bridle in hand, straining his eyes in the darkness to catch sight of the signal lights. The horses waited obedient to his master's touch, and the master stood eagerly watching the spot where the many signals might appear. The noise of distant firing of infantry and artillery was growing wilder and louder and he soon began to grow impatient. But before ten thirty o'clock silence came gradually and all was still save for the flaring of millions of skyrockets, the lights from many balloons flying in the air, the dashing of all kinds of fireworks and roman candles and the noise of bombs bursting in the air. At eleven o'clock he saw thousands of different colored lights flashing forth then came a sudden streamer of a thousand flashlights from the enemy's lines at once and a most horrible roar of countless cannons and a more terrible ear-splitting crash of as many explosions simultaneously and the noise grew on in general and was awfully inspiring as lights became dazzling. Exciting moment. Then another light, and crash of more artillery in a new quarter. Twenty as if by River. The Angelinian troops were crossing a certain section of the gunboat river to move for Norma's gun and march for Norma's Bridge. The battle had resumed with redoubled violence.

There was no time to lose. Springing into his saddle, and spurring his horse, he sped like the wind toward general Lexingtonia's army. Suddenly a squadron of Abbeismian and Abyssinilian officers and men rushed upon him from an unseen portion of the road and attempted fiercely to capture him. But he opened fire with his two pistols bringing down six men, and then in the confusion said a lot of oaths, exclamations, and curses he turned quickly and colliding with one officer upset him and his horse, saved another to the ground, sent another flying for his life, and then before the rest recovered from their surprise and amazement dashed into a side path, with spurs in horse. The Abbeismians pursued like wild and fired and fired but though slightly wounded he quickly outdistanced his pursuers and was soon far from them.

Then in his swift-precipitated flight along the roadways he paused at every place to shout to the glandelinian officers there in recreation: "Up and arm your troops quickly. Up and arm your troops. The Angelinian regular forces under Kindermine are out attacking us at Norma's Bridge again. They are out and attacking like fury. Can't you hear the tremendous noise of cannonading. The officers were immediately aroused and galloped furiously to their commands. Lights gleamed from all houses occupied by rebel and officers. 8 p.m. doors opened and closed, and the officers dashing this way and that were entering their mountings and other troops. When general Lexington's command were reached, it was just midnight and the noise of battle in the distance had grown very violent. Eight glandelinian mountmen were guarding the headquarters where two other generals were sleeping.

"What is all that noise about, that roar of so many cannons and all the glaring flashlights and fireworks. It's disturbing all the men inside their barracks so they can't sleep." Said one of the guards.

No noise. Grieved general Turner. "We will have more noise than this before long. The enemy are out and attacking."

Soon general Williamson Dareson arrived and joined Revere Turner. Hastily refreshing themselves, with a light meal, they rode off together toward Concordia, in company with Samuel Presser. About half way there while accompanied by a strong escort of cavalry they were surprised by a strong force of mounted Calverinian officers and men, who seeing the gray uniforms of those coming toward them hurried themselves forward like a whirlwind whirlwind. The conflict was brief, but fierce, many were sabred, horses reared on their haunches, and the main leading christian officer was down but the Angelinians came off victorious. The officer of the foe and Revere Turner managed to escape the Nationals by making their horses leap a high fence and rode in hot haste toward Concordia which they reached in safety, but the other glandelinians were either killed or captured all who survived the contest falling into the hands of the Calverinians.

Toward the approach of Thanksgiving Morning after having pressed the advantage splendidly during the night and gaining considerably head way despite a 11 opposition, but at tremendous loss, the first section of the Angelinian troops numbering eight hundred tyousan thousand men under general Smithsoninda were on their way to Lexingtonia. But before they had gone far they were made aware by the ringing of many bells, the tremendous noise of signal drums, whistles and other wild tumult, the firing of signal guns, the beating of drums, and the gleaming of countless beacon fires from the distant hilltops, that their secret was out, and that the rebels knew what was going on. Unrushed and disturbed by these signs that the enemy were fully on the alert alert general Kindernine sent general Pitocin ahead with a picked brigade of troops supported by cavalry, in the hope that they might reach Lexingtonia before the region could be completely aroused. He also sent back to the main christian lines for the main body to advance. The Angelinian commander would have been still more disturbed if he had known all that was happening, for the alarm signals were calling to arms hundreds of thousands of glandelinians ready to die rather than allow the christians to cross Norma's Bridge. Hastily awakened from sleep, all the men snatched their muskets fixed bayonets and prepared to concentrate in their works. Just as the sun was rising, general Pitocin marched into the region of Lexingtonia, where he found forty or fifty thousand rebels ready to dispute his advances.

"Disperse you damn rebels disperse." He cried riding up. "But they did not disperse. Pitocin ordered his troops to fire and charge, and in the conflict the loss of the rebels was eighteen thousand. Before the arrival of Pitocin the 11 Angelinian officers who had captured the two rebel generals returned with them to Lexingtonia, where commanding their prisoners to dismount, they sent them to the rear leaving the shock ed and dazed rebels to collect their dead and wounded, general Smith hastened on at Kindernine's order toward Concordia. He arrived at about seven in the morning, six hours after general Turner had given the alarm. There had been time to hide all the military stores so the Angelinians could not get at those, and one assault upon the battery was repulsed with tremendous loss. But they cut down all the telegraph poles, set fire to a number of houses, spiked a number of cannon, and emptied a barrel of ammunition and blew up a small ammunition dump.

About two hundred thousand of them stood ready near the northern side of Norma's Bridge, while a body of approaching rebels gathered on a big hill on the opposite side and started a heavy firing. When the rebels had increased to nearly four hundred thousand the firing grew dreadful, the Angelinians answering in long lines were compelled to slowly fall back, and the rebels began to advance swiftly and brought on a desperate fight which began to result in enormous losses for both sides. When pushing on across the bridge and even over pontoons they pressed the Angelinians to hard they were forced to withdraw toward the rear of their own positions. The affair had become more serious than the Angelinians had expected. Given on their own side of the river they could not rest, for an ever increasing body of glandelinians kept swarming forward, and a desperate assault of enormous pressure was made upon the christian lines. For a time the struggle went on without either side giving way but by noon general Francis Smith could see that it was unwise to delay the return to the main line. So although in the night his men had pressed on for twenty miles in the face of fierce opposition, and had little or no food for fourteen hours, he gave the order for the withdrawal. At when they started to retreat, the Rebels kept after them in tremendous number and began another deadly attack. For a time it was an unequal fight. The Glandelinians, pressing on by scores of thousands per wave slipped from tree to tree like Indians, and shot down the worn and helpless Angelinian soldiers by the wholesale, and then retreated before the dashing charge of christian cavalry, only to return and repeat the harassing attack with greater wholesale slaughter.

The region of the Red Whirling Hood Wooded country through which they passed favored this kind of fighting. The rebels passed through after the retreat ing christians in a long ten mile advancing line of rifle fire. Not even for many miles in the open country, every atom wall and hill/ fence, roadway, railroad viaduct/ every house and barn every tree top were really to the exhausted Angelinian troops bristling with the guns of pursuing rebels who mercilessly shot them down by thousands. It was dreadful, sometimes a body of christian troops would make a stand and give resistance but the rebels would charge wildly and disperse them in a furious fight hand to hand. The poor retreating christian army dragged wearily forward fighting fighting as bravely as possible, but on the verge of confusion and panic.

They reached Lexingtonia gonmonia at Three O'clock a quite overcome with fati fatigue. There they were met by one million fresh troops under general Percival Henning whose timely arrival saved the entire pursued and harassed troop from annihilation or capture. General Percivale men formed long lines and a part of the division formed an immense square for the protection of the many retreating soldiers, and into it they staggered, falling upon the ground, with their tongues hanging out of their mouths like those of dogs after a chase. After resisting the headlong onslaught for an hour the battle became terrible, but as general Kinder nine at the time did not have the chance for some reason of restoring his main force to their support and as the attack was pressing them hard and their losses becoming most dreadful in officers and men the whole new force of christians even again took up their retreat toward Kindernine's main position. The rebel assailants increasing in wholesale numbers every minute kept up the same kind of running attack that they had made between Concordia and Lexingtonia until late in the day, the 11 Angelinians came under the protection of the guns of the Angelinian batteries, and the christian war ships in the river. After an hour the enemy gathered and hurled one big assault after another upon the christian position in a most desperate effort to carry it but their columns were shot to pieces and their main line was torn with gaps and two of their generals were killed.

Seeing their assaults useless the end enemy at night withdrew from the attack and fell back to their own lines. The Angelinians however had failed in their advance. There was no denying that. They had been driven back almost in panic to their own works with a loss of nearly three hundred thousand men in one day. Their losses in the night had been forty thousand in killed and wounded. The rebels throughout the fighting of that night and day had not lost a hundred thousand. But general Kindernine was aroused to the situation. He had a vision of his superb brigades in their brilliant uniforms overriding all before them.

And how did the Glandelinian generals and John-Hollister Johnston regard the situation. They saw clearly and without gloom the deadly nature of the struggle upon which they had entered and the strength of the opposing army against which they must measure their own strength. The glandelinians in the vicinity of Norma's Bridge were now in a state of great excitement. Even all the men noncombatants who favored glandelinian in initiated and flocked to the rebel army, and within a few days after the battle, the rebels sixteen million strong, were concentrating at Norma's Run near the bridge. The Angelinians made no further attempts just now to make an advance.

While the christians and the rebels at Vivian Wickwokey were in the midst of these most stirring scenes, an event of deep meaning to all the christians themselves was taking place not far from Evangelina Grania. Here it the Angelinians generals all coming together for the seventh fifth time since the beginning of the siege was making abrupt plans for carrying on the great siege by cutting money for siege and other war purposes and by making general Ranson commander in chief of the besieging armies, of which so many armies around Vivian Wickwokey were the beginning. Thus did the Angelinian nation itself realize that war had come in all its horrible aspects, and that all christian countries must stand together in the fight. Meantime for christian troops brought up by Ranson's recent arrival under the command of general Estelle Johnston arrived near Jennie Vivian, bring with him an army of 10,000,000 men and nearly sixty thousand pieces of artillery.

Believing as the siege was becoming more greater in pressure that the immense rebel Angelinian armies could soon be forced to leave Vivian Wickwokey if not surrendering especially by cannon planted on the heights of Evangelina Grania the Angelinians decided to occupy it. This of course was not decided upon until it could be found out what general Ranson's purpose was to be. But to go back to Norma's Bridge. On the night after the bloody christian defeat therefore shortly before midnight, twelve million two hundred thousand glandelinians marched quietly from Lucilla Rickson Rickson Fortification a good advance toward Breeders Hill to the left of the Bridge where which was nearer Jennie Vivian than any other point, and began to show up immense breastworks, breastworks. More than three hundred thousand glandelinians under the command of many officers worked hard all night, and by early morning had made good headway and erected breastworks and other fortified works more than thirteen feet in height and team teamed them with cannon. The Angelinian generals on awakening and finding finding out were greatly surprised to see what had been done and consulted among each other about the situation.

Realizing the strength of the new rebel works on that immense hill the Angelini fleet of warships commanded by Admiral Stanek opened a broadside of 15,000 cannon upon the glauclian line in an effort to make their new position untenable but the guns of not only the position but some of the forts replied and for a whole day the most terrific artillery duel of the siege so far raged on making a tremendous clamor and by night amid an inferno like scene, the fire from fortress Gertrude Angeline threatened the fleet with such loss of ships that general Kindermine advised Admiral Stanek to withdraw from the artillery hurricane. General Kindermine had however been concentrating his own batteries upon the fortified position of the rebels and having them covered with great centerwater guns he thought it now would be easy enough to drive off the "Rev Rebels".

SIX DESPERATE ASSAULTS UPON THE ENEMY POSITIONS...

So about two o'clock in the afternoon of the next day he made a tremendous assault upon their strong works. The hundreds of thousands of christian soldiers burdened with heavy kramas, and suffering from the intense cold of a winter cold wave had to march through deep snow, and work their way through high snowdrifts reaching above seven feet, and to climb many fences. In advance of the main line of foe works were six lines of snow forts and posted behind were foe artillery and strong lines of infantry. In front of the snow forts were a long line of machine guns. Behind this impregnable works the rebels watched the scarlet and purple waves of troops coming nearer and nearer. All of the rebel leaders warned their men not to fire too soon.

"Wait until you see the Whites of their eyes," they cried. "They are not near enough yet."

The surge of purple coats despite fire from machine guns, and infantry of the foe climbed the slope of the hill and charged the breastworks. They carried the snow forts at the point of the bayonet and captured the machine guns and other set illary and drove the foe from them but they could not retain at this moment what they had captured for the foe surged down upon them from the main works and after fierce hand to hand fighting drove the Angelinians back down the hill with dreadful loss and two generals killed, and five wounded.

Twice more the Angelinian soldiers in their scarlet and purple uniform rushed to the assault and again they were twice more driven back with great gaps in big numbers ploughed in their lines. Whole ranks by hundreds were swept down by the enemy's fire. Again and again reinforced they rushed to the assault only to see their immense lines mangled and torn and the foe's fire sweeping upon them in annihilating fury. The slopes of the hill was darkened with myriads of their fallen, but a sixth time they advanced in ever greater numbers.

With greater fury than before the rebels answered the charge and withered the front line of the christian advance. But a great rush of the nationals behind over their fallen, and the redcoats and purple coats have machine guns and snow redoubts again in their possession. An inferno of firing ensued at close quarters with the foe in the strong salient but it was soon also carried and many Angelinians were already in the possession of the Angelinians. But it was no easy victory even now, and there was no lack of bravery on the part of the desperate rebels. With clubbed muskets, and bayonets, and pick axes, and ramrods and even daggers and pistol butts they met the attackers.

The Angelinians pressed on now however with irresistible force and finally won the victory but with great loss.

"My more such charges would have cost general Kindermine his whole army," said one Angelinian officer. On the other hand however the Angelinians had fought like heroes, and news of the victory brought joy to every loyal heart. General Kindermine heard of it when he was on his way to take personal command of his main army.

"Did my troops stand fire when the rebels counter charged?" Was his first question. "Yes" was the answer.

"Then said he 'The strength of the siege will not be broken. If the bridge is taken possession of Hanson can get forces across to the other side of Norma gun and Vivian wickiey will be ours.'"

In electing general Mansion commander in chief of all the besieging armies, general Hanson and his generals absolutely made the very wisest choice possible.

Of course this was not so clear then. For even generals like general Conscientian Aronburg, and Maurice Costello or even Robert Vivian himself did not know Mansions Ability as we have come to know it too. Conscientian Aronburgs had wished personally that general Hanson would not plan only to bring armies to Vivian wickiey fight his way through to Aurandacallio and then leave the army there and take command of other armies elsewhere in the country as he proposed to do. He wished Hanson would take personal command of the siege. But now from Mansions great ability in holding the difficult siege together they all had learned enough about his most wonderful power over men and his great skill as a leader in time of war to believe that he was the man to whom the whole country might trust the great work of directing the besieging armies in this momentous crisis.

There was nothing however learned of yams ion in his boyhood days, but he had been in the army as a soldier since he was eighteen years old and now he was quite aged but still freand full of great activity and a very pious man. He had been the nations most trusted messenger, and had been early in the war an aide of general Aronburg when the rebellion broke out.

In the discharge of all these duties, and in all his relations with men and generals whether above him in office, or under his command, he had shown himself trustworthy

CHAPTER THIRTY.

GENERAL MIC-HOLLISTER JOHNSTONS BIG BATTLE MOVEMENTS AGAINST HANSON, AND HOW HE FAILED OUT IN A SERIES OF TREASONOUS CONFLICTS.

A TIME OF GREAT TRIAL FOR MIC-HOLLISTER JOHNSTON.
GENERAL KINDERMINE'S PLAN...

In celebration general Mansion drew his sword before general Hanson who then assembled there, and after general Hanson gave him a kiss, he took command of the besieging armies. He was then sixty three years old, tall and manly in form, and very dignified in bearing. All his soldiers and officers looked upon him with pride as he sat upon his horse, as a superb figure and picture of strength and dignity. He wore a large hat in the form of a Cowboys with a large colored

Realizing the strength of the new rebel works on that immense hill the Angolima first fleet of warships commanded by Admiral Stanok opened a broadside of 19080

There was nothing however learned of Mansion in his boyhood days, but he had been in the army as a soldier since he was eighteen years old and now he was quite aged but still freand full of great activity and a very pious man. He had been the nations most trusted messenger, and had been early in the war an aide of general Aronburg when the rebellion broke out.

There was nothing however learned of Mansion in his boyhood days, but he had been in the army as a soldier since he was eighteen years old and now he was quite aged but still freand full of great activity and a very pious man. He had been the nations most trusted messenger, and had been early in the war an aide of general Aronburg when the rebellion broke out.

In the discharge of all these duties, and in all his relations with men and generals whether above him in office, or under his command, he had shown himself trustworthy beyond measure and efficient, a man of clear mind and decisive action, one who always commanded the respects of all men and even women and children, obedience, and even love and honor.

After his great victory at the battle of Angolima Run general Mansion as stated before had concentrated his lines in the formation of a half crescent near Julio Gallio alone on the banks of the Erminia gun itself and very soon with the arrival of other atitudes he had been able to press his advance until he was able to invest the portion of Norm Gathering just as the reign of terror was gain on going on and then enclose upon all of ivian wicksey despite the most hellish resistance of the enemy in the many battles raging with him.

But with all his success and experience general Mansion had the modesty which always goes through with great on greatness. In being summoned before general Hanson Vivian and his generals at Angolima Agathia at the time after he had invested the whole of the land side of ivian wicksey, he was given a vote of thanks for his brave services to his country and in so successfully besieging ivian wicksey, rising to reply general Mansion stood blushing and stammering, unable to say a word and the speaker, liking him much more said with much grace: "Sit down general Mansion. Your modesty equals your valor, and that surpasses the power of any language I possess. I only hope you will keep the enemy besieged and if the city falls into your possession the rebellion through your means and efforts will be subdued."

Some months had rolled by and then broke out the great Galverine battle itself. Meanwhile the exciting events of which had been going on that month of September were crowding upon one another in a conglomeration of events and leading up to the first bloodiest battle of the war "November River", and in this time of horror general Mansion was unconsciously preparing for the greater task for which he was soon to be chosen.

In the events of these days general Mansion took his own part. He was one of the greatest national representatives at the first National meeting about the situation of ivian wicksey came to be known as "the Aronburg situation" going to Pandora in company with general Goncentinian Aronburg, and others and leaving the command of the bel besiegers with the able general Su signatory who had saved the ivian girls during the Norm Catherine Slaughter. He also was a delegate to the second meeting of the National Council in August 1912. He filled each place of trust and that more natural for his ability that general Mansion Vivian and Aronburg together should choose in the meeting of all generals as commander in chief of all the besieging armies, this gent leman, old, but able, and already tried and proven to be one of the worlds best christian generals and the best friend Goncentinian Aronburg ever had. He was chosen unanimously. On being elected and no Goncentinian Aronburg read the degree, Mansion rose and thanked them all for the honor adding most modestly:

"I do not think myself equal for the full command I am honored with." I No doubt in the dark days of the war and during the whole siege he had felt often this way, and many times he was so worn out with his exertions that many generals begged him to be relieved for a time and take a rest but he would not give in for as the task had fallen to him, he determined to do his best, and trust in the Power of god and His Blessed mother for the outcome of the siege.

He also refused to accept any pay off his services, but said he would keep an account of all his own expenses. The idea of gain for himself in the time of his countrys need was far removed from this mans great heart. He only knew how wicked the enemys cause was and wished most ardently to overthrow the wild rebellion as soon as possible. So on the twenty first of November just a little before Thanksgiving general Mansion had set out for the Julio Gallio section of the besieging christian lines from his headquarters in company with a small body of his highest generals to take full command of the main army of besiegers. He train the joyfull journey which could not be made on account of no trains running was accomplished in three days. Soon after reaching the place after Thanksgiving general Mansion was much encouraged by the news of the brave perseverance of general Goncentinian troops had made in the assaults upon the rebels strong positions. After three days more he reached the region of Julio Gallio about four o'clock in the afternoon, and was given a royal welcome. Nine brigades of soldiers in their best uniforms in foot and on horseback escorted him as he passed through the company streets in an open carriage drawn by six white horses. All along the route the company streets were lined with soldiers and even child slaves and other refugees who greeted him with cheers and the waving of many pretty flags, and the children free now throw a volley of flowers of every description into his carriage and in return he threw to them a shower of nickles and dimes and other small change. Continuing his journey, he reached the encampments before Julio Gallio and there all the officers and the entire army received him with more enthusiasm than can be described and there was more noise over his coming than during the greeting of a King.

Next day under a large army Crucifix and after receiving Holy Communion at Mass in Celebration general Mansion drew his sword before general Hanson and his officers assembled there, and after general Hanson gave him a kiss, he took command of the besieging armies. He was then sixty three years old, tall and manly in form, and very dignified in bearing. All his soldiers and officers looked upon him with pride as he sat upon his horse, as a superb figure and picture of strength and dignity. He wore a large hat in the form of a Cowboys with a large colored the besieging fortifications, hiding the papers by sewing them inside his undershirt. He with his companions was just about returning to the rebel lines when a gang of Gendarmes and soldiers, being told a general Danforth captured him and his whole gang. The papers being found upon him, he was condemned to be shot as a spy before sunrise the next morning and the rest with him who were his accomplices were sentenced to fifteen years in prison after the war. The marshal who guarded the rebel spy thought supposed to be an Angelinian was an Abyssinikin and was sent of all the Abyssinikin had lost children who were either enslaved or brought away in some gathering or elsewhere they hated Abyssinikins more than a poisonous snake. This Abyssinikin was a cruel man, he would not allow his Gendarmes prisoners to have any bible of any religion, and even tore in pieces before him very eyes the farewell letters which the spy had written to his mother and friends. But the rebel was not afraid to die, and held himself calm and steady to the end. Looking down upon the mob of Angelinian soldiers from the firing squads scaffold who were standing near by as he went to his death he said:

"I only regret that all of us Glandelinians have only one life to give for our cause. May however all the spirits preserve my body from capture and cause the speedy downfall of all Christianity." He was then shot by fifteen men at the command of an officer and speedily buried.

A TIME OF GREAT TRIAL FOR MIC-HOLLESTER JOHNSTON.

But the death of this one Glandelinian spy and the capture and conviction of the other fifteen was only one of the hard things general Mic-Hollester Johnston had to bear in this trying year of 1912... We have seen that when the Glandelinians left Long Lester Junction the Angelinians promptly occupied all the positions. On a certain section of Evangelina & Heights they planted their massive line of big cannons, commanding all of the approaches toward Norma Bridge. General Mic-Hollester Johnston sick and sad at heart had to withdraw, and he retreated northward to the north bend of the Lucille Jackson fortifications stubbornly contesting every inch of ground.

In fighting the next two days the Glandelinians and Angelinians together lost very heavily. Two forts belonging to the enemy near the river with three million men were captured by the Angelinians. The outlook was gloomy enough and it was well for the Glandelinians they could not foresee the even more trying events that were to follow. If in order to save himself and his army from the desperate Angelinian enemy, general Mic-Hollester Johnston had to retreat once more, this time toward Norma Bridge itself. With the Christian army in every way much stronger than his own close upon him it was a race for life toward the bridge itself. Somewhere there was only a burning stretch of trees, houses, or small bridges across creeks, which the rear guard of the rebels had not fired, a between the fleeing forces and the pursuing army. To make things far worse general Mic-Hollester Johnston saw his own army becoming smaller every day, because so many men were either captured or shot down by the Angelinian pursuers. When he finally reached the Norma Bridge and the river itself he had barely three million men left. But here again general Mic-Hollester Johnston showed a master stroke of genius. Having collected boats for seventy miles along the river in one day and having a strong fleet coming to his rescue, he succeeded in getting the part of the army unable to cross the Norma Bridge safely across the river at other portions at nearly the same time and at a place a little above Jennie Vivian. As the Angelinians had no boats and had no pontoons they had to wait in order to construct them. Their generals did not decide to wait until the river should freeze once more, for they must start immediately in constructing pontoon bridges, and cross in triumph and make a speedy capture of his foe. He decided also to push on desperately across Norma Bridge. Now to most people in the whole world, and in Glandelinia, Galverinia, and Angelinia, and Abboannia alone the early downfall of Vivian Wickey seemed absolutely certain. General Glandelinus himself was so sure that the city of Vivian Wickey would soon be in the possession of the Angelinians with his capture of Norma Bridge that he had already packed most of his luggage and sent it to the train in which he expected to return to Angelinia. But general Mic-Hollester Johnston had no thought of giving up the struggle or even allowing any force of Christians to cross over the river on Norma Bridge. Others among his Glandelinian generals had said despairingly "Oh let's give it up. It's no use to fight against such heavy odds. General Mic-Hollester Johnston was not that sort of man at all. He faced the dark outlook with all his courage and energy. Full of faith in the cause for which he was willing to fight for and die, he watched eagerly for the opportunity to turn suddenly upon his overconfident Christian enemy and strike a most heavy blow. Such an opportunity came soon. He seized it in desperation when he learned that general Glandelinus' forces were battling for the possession of Evangelina Granita and Norma possession. A body of Glandelinian troops mostly made up of Galverinians, Abyssinikins, Abboannians, and Tripangilgonians were stationed two miles west of Jennie Vivian and general Mic-Hollester Johnston planned to surprise them on the night of Christmas, when as he knew it was the custom of all Christian people to hold a feast and revel, but they were not doing so as he soon found out.

With two million four hundred thousand men he prepared to cross the Norma River by way of Norma Bridge. The ground was white and deep with snow, and the weather was bitterly cold perhaps thirty below zero. At this time that violet and her sisters applying in Andromeda were doing some of their marvellous for the child Janna. As the many Glandelinian soldiers were here left bloody foot prints along the banks and half of the number of soldiers were ragged. At sunset the troops began to drop. It was a terribly terrible night following, angry gusts of wind, and great blocks of ice swept along by the swift current threatened every man and woman to dash to pieces the hastily constructed pontoon bridges, but they crossed over and by means of the big bridge also. From the Jennie Vivian side of the river general Knorr who had been sent ahead by general Mic-Hollester Johnston, loudly shouted to let the struggling artillery men know where to land. Or to a horse boat to lead after battalions of guns and men conducting the guns made the dangerous crossing while the infantry and horses went over the pontoon bridges and Norma Bridge. A long night this most certainly have been to general Mic-Hollester Johnston, as he stood in the midst of the wild storm, anxious yet hopeful that the next day would bring him victory. It was not until four in the morning that the already weary men were in line ready for the march covered by their artillery. Jennie Vivian was ten miles away and a fearful storm of snow and sleet beat fiercely upon them as they advanced through the deep snow in long lines like an army or hoboes armed with muskets and bayonets. Yet desperately they pushed forward, surely such courage and hardihood would have deserved its reward if the Glandelinian cause was not so wrong and wicked. The Angelinians and other Christians had however no festival during the following night of Christmas but nevertheless no most of their sentries had to be withdrawn on account of the intense storm and cold spell no one was quite aware of the enemy. They felt sure the enemy would not attempt to advance to an attack in such weather. About sunrise they were surprised, and a set of the first section of the brigade easily captured after a most brief struggle. Like a flash of light in the darkness news of this victory shot through the rebel ranks. It brought hope to every heart. The Angelinians were amazed at this most daring feat, and general Glandelinus decided not to leave Galverinia for a time. Instead he advanced with a large force upon that region near Jennie Vivian hoping to capture the rebel general and his army there. He therefore delivering a violent attack drove the enemy back two miles and on the night of January second he took his stand on the far farther side of the river and thought he had Mic-Hollester Johnston in a trap.

"At last!" said general Glandelinus "We have run down the old rebel fox, and we will force him to surrender to-morrow." But general Mic-Hollester Johnston was too sly a Glandelinian fox for general Glandelinus to capture. During the night he led one third of his army around general Glandelinus' camp and striking on to the east of Jennie Vivian, defeated the rear guard of the Christian army in a perfect tactical struggle, and cutting it off before it had a chance to join the main body capturing the whole Christian force and the whole camp. He then pressed forward by the National's retired in safety to his winter quarters among the hills outside Lucille Jackson. During this fateful campaign of a month's duration outside of Vivian Wickey general Mic-Hollester Johnston had handled his army in a masterly way. He had begun with bitter defeat, he had ended with glorious victory. The enemy again felt now that their cause looked though it was not hopeless. It was well that they had this foolish encouragement for the year that began with the battle north east of Jennie Vivian was to test the courage and loyalty to the uttermost.

GENERAL KINDERHEIM'S PLAN...

It had become the plan of general Glandelinus that if they could get full control of the full stretch of the Norma River, thus cutting off all part of Vivian Wickey from the immense river source they could so weaken the rebels as to make their defeat easy and the capture of Vivian Wickey certain.

So they finally adopted this plan at Glandelinus' advice. General Glandelinus heart with nearly eight million men was to march from Jennie Vivian by way around Lake Angelina, and from the direction of Lucille Jackson fortifications, to Atlanta where he was to meet a small force of Angelinians who also were to come from Jennie Vivian by way of the Sunbeam Valley. The main army of eighteen million men, under general Mic-Cantler was expected to march up the other portion of Norma River and with a fleet to help in the expedition. Glandelinus believed that this plan could be easily carried out, and would soon bring the resistance of the rebels in Vivian Wickey to a close. And their plan might indeed have succeeded if general Mic-Cantler had been able to do his part. Let us see what really happened....

General de-Cat Cantler thought that before going up the river to meet and help in this expedition and help general Greathart, and he would just march across the river and capture Norma Bridge. His however was not so easy as he had expected it to be. General Mic-Hollister Johnston's great rebel army was fully in the way and not caring to fight his way across, he returned to Jennie Ivian, and tried another route, sending with one part of his army to Angelino Ford and marching the rest by land. The voyage and advance took about three days, much longer than he had expected. When at length the land army came to the point and the remainder landed, and advanced toward Norma Bridge he was again thwarted. General Mic-Hollister Johnston's army greatly confronted him on Gunbeam Creek near the small abandoned village of Lane Gout Court, and a little had to be fought. The rebels were disasteriously defeated it was true with the loss of two million in killed and wounded, but Mic-Hollister Johnston had handled his army with such skill and gave such resistance that it took general Greathart two weeks to reach the region of Norma's Bridge which was only three miles away from the field of battle. General Greathart was thus kept busy by general Mic-Hollister Johnston until it was too late for him to sent help to general Mic-Cantler. Moreover Mic-Cantler was disappointed in the help which he had expected from the Sunbeam Valley, for the christian army which was to come from that direction had been forced to retreat to Jennie Ivian, almost before reaching the valley at 11 a.m. General de-Cat Cantler was now in a very hard place. Big forces of other rebels under general guelmann were in front of him, blocking his way, and also behind him, preventing him from retreating, or from getting powder and other greatly needed supplies from Jennie Ivian. He could move in neither direction. Thus left in the lurch by those from whom he had expected aid, and pained in the by the Angolindian insurrection there was nothing for him to do but to fight his way through to means of retreat or give up. Like a good soldier he fought, and the results was two desperate battles near Edw and court, and the defeat of the Angolindians. At they had torn a huge gap in the rebel lines by forcing the surrender of one great general with his entire army of six million men.

Through this gap he was able to escape but his losses had been too dreadful and so his retreat was a panic all the way back to Jennie Ivian.

Such was the way in which the Angolindian plans worked out. Of course this was a great blow to the besieging christian forces, and to general Mansion himself but the Angolindians would not give up and only once after this disaster redoubled the artillery storm upon the besieged and damaged many buildings in Norma Catherine and set many on fire. On the other hand the three great rebel victi victories in quick succession was a great cause of joy for the enemy. It made hope stronger, it was won confidently abroad. The Angolindian governments had been watching closely to see whether the besieged Angolindians were likely to win in any of their struggles at Ivian Woke, before sending more strong aid. Now all the authorities of Angolindia were ready to do so, and was quite willing to send troops.

To bring about the means to have it possible that no Angolindian christian army no matter what size should ever capture Ivian Woke, general Fr anklin Pierce did more than any other rebel. After finding out that the Angolindian authorities had signed the Declaration of Independence for the child slaves, and you will remember I he had afterwards sent a copy apies into the christian lines to secure aid for the rebel cause. He must have been a quaint figure at the Kings Court of Gondensconia, his plain hair and plain plain clothes contrasting strangely with the fashion and elegance all about him. Yet though this simple hearted rebel counsiller was welcomed by the Gondensconia people who gave feasts and parades in his honor and displayed his picture in public places, they realized nevertheless that Angolindia's cause was very wicked, and kindly told him that Angolindia could not be aided for fear that Abhinanna would come down and force Gondensconia to submit to Abhinanna's authority and so their own freedom would be lost. Nevertheless many things had been discovered by the Angolindian authorities and spies who disloyal Galverinians themselves had secretly helped the cause of the Angolindians especially the rich people did. They secretly supplied the rebels throughout the country with money and army supplies, and besides this able Galverinian leaders joined the rebel army so half of even Galverinia was divided against itself. One part sided with the foe and the other part sided with the Angolindians.

The most noted of the Angolindians who sided with the christian cause was Lafayette Hapsonia. The circumstances under which he came were no doubt quite romantic. His man was but twenty two when he heard frequently about the story of the Angolindian christian armies besieging the Abhinanna fortress of Ivian Woke and of all the other rebels fighting for the hope of maintaining the crucities of child slavery throughout Galverinia. It interested and deeply moved him. For even in his own mind and heart a desire for the children's freedom had been steadily growing, and he had been in sympathy with it. Now he made it his business to find out more about this great cause, and then he decided to help all he could. So he belonged indeed to one of the noblest families of Angolindia and was very wealthy. He had a young wife and four baby girls and two boys whom he regretted to leave. At he indeed well believed that his duty called him to join the cause of Angolindia and help in bringing freedom for the children then held in bondage. His wife was proud of the lofty purpose of her noble man's husband, and encouraged him to carry out his plan, but his children cried and did not want him to go away to "the old war".

CHAPTER THIRTY ONE

GENERAL IBZNER MYLETSE, AND OTHER GREAT HEROES OF THE GLANDELINIAN.

Standing next to general Mic-Hollister was Johnston himself as military leader in general course was the invasion of Glanolinia and Angolinia simultaneously. Inner Mylets had shown heroism at many battles and now he had taken command of a force of troops belonging to Mic-Hollister Johnston's army. Failing several times already at Norm's Bridge the Angolinians tried hard and most desperately at the same time to get control of Norm's river and the middle sections as we have already seen, which resulted in the battles of Lane and Edward Court. Again they had been baffled and defeated by the Glanolinians. One course remained, and that was to gain control of the southern section of Norm's bridge. Beginning on in the Georgia Gun Section they captured from the Glanolinians after a perfect war of the war world the fortress called Gavumuh. Two days later they captured general Burgum and all his forces at port Charleston, and in the following week badly and disastrously defeated general M. Atrusia at Sanderson, near fortress Carolinia and Gedoraine, where with a new army he was commanding in general Burgum's place.

At this point now the outlook for the Glanolinian cause in the resistance to the siege was discouraging. One thing was certain. A skilful general must take charge of the Glanolinian forces south of Norm's Bridge, or the Nationals under general Caldwell would soon have everything in their own hands. General Mic-Hollister Johnston had great faith in Inner Mylets and did not hesitate to appoint him for this hard task. Let us see what led the rebel commander in chief to choose this Mic-Hollister's soldier for duty in a post so far away.

General Inner Mylets was born in Eastern Calverbia in 1842. His father who was generally a man of severe character was however a Free Mason in Religion and a quaker on other occasions, and being to the know-nothings on still another occasion. Inner Mylets was trained to work at child slave holding. He was robust and active and like many young boys and girls liked all kinds of outdoor sports, but with all his other activities he was a good student of books.

We like to think of even these young Glanolinian boys and girls going to school and playing at games just as boys and girls do now, a quite unaware of the any great things waiting for them to do in the world, and they know their future they could have prepared in no way better way than by taking their faithful part in the work and sport of each day as it came. General Inner Mylets looking some like some very handsome villain in a moving picture screen and wearing a peculiar uniform of some half red and half blue of long gray color was ten years younger than Mic-Hollister Johnston, and was about thirty years old when the great battle of Angolinia Junction occurred.

Although news did not travel so rapidly on account of all kinds of communications being wiped out by rebellion, general Inner Mylets was soon aware that the full force of action during the siege of Vivian Wickey would soon break out at any time and having marched since the month of May for nearly a thousand miles for Vivian Wickey brought his army there and conscripting the men and boys local to Glanolinia in Vivian Wickey organized a new army of rebel soldiers who should be ready to fight for the rebel cause, and made the trip from Vivian Fair to Vivian Wickey to get preparation to lead armies in any part of the field in case of necessity. In the region of Vivian Wickey in the danger of the 11 fire he watched with much interest the enemy or christian troops taking their drill and brought back with him not only a bunch of recaptured child slaves but a number of Angolinian soldiers who were made to join the Glanolinian army or be shot as spies.

When news of the fierce battles of Julio Gallo passed swift ly over the country, proving that at the seizure of Vivian Wickey had actually begun, he raised three divisions of troops and placed many of his generals at their heads. He marched at once to Vivian Wickey before it was invaded by Marston and when general Mic-Hollister Johnston arrived to take command of the many divisions of rebel troops it was general Inner Mylets who had the honor of welcoming him in the name of the nation of Glanolinia.

At this time general Inner Mylets was a great man of stalwart appearance, seven feet tall, strong and vigorous in body, and with a frank and intelligent face. At once he won the friendship and confidence of Mic-Hollister Johnston who already trusted him with positions calling for courage, ability, and skill. It was not long before he was general Mic-Hollister Johnston's right hand man. So you can easily see why Mic-Hollister Johnston choose him in December as commander of the Glanolinian armies south of Norm's Bridge. When general Inner Mylets reached the region of fortress Carl Carolinia, it was still December, and he found the vast army in a very pitiable condition. There was but a single blanket for the use of every two soldiers, and there was not food enough in the camp to last another day.

... noble man husband, and encouraged him to carry out his plan, but his children cried and did not want him to go away to "the old war".

At first this young man found it very very hard and difficult to get away, for not only did his family oppose him in general and his relatives and also the men in power opposed his going but his journey was full of danger and nearly thirty times he had been arrested by rebel soldiers on the charge of being a spy and going through their territory without a permit but as they could find no evidence against him they finally allowed him to go free. He finally to make a long trip more safer and more prompt bought a large ship with his own money and loaded it with army supplies. Then disguising himself as a post boy so he would not be detained by any more rebels he arrived at the Eneida River coast without being found out as to his real purpose.

After a long tiresome voyage down the river toward the nation he finally reached a new stream that led him direct to the gorge Run River and from there he finally reached the region of Vivian Wickey, and entered the Christian lines and went to Jemima Vivian.

There the Angelinian authorities gave him the rank of major general but in accepting it general Haneson, asked that he might serve without pay. Later he became that famous Haneson who led in the bloodiest campaigns of the war.

A warm friendship at once sprang up between general Haneson Vivian and this young Christian general, and a feeling of confidence as between father and son. The older man made the young general a member of his military family, and Haneson was always proud to serve his chief. He spent all his money freely and risked his life to help the cause of the Liberator for Child slaves. We can never forget his unselfish service and as to say he lost his life later in the war.

At the close of the month of November general Mic Hollester Johnston had moved his armies to a strong position among the hills in the vicinity of "orn's Bridge, about twenty five miles northwest of Jemima Vivian, there to spend the winter if possible without further fighting.

It was becoming for his troops a period of most intense suffering. Sometimes the soldiers were going for days without even a crumb of bread!

"For all the time during my command of the army at Vivian Wickey," wrote Mic-Hollester Johnston to Mic-Allister Stanek, "There has been little less than famine in my encampments."

Most of the millions of soldiers were in absolute rage, and only a few had bed clothing or any kind of covering. No one hardly had any shelter for all the tents had been destroyed and none could be had from the main army further away. Hundreds of thousands of ragged men had to sit by camp fires all night long and also during the day to keep warm, and all of the sick and wounded soldiers were without beds or even loose straw to lie upon. Nearly three million of the men were completely barefooted in this severe winter weather setting in so early, and many had frozen feet because of the lack of shoes. Even though they were gladiolians, and fighting for a wicked and losing cause, it could make one heart sick to read about what these tens of millions of gladiolians passed through during that full wretched winter one of the severest winters Calvernia ever had.

Yet in spite of bitter trials and such distressing times, general Mic-Hollester Johnston never lost faith that in the end the wicked gladiolian cause would surely triumph, for he felt sure that those who suffer the most hardships during war are the winners and not their cause be wrong or right.

Too many beautiful stories could have been told enough to fill ten thousand big volumes larger than this showing the faith of this courageous gladiolian general Johnston while in the midst of these pitiful heartrending scenes in the Wunbeun Creek Valley. One day general Potter Friends a good able rebel leader was near Mic-Hollester Johnston's great camp, and he was surprised to see Mic-Hollester Johnston on his knees before his superior general Mic-Allister Stanek, his cheeks wet with tears, begging him to send help and troops for his suffering army and provisions and better camp equipments and more fuel.

When this general returned to his own headquarters he said to his staff:

"Mic-Hollester Johnston will succeed. Mic-Hollester Johnston will succeed. The Child slaves will never secure their independence. The Angelinian nationals will never capture Vivian Wickey within ten years even if they had the whole world and heaven helping them!"

"What makes you think so?" Inquired one of his generals.

"I saw him in general Mic-Allister's tent begging for troops and provisions. And surely Mic-Allister will do all he can for him. He will give him all he surely will."

Many events happened between the coming month of December and Christmas at Sunbeam Creek Valley but these would take a million chapters to write them all. General Mic-Hollester Johnston was bound to lead his great suffering army through this valley of despair, and never again he hoped while the war lasted would the sky be so dark.

We have given a most rapid glance at the part which general Mic-Hollester Johnston took in this big Angelinian Revolution. He as commander in chief of all armies, stands first among the rebels. But he would have been quick to say that much of the credit for the success in the first year of that uneven struggle was due to many of the able gladiolian generals who carried out his plans.

The soldiers had lost heart because of their bitter defeat, they were angry because they had not been paid, and many hundreds of thousands were sick because they did not have enough to eat and all were suffering intensely from the cold. They camped in torn tents or rude huts, made of fence rails, corn stalks, grass, and brushwood and even cardboard paper.

Any man would have said:

"What in the world can I do with a vast army like this in such condition? The task is impossible. To remain here is to fail, so I will resign."

But general Isner Myletze said nothing of the kind. He set to work with a will, for he believed that the right was on his side. By wise planning, by many daring raids, and sorties upon the Christians, by skilful handling of the vast army, and hard labor, he managed with the forces at hand, and with the help of his generals and other officers, to ward off the enemy, secure food supply supplies, capture provisions from the Nationals, guns and ammunition, and put new spirit into his men.

Soon he won the confidence of both officers and soldiers. Millions of stories were told that showed the sympathy he had for his men and their faith in him. On one occasion general Isner Myletze with his funny peculiar smile said to a barefooted sentinel:

"How you must suffer from the cold!"

Not knowing that he spoke to his general, the soldier replied:

"I do not complain at all. I know I should have what I and my comrades need, if our general could only get supplies. But the Nationals have us in a vise and we are helpless."

It was indeed very fortunate for general Isner Myletze that in this time of need his men and generals were so loyal to him. Among them was one who later became noted for his brilliant and daring exploits and who served in other rebel armies throughout the remainder of the war. This was general Carl Staley, the great gladiolian rifleman and a fierce and sanguinary soldier to boot (Please give him a boot).

You will I hope be interested to hear of some of his thrilling experiences.

When about serving his first nineteen days as a general in the army he began his military career in general Purgatorian's army, and at the time of the capture of Judo Gallo and of the defeat of the Christians defending that part of Vivian Wickey he did good service indeed by bringing myriads of wounded men off that bloody battlefield. It was about this time that he became known to general Mic-Hollester Johnston and other great rebel generals who liked him very much and trusted him faithfully. The young gladiolian general was so dependable and so brave that he was steadily promoted. When he was twenty three days in his service as a general if you please you know he had an exciting adventure which brought him probably the only wound he ever received.

It was during the battle of Angelina gun, with two hundred men and a cowardly escort he was sent to carry a message to general Purgatorian at Vivian Wickey and to warn this rebel general of the intentions of the Christians who were hiding in the woods near the roadside fired upon them and then rushed out and made a headlong attack.

Sixty of Carl Staley's men fell dead and a hundred were wounded by that one volley and the rest captured or wounded. He himself was so severely wounded in the neck and arm and leg by musket balls that he came near fainting and certainly believed he was going to die. But wounded as he was he managed to cling to his horses neck and spurred him along the forest trail. One Angelinian hoping to get the general and make him a prisoner urged his own horse forward and for a time both enemies rode along side of each other struggling for mastery, but finally when the Angelinian saw that the enemy's animal was outstripping him, he gave up the chase, hurling his pistol with an angry yell at the escaping rebel general. The gladiolian general was soon safe in the hands of friends and succeeded in delivering the message.

During the outbreak of the siege of Vivian Wickey, his services were in a more than one critical situation of great value to the gladiolian cause. And now in the campaign which ended with Kindermine's defeat and repulse at Gorma Bridge for instance his whole brigade fought like true heroes.

General Kindermine himself had said:

"That rebel general Staley commands one of the finest brigades in the world."

Indeed it was regarded at that time as the finest brigade in the rebel army, and this was largely due to general Staley's skill in handling his vast column of men. He always made them feel as if they were one family. He was always thoughtful for their health and comfort, and he appealed to their pride but never to their fear. He was a very tall and a strong man with handsome features, and a very remarkable power to endure any hardships. Though a gladiolian, and a holder of seventy five thousand slaves all children, his manner was quiet and refined, and his noble bearing indicated a sense of honor. He was like by his companions because he was unlike other gladiolian generals, he was very good natured, and ready for all the most daring and dangerous adventures. General Isner Myletze made good use of this true gladiolian patriot and not long after taking command of a new gladiolian army he sent general Carl Staley with no nine hundred thousand picked men supplied with artillery and all army provisions to the northwest section of the region of Gorma's Bridge to threaten the Angelinian outposts. General Kindermine in command of the main Angelinian armies in the south, ordered general Maurice Costello to lead a body of soldiers against Staley.

Early in the morning of December fifth [XIX] 1912, after a hard night march, general Maurice Costello over confident of success, attacked general Staley near the very bridge in the northern part of the location. The gladiolians stood up bravely against the series of christian attacks for two days, and in the end after driving back all attacks, and capturing the christian positions, toward evening charged their batteries in the face of heavy odds and capturing the guns and routed the whole of Maurice Costello's command. General Maurice Costello lost nearly an almost his entire force, including six hundred thousand prisoners. General Kindernine was bitterly disappointed for his plan, undertaken in such confidence had ended in a most crushing defeat. However gathering a portion of his immense forces together, he set out to march rapidly across country in pursuit of general Staley, hoping to overwhelm him and recapture the six hundred thousand christian prisoners before he could join General Myletze's Army. But general Carl Staley was too confounded wary to be caught napping, and suspecting that this would indeed be general Kindernine's game, he retreated rapidly along the river banks in a northeasterly direction toward that part of the army under General Myletze. Meantime general General Myletze had heard the glorious news of the gladiolian victory near Norma's Bridge and he realized too that there was great danger of general Staley falling into the hands of Kindernine. To prevent this, and at the same time draw Kindernine away from his supplies at Jennie's Avian, he decided to go to Staley's relief. Sending his division by a much easier, roundabout route, he himself with a small guard rode swiftly a distance of ten miles across the rough country in the face of the besieging christian fortified works and joined Carl Staley on the last day of the first week of December. General Carl Staley was cleverly retreating northward toward Lucille's Rickson fortress with general Kindernine on his hot pursuit. For ten days the life for race continued with many pitched battles and skirmishes, and with the chances in favor of Kindernine for his army was larger, besides being better trained and disciplined. This was a famous retreat within the siege. It covered a distance of two to twenty six miles through the region of Red Riding Hood Woods, across four streams whose waters frozen over by solid waves, were blown into floating crags of ice by the rebel cannon covering the retreat, and thus checked the christians in their pursuit. When the last stream the Danna was crossed and forded the chase was so close that the rear of the retreating army had a fir fierce battle with the van of the pursuers. General General Myletze was so alert and skillful that he escaped every danger and saved his army.

In this most trying campaign valuable aid was given by gladiolian partisans in all parts of the rebel country. These of course were very private companies, not part of the regular armies if you please. Such companies had been formed however by any section of gladiolian territory owners, and that was why they were called "gladiolian Partisans". Maybe there were.

Perhaps the most partisan leader of the rebels was general Francis Santa Claus. He was born in Pandora An Calvernia in 17 1816 and though a giant gladius. By descent he favored the rebellion. Although as a child he was tremendously frail and delicate, and very sissy looking, had long curls of black hair and even at the age of six wore a dress in a instead of pants and other boys clothes. But though no one knew or thought he would amount to anything he grew stronger as he grew older. As a man he was sort short and slight of frame, but strong and hardy in constitution. At the outbreak of the rebellion when the Angelinian forces began to swarm into Calvernia Santa Claus raised and drilled a large brigade of rebel farmers, and forced many grown boy child slaves to join the army by conscription and by conscripting many loyal Calvernians he soon had a large army of rebels under his command called the "Santa Claus Brigade". For a long while these men and soldier boys were without uniforms or tents, and they unlike other gladiolians served for a time without pay. They did not look much like soldiers on parade, but were among the best and most bravest fighters of the Angelinian Revolution. Their first weapons and bayonets were beaten out of old saw mills at country forges and their first bullets were made largely from old pewter mugs, and other pewter utensils. Their rattles were always very scanty and simple. General Santa Claus their leader as a rule ate hominy and potatoes and like Marion in the American war against Brit drank water flavored with a little vinegar. It was once noted during the two months of the siege of Avian whiskey that one day an Angelinian officer was captured by his rebels and though an enemy general Santa Claus with his usual delicate courtesy invited his prisoner to dinner. We can imagine the surprise of the Angelinian officer when on an old log which made the camp table, there was served a dinner consisting of only roasted sweet potato potatoes, passed on pieces of bark for plates. The Angelinian officer was still more amazed indeed to learn that even potatoes of any kind was something of a luxury.

This division of troops called "Santa Claus's Brigade" seldom numbered more than seventy thousand, and often less than twenty. But with this very medium force of rebels he annoyed the besieging christians beyond measure by rescuing prisoners, making desperate raids into the christian lines, setting fire to whole encampments and by capturing supply trains and outposts. One day a rebel scout who had been a conscripted boy slave brought in the reply or report that a party of ninety thousand Angelinians with two hundred thousand prisoners, and many rescued child slaves in their possession were on the march for Norma's Bridge. Waiting for the darkness to conceal his movements, general Santa Claus with thirty thousand men sallied out swooped down upon this Angelinian camp and after a battle of lights duration captured the entire force of what remained, and rescuing all gladiolian prisoners and retaking the child slaves murdering many and carrying remainder off to row row their bondage. It was the custom of general Santa Claus when hard pressed by a superior force to scatter, each man looking for his own way out of the country.

succeeded in setting fire to all of them and succeeded in alarming the Angelinians. The warning was carried from one christian fleet to another, and one christian fleet was sent out from Min-Whirther bay to destroy or capture this destructive rebel fleet.

Early in the morning of December fifth 1819, after a hard night march, general Maurice Costello over confident of success, attacked general Staley near the very bridge in the northern part of the location. The glandelinians stood up bravely against the series of christian attacks for two days, and in the end after driving back all attacks, and capturing the christian positions, toward evening charged their batteries in the face of heavy odds and capturing the guns and routed the whole of Maurice Costello's army.

allnight duration captured the entire force of what remained, and rescuing all the glandelinian prisoners and retaking the child slaves murdering many and carrying the remainder off to renew their bondage. It was the custom of general clause's men when hard pressed by a superior force to scatter, each man looking out for himself. Often they would dash into a dark dense swamp or wooded country to meet again at some place agreed upon. Even while they were still in hiding, they would sometimes dart out as suddenly as they had vanished, and as surprise another force of Nationals which might be near at hand and capture them all.

"The Red Riding Hood Wolf." Was the name the Angolinians gave to general clause. With the aid of such partisan bands of rebel troops and with skilful handling of his army general Ial Iener Myletze was more than a match for general kindernine. He was not strong enough yet for any severe pitched battle but he always kept general kindernine chasing without losing his army losing his own army. That was about all he could hope to do for a while at least.

But when he received many brigades and regiments and artillery and other provisions from Miso-Hollister Johnston, and also received a new recruits from many drafted soldiers he thought it wise to strike the Nationals a severe and crushing blow, even though he could not win a victory, turning them therefore upon his enemy he fought a battle at Janets Count house, thirty miles north of Jennie's Bridge and further from Norma's Bridge. He was defeated with severe losses in men and even generals and much camp equipment but came off as well as he had expected, and so crippled the christian army under general kindernine that kindernine now in turn had to retreat back to where he started from. He sent many messengers to the river coast and Jennie's Bridge to get supplies for his half starved men. Like the battle on the heights near Norma's Bridge and at Evangelina Granda it was a dear bought battle for both sides.

General kindernine now saw clearly that he could not hope longer for any chance of success in the region of Norma's Bridge, and so having taken on fresh supplies and more men he marched southward with the purpose of reaching Jennie's Bridge. General Miso-Hollister Johnston, who was a regular George Washington of the way with an army of Miso-Hollisterians, Zimmermanians and Osmarians was at the time in camp at the Norma Bridge section of the river waiting for the coming of the long expected glandelinian fleets to Jennie's Bridge. That city was still in the hands of the Nationals.

As soon as this fleet should arrive, general Miso-Hollister Johnston expected to attack the Angolinians in Jennie's Bridge by land, while the fleet attacked it by bombarding the christian positions by the river. But the rebel fleet being defeated in a battle elsewhere was well on its way to the town of Gonklin instead of Jennie's Bridge as expected. When this information came to general Miso-Hollister Johnston, he worked out a bold and brilliant scheme. It was to march his army as quickly and as secretly as possible to Gonklin a distance of forty miles, there join the rebel army under Iener Myletze and Santa clause, and combining with the rebel fleet on its arrival capture the christian general kindernine. This daring scheme brought on a succession of bloody and sanguinary conflicts within a week's time, and succeeded very well in matters of great importance but general kindernine's army was not captured, and being reinforced by a new and big division and receiving more artillery he marched and fought his way desperately all the way to Jennie's Bridge fighting for nearly ten days contesting every inch of ground, and compelling one rebel general to surrender a brigade of eight thousand men.

While the rebellion was being fought out on the land sections outside of besieged Vivian Wickay, important battles were also taking place at sea as well as on the river. Until this siege began the Angolinians had not felt the need of a navy blockading Vivian Wickay but when the necessity came ships by thousands blockaded every water way to Vivian Wickay either by river or sea. Though in the possession of the enemy near Vivian Wickay the Elengigloosean and Boyling Islands were also watched closely by christian warships and cut off from Vivian Wickay and supplies for sure. But they were holding out gallantly also. Many rebel warships captured many christian merchant and transport vessels going through the region of these islands many of which were loaded with arms and ammunition intended for Angolinian soldiers. Power and provisions as you will remember were sorely needed by the besieged rebel armies.

Among the men who commanded these raiding rebel dreadnaughts and other war vessels in the region of these islands were some noted rebel admirals, the most famous of whom was Admiral Conklinia. This admiral proved himself so able that in the first four months of the great Vivian Wickay siege he had many sea expeditions through the dangerous waters and captured six hundred prizes. In the appointed time first having been a captain he was made an admiral and commanded a fleet of warships of his own.

His fleet after some battles were always annoying the christians whose besieging ships were always and frequently annoying rebels coats of the islands by burning and destroying property and making persistent bombardments of the island fortifications. Admiral Conklinia finally got permission to sail along the western coast of the Vivian Wickay shore and set fire to the large shipping yard near Miso-Whither's dock with which harbor he had been familiar in his boyhood. He meant to burn all the three thousand wooden vessels belonging to the christian besieging fleet lying at anchor there. Although he succeeded in setting fire to all of them and made one of the most spectacular fires of the war and succeeded in alarming the Angolinians, the warning was carried from one christian fleet to another, and one christian fleet was sent out from Miso-Whither bay to destroy or capture this destructive rebel fleet.

waiting for the darkness to conceal his movements, general clause with thirty thousand men sallied out swooped down upon this Angolinian camp and after a battle

As the Angelinian dreadnaughts carried more big guns, and were bigger ships, and had more better drilled men and gunners for fighting and was supported by a strong squadron of gun boats and merrimacs it was thought the christian fleet would make short work of the glandelinian fleet in a fight. But it was just the other way, for after the first section of the battle in which the nearly two thousand ships were engaged making a roar of guns like a million explosions going on incessantly the Angelinian fleet was repulsed having lost many men and nearly a hundred ships. After this brilliant success the young glandelinian admiral pursued the bonten christian fleet which turned and offered battle once more. Again during the second part of this struggle the Angelinian fleet against again got the worse of it, and nearly a hundred ships torn and ripped with cabins shot off and decks strewn be black with dead and wounded were leaking like baskets.

During the fierce conflict an Angelinian and rebel ship came alongside and fired broadsides at close range. Both were soon sinking together, being badly galled by the fire but the fighting went on as fiercely as ever. Presently both caught fire. When the rebel officer turned his cannon from the currents upon the main deck of the christian ship and brought down everything in its wreckage and ruin, but nevertheless the rebel commander with his ship more badly damaged and his crew almost annihilated was compelled to surrender. But the christian ship could not have held out much longer for even before the surrender she had half sunk already.

CHAPTER THIRTY TWO

OTHER ACCOUNTS OF THE SEIGE.

At the beginning of the seige of Adrian Wickay, the christian lines then not having secured any portions of gunbeam creek, and Jennie Adrian had been about forty miles distant from the city and had at first attacked and captured one small town after another and pushed back the rebel lines steadily a far as the mighty Norma gun river. Now this was done in the accounts of the recent advances and fierce fighting which began at Angeline gun and terminated at Red Riding Hood woods. All this distance had been contested by the rebels most obstinately but now the christians were within twenty miles of the city and many of her spires could be seen. At the time of the battle of Gunbeam junction they were ten miles from the city but that was all the further they could advance now for a while and the seige was growing in intensity and in greater tightness.

You remember also that when the last battle began at Evangelina Grania and Sabea creek simultaneously the night last section of the besieging christian armies were northeast of Norma Catherine. Now the enemy's plans and aid and all movements were found out by many christian generals was not through the means of famous christian spies. It was mostly done by Angelinian boy scouts and one of the most famous of these and a leader of many regiments of boy scouts was a lad of twelve years called Penrod. He was really an American lad by birth but his parents had when he was a small lad come over to Calvernia and thence when a older lad he had ran away from home to join the Angelinian army with the other boy scouts.

This boy in his earlier days had had many sweethearts but for a time he liked a little girl called Majoria Dora better than any of them but she did not seem very fond of him and on account of that he mainly entered the christian armies. Even when he first entered the christian lines the lad liked to wander into the great Red Riding Hood woods with musket and sabre of small size and was never so happy as when he was able to have an encounter with a troop of rebel cavalry of soldiers.

Once this more boy hero had wandered one day into the woods during the battle in the region some distance from the main christian lines and built himself a rude shelter of logs where he spent three days with only his rifle for company. As he was a good shot we may be sure he never went hungry for lack of food. Knowing where the foe lines were he used to steal into their encampments during the night at any risk and would secure any provisions needed and he cooked the food over a pile of burning sticks. If you my dear readers have done any outdoor camp cooking you can almost taste its woodland flavor. Then at night as he lay under the starlit sky with the skin of some wild animal for covering as a blanket any prince or man of high authority might have envied his dreamless slumber. This free wild life made him at home in the immense Calvernia forests, and but he was a rest less lad indeed and looked with longing toward the rugged rebel positions in the west. Along the foothills other christian positions had been formed, and young Penrod's imagination leaped to the scenery a beyond the christian lines, where the enemy encampments stretched for miles and miles no one knew how far along the Norma river. It was an immense wilderness of encampments teeming with rebel positions, fortresses and guns of all sizes, and he wanted to explore in it and see how the rebel positions lay. It was a most extremely dangerous undertaking but he undertook it. It was only twelve when he made the first long tour. At this time he went as far in the enemy encampments as what is known as Furgatarians camp, in the eastern section of Norma gun. This trip brought him peril and excitement but he escaped without being captured. Other trips doubtless he made which increased his love for spying and wandering among the foe encampments, and nine days after made his first trip having heard from a child slave of a wonderfully large rebel encampment far to the west of Norma gun river he started out with the child slave and four other lads in disguise to enter the rebel lines. As he began in the north of August '72, for five weeks these bold lads were in the enemy encampments for another during the night time, listening to conversation of rebel generals and facing many dangers from rebel snipers, and from being discovered. But when in the middle of August they reached the great encampments of general Jemellaster christians army on the border of a beautiful land of stretching fortified prairie pastures lofty fortified forests, and even fortified running stream streams they felt repaid for the hardships of their long nightly journey. They never traveled by day as this would have caused them to be discovered and be arrested. It was indeed as the child slave had said, the most immense encampment he had ever seen.

He happened to see in the foe encampment where Gargolian soldiers having a council were disguised in black hoods and regalia, but others wore the heads of Buffaloes, wolves, Bears, Elk, Deer, and wild beasts of all kinds known, making truly the strangest scene the world itself could have ever witnessed.

The lad at once put up a shelter not far from the rebel lines after having left it, and for six weeks they remained hidden close to the foe lines spying, taking notes, drawing maps of foe positions, and even trying to take pictures of the distant fortresses. Then one day two of the party of boy scouts, Penrod himself and a lad called Sterner while off on a scouting expedition, were captured by a squad of Gargolian cavalry. Enraged.

For several days the glandelinians carefully guarded the two boy captives. But on the seventh night having eaten greedily of game and provisions they captured in a raid upon the advanced position of the christian lines they fell into a sound sleep.

Then Penrod who had been watching for this chance arose quietly from his place among the sleeping rebels, and watching that the sentinels did not see his movements gently awakened his companion. The two then crept stealthily away until out of hearing of the rebels, when rising to their feet they bounded off like deer through the dark woods to their own little encampments but they found no one there, for the rest of the boy scout party were missing and the little shack had been badly burned. However Penrod and his companion stayed on and some days later they were pleasantly surprised when some more of Penrod's friends unexpectedly arrived with another lad and joined the camp. The four were quite contented, living and spying and scouting together, until one day Sterner was shot by a rebel sniper and killed. His death so tragic and so sudden frightened the other lad who had come over with his companion that the woods and foe lines lost their charm for the poor lad and he went back to the christian lines for protection. So only the two closest friends were left.

They remained together three weeks in the little cabin so close to the rebel lines and then as their powder and lead was getting low, his companion returned to the christian lines for a fresh supply, leaving Penrod to hold the ground of scouting tours. Now Penrod was left all alone.

His life was continually in danger from rebel soldiers. For fear of being surprised, he dared not sleep in camp at all for he was too close to the enemy lines, and so he hid himself at night in cane break or thick underbrush and other foliages, not even kindling a fire. Lest he should attract any rebel soldiers who may be touring through the woods. During these weeks of waiting for his companion he led a very lonely life indeed. In all that time he did not speak to a single human being, not even had he a dog cat or horse for company. Without salt, sugar or flour, his sole food was the game he shot, or what provisions he dared to seize from rebel encampments at night. Now gladly he must have welcomed his companion, who returned at the end of two weeks bringing the needed supplies. Other boys and scouts also came from time to time, and Penrod joined one party of them for a time, but several times it happened a number of lads were shot by prowling rebels and the party was again broken up.

After four weeks of this exciting time in the woods so close to the rebel lines Penrod returned to the christian lines.

snowy day and windy too before the hour of sunrise, he departed in the most secret manner with his comrades following later one by one, and arrived to the Christian lines under Constantinian Aronburg after a journey in many directions of one hundred and sixty miles just before Zimmerman had reached Vivian Wickey, during which the lad had but one meal and his companions were half starved. He or his comrades could not get any food for they dared not use their gun for game nor build a fire for fear their foes might find out where they were. They were also several times trodden by wolves and chased by rebel cavalry but escaped. They reached the Christian lines in safety and was of great service in giving the information so that the Angolinians were on the alert and able to beat off the attacking party. This was only one of the many narrow escapes of this fearless lad. Another incident on the way toward the Christian lines during his long journey has illustrated his quick wits. One day after he had with his companions covered about fifty miles fifty four rebels with loaded guns surrounded them from behind trees and rocks and surrounded the lads. The leader said:

"Now Penrod and your spying companions, we got you now. You no get away from us no more see! You no cheat us no more. We caught you at last." While they were speaking Penrod had taken from his pocket a round box of snuff and hastily opening the box he grabbed a lot in his hand and suddenly flung it into the faces of the rebels filling their eyes and nostrils. When while they were coughing and sneezing, and rubbing their eyes the lads managed to get out of the ring and escaped. These are but a few of Penrod's dangerous adventures. From then all he came out safe and proved to be one of the ablest boy scout leaders living. It was not however until sometime in the early or late part of the third year of the war before he came to know Violet and her sisters who were now at the time of his experiences in Andromeda going through their own harrowing experiences and making the sacrifices for the child slaves.

By the approach of November while he was a fugitive yet going toward the Christian lines the siege had become a terrifying spectacle with broadly expanded burning lines of artillery countless cannons in frequent action making noise like a world of volcanoes in eruption. It has been said that but for Penrod the flank of general Constantinian Aronburg's army then marching on Vivian Wickey would not have been saved from the well planned attack by the enemy generals. However this may be we now know that he was one of those fearless and daring little lads who so courageously helped to establish the whole Christian lines to better formation. Many and thrilling experiences the lad and companions with him had during that long journey. With no other companions but the boys and their rifles for protection they quickly and swiftly and patiently made their way through the trackless woods, crossing mountain range after mountain range onward until they came to the region where the rivers flowed westward had their beginning. Upon to their surprise they found here on the source of the unknown river, some other boys scouts on a long journey for Zimmerman's army who gave him and his companions a kindly welcome. Then late in the autumn he heard that the army of Abbotians was advancing his way. One corn in their leather wallets was now all they carried. All went well for a time but the depths of the pathless forest, they soon missed their way, and the hills and mountains became so steep and rough, that some of the boys could not get across. Other misfortunes befell them on this trip. The little stores of corn they had brought with them gave out, and in storms their powder became so wet that it was useless for shooting game or foes who might track them. So almost their only food for that long journey was such nuts and berries as they could gather in their desperate search. They were near death by starvation when they chanced to meet the advance guard of the advancing Christian army under Constantinian Aronburg. They gave Penrod and his companions food and asked them to join them. When allowing the boys to ride horses the lads were brought before Whilliam Zimmerman Zimmerman and told all he had learned.

You might think that this bitter experience would have made Penrod or his followers unwilling to risk another journey back through this barren wilderness toward the Christian lines at Vivian Wickey. But as we have said these boys were not easily thwarted, and the thought of returning back to general Zimmerman's army made him and his companions hold the cost light. He gave to the soldiers such glowing accounts of the nature of the siege of Vivian Wickey that the whole army advanced still more eagerly.

Let us in imagination join this advancing army of Aronburg as it started out on its forced march toward Vivian Wickey. Each regiment had its provision wagon carrying supplies for the armies while also each regiment of boys scouts and rescued women and children or child slaves have their pack horses, carrying household and other goods. These were not so bulky as ours of today for army life is more simple and the soldiers and refugees with them have only what they really need. There are of course for every soldier some rolls of bedding, and uniform and other clothing, a few cooking utensils, a few packages of salt and need corn and other food and a flask or two of medicine and wine or brandy. The pack horses also carry tired women or perhaps a very small child or two. These children and women and other refugees would be transferred to Abyssinians for safety as soon as they could be brought to railroad lines still running. The little boys who are old enough to shoulder muskets march in front of the girl children ready to shoot game for the army or stand a guard against the rebels. Some of the older children drive the horses of wagon trains which are going along with the army.

After reaching a place for a short encampment the younger children were set to help many soldiers and officers to clear away all the bar brush and pile it up in heaps for the making of camp fires. The men and older boys who are big enough to wield an axe lost no time in cutting down the trees to make protecting abatis and making a clearing for tents and other encampments. All worked industriously with a will. Penrod giving aid also and soon the encampments were ready for stop overs in the advance however the soldiers have no beds to lie upon but places are nevertheless found for the army water bucket used to bring water from the stream, the army dipper which with which to fill it, and other small utility utensils. If the soldiers are officers there may be tucked away in some of the packs a wool blanket but usually the chief covering for the soldiers when they lay down is the dried skins of animals, deer bear or perhaps cloths and woolen ones. There was plenty of food though of course it was plain and simple, consisting mostly of game or other slight provisions captured during raids. Instead of the pork and beef which are largely eaten by us we shall find these immense numbers of Christian soldiers making their meal of bears meat or venison. For flour corn meal is used. Each soldier has a mill of some kind for grinding the kernels into meal, while for beating beating it into a hominy they used a crude mortar made perhaps by burning a hole into the top of blocks of rounded wood or logs. Bread making is a most simple matter with them than with us, for indeed a dough of corn meal is mixed on wooden trenchers and then either baked in the ashes and called ash cakes, or before a fire on a board or piece of thick wood or log and called honey cake. Corn meal is also made into mush or hasty pudding, and when certain regiments of the troops have secured cows and other cattle mush and milk is a common dish especially for supper.

For butter the army uses the fat of bears meat or the gravy of the geese and other roasted fowl. Instead of coffee they make a drink of parched rye and beans, and for tea they boil sassafras roots. Every Angolinian soldier no matter whether he is in the artillery corps, infantry or cavalry must be able to use a rifle fire to so a good effect for most of the time during long marches they have to usually provided for their own meat and protect themselves from attacks by rebel prowlers. He must be skillful also in hiding if you please, in moving noiseless through the forest, and in imitating the notes and calls of many different beasts and birds. Sharp eyes and ears, must tell him where to look for either his game or pursuing enemies, and if he values his life his aim must be swift and sure. But most important of all he must be able to endure all hardships and exposure. Sometimes the soldiers lived for months in the wooded countries during the longest campaigns in the war with no food but meat and no shelter but a lean to bush or even the trunks of hollow trees, caverns, ravines or the ground of the forests.

Deer and bear were supposed to be the most plentiful game but the enemy had secured all these themselves, and during long advances there has been now and then but very frequently exciting combats with Gargolian squadrons, Zimmermanian regiments, while prowling and landmines of other sorts kept them ever on their guard. All the Angolinian soldiers must be strong, alert and very brave.

Each soldier depends upon himself for most of the necessities of life. Each soldier has his own work.

All the boy scouts in all of the besieging Christian armies had learned like the soldiers, to imitate bird calls and animals also, to set traps, to shoot a rifle and pistol, and to be able to make and understand all kinds of drum and flag signal and shooting signals. He knew from just within look loophole to shoot through if rebels attacked a barricade and the lads took pride in becoming good marksmen. They were carefully trained also to follow on the trail of escaped rebel spies and prisoners and to conceal his own when pursued himself, for such knowledge would be very useful to him as a hunter of spies and a fighter.

Such was the life and ways of Penrod Schofield and his companions and to this life Penrod and those who went out with him soon became accustomed. On the arrival of Zimmerman's army near Dunbeams Creek, in coming upon other Christian forces the newcomers singled readily with the Angolinian armies already on the ground and the new troops were shown to their new positions and encampments by thousands of boys scouts.

Penrod soon became one of the leading little boys scouts. Once his camp stood on a little island in the river and is said to have been the only one constantly under fire and whenever once did the lads desert their post of sentry duty. This spy settlement had a long veranda in front, several rooms, a loft, and best of all a huge fireplace made of sticks and stones laid in a way in which a pile of blazing logs, roared on the cold days of that Galverinian winter making it a centre of good cheer as well as of heat and warm warmth. To us if not under fire of rebels I suppose it would have been a most inviting spot for a summer holiday.

LITTLE PENROD SCHENFIELD A BRAVE LITTLE LEADER IF YOU PLEASE...

In his stay in this little spying settlement near the enemy's side of the river shore Penrod was very prosperous in his work securing many important information of the foe's actions and movements but several days later at the beginning of real winter a restless craving for a change and an adventure stole over him and his companions and he went forth on one more into the wilderness to seek some better and more important information about the enemy's doings, and to find a secret foe encampment which he had heard was still deeper in the Red Riding Hood forest.

The place he chose to go to to spy on the rebels was the beautiful country lying along the Great North Bend of the Norma gun river where Jennie's civilian stands. Many bold followers were ready and even eager to join daring Penrod in this new but very dangerous venture, for he thought a lad was a borne leader. A small party went ahead early in the morning to secure provisions to that the expedition might have food when they reached their source. Penrod and eighty other lads who made up the daring party left the island in the Norma river and went by the Red riding Hood wilderness road, through Sunbeam Gap, crossing the Sunbeam Creek. When following the trail of newly formed plank road in a northwesterly direction, they came within sight of the goal. They saw coming toward them something that resembled a strange procession. One section of the procession made up mostly of women and children were approaching by waywater in dugouts, flatboats, canoes, and rowboats. The other part of the procession was approaching by land, and halloing something suspicious to be up the lads hid behind trees, and began a tedious four hours waiting for the results. When they saw that rebels soldiers in ambush were attacking the women and children who proved to be fugitives from some place, and it was believed that the rebels had attacked them many times during their long journey, and the boats were so slow and clumsy that it was impossible for them to escape the flight of bullets and any dying were found on the flatboats when the swarm of boys came went to their rescue returning the fire of the rebels and causing a hot skirmish.

As the boys some of them went back to the camp with the rescued parties, the other lads continued on their way with Penrod but soon found much difficulties and troubles with rebels hiding here and there in ambush. Bands of rebels coming from unseen quarters in the woods began to make life wretched for the brave lads. The rebels became a constant terror. They killed the boys who when ever they could, and had tricked several boys by imitating the gobbling of a turkey or the call of some wild beast, and then pounce upon the human prey and kill or take him prisoner. So the lads from being attacked frequently became lost and had to scour the woods for food on their hasty return toward the christian lines, living on nuts and small game. By the time the winter had set in they had used up so much of their powder and bullets in resisting rebel snipers that they resolved to return to the christian lines by dark in the river itself. They decided to camp in a secret section of the woods by day and soon one was hastily erected. There was much to talk about during the day, and they stayed up until late in the evening. Many of the lads during the day itself had laid down in their huts tired and sleepy and without any fear. Soon half of the number of lads were in deep slumber except Penrod, whose sense of lurking danger would not let him sleep. He kept feeling that enemy enemies might be near. And he was right. For just outside the little encampment prowling in the thick underbrush and hidden by the great trees, there lay in ambush a band of Gargolian troops hooded in their disguise, hungry for plunder and eager to kill or take as many prisoners as possible. They crept silently forward in their attack. They were very cautious for a bright moon lit up the little encampment and a palisaded fort near by. Suddenly a moving shadow falls upon the moonlight clearing outside the fort. A glendelinian soldier was stealthily crossing from the dark woods to the wall of the small encampment. There he crouched close, to be out of sight of the inmates of the encampment. Another crouching figure and still another. One by one every gray uniformed soldier crosses and keeps close to the palisade. The next move was to slide cautiously the strong bar, and under the chain which fastened the gate itself. It was done skillfully enough, but the chain clanked and the hinges creaked loudly. The wakeful lad Penrod spring sprung quickly to his feet. His keen eyes caught sight of the swift, dark gray figures, moving toward stealthily into the small encampment.

"Rebels!" He shouted and off went his rifle. Instantly every lad had snatched the gun lying at his side. In a second the fusillade of shots rang out, and after a fierce skirmish, the glendelinians fled through the gate, to disappear into the leafy woods. But they had lost ten men, when Penrod and his comrade comrades had shot and had killed or wounded three of the boys. Penrod by his keensightfulness had saved the encampment from capture, and his comrades from probable torture or death.

CH PTER THUTY THREE

AN OCCURRENCE DURING THE EARLY PART OF THE MONTH OF JANUARY.

IT WAS NOW JANUARY and the battle of Sunbeam Creek and Evangelina Granit had passed and general Hanson Vivian having abandoned his siege of Evangelina Granit Evangelina Granit had fallen back to gunbeam Creek and fortified his lines and so prepared to throw up new positions. During the time of his encamping a bunch of rebels under general pherokee made bold and murderous attacks upon many gallant advanced encampments of the retreated christian army under general Hanson Vivian, extending these bloody depredations from Jennie Viviana, to gorman ossinia.

As camp Whitagaga was the nearest portion of the advanced encampment it suffered most from one of these petty attacks of the rebels. General Robertson commanded the encampment with Sevier Johnston as his lieutenant. Only forty or fifty thousand men were in this encampment when it was attacked, although it was crowded with children who had been child slaves rescued recently after the repulse of the christians at Evangelina Granit. It was in the gray light of the early morning that a large force of sixty thousand rebels stole up for the attack. But a scout had given warning of the coming danger and all the Angolinians were ready. The trenches were like a stream of fire as the rebels attacked, and after fierce fighting the enemy was beaten back with heavy loss. This was the beginning of a long dreary siege of the encampment. As the encampment fortified by works and palisades and hastily erected stockades was too strong to be taken by a desperate assault, the rebels though close to the main line of the christian army, cut off all communication of the small camp with it, and tried to starve the soldiers and children out of it. For about three weeks they lurked about firing cannons and muskets incessantly day and night, and attacking so often, and burning so many tents and houses so that the people and soldiers within the camp dared not go outside for food, and had to live mostly on parched corn. It was a weary one. As you may imagine, all became very tired of that diet, and were very impatient at being kept shut up within the encampment so long, and from time to time some one would venture out to try and get to the main christian lines and get aid, heedless of warning and of danger.

In running this risk sixteen soldiers were shot down by the rebels or taken prisoner, and one boy scout captured was carried off out of range of the christian fire and burned at the stake because he would not reveal the strength and condition of the besieged.

A woman and three little girls were also captured and murdered in the same way.

You will be interested in the thrilling experience of a little girl heroine called Jennie Murver. She was about eight or nine years old and beautiful but brave and innocent looking, graceful, and gentle in manner and as we shall see not lacking in courage. One day she decided to make the break for general Hanson's main army and no sooner had she ventured some distance from the encampment when six rebels dashed out of the forest and sprang toward her with fixed bayonets shouting shouting to her to stop in the name of the king. Seeing her danger she hastily climbed the nearest tree, and then swinging from one tree to another like a little monkey monkey got safely beyond the besieging rebel force fired upon as she was and then ran on through the other woods with nearly a myriad of her bloodthirsty foes close at her heels. It was a race for life and she knew it. She was pursued for three days and nights, sometimes eluding her pursuers and again being hard pressed by them, and soon reaching general Hanson's main line saw the foe so close upon her that she realized there was no time to reach the lines and she climbed the highest tree and started shooting with a small rifle in the direction of the foe. When getting down as the foe started to chop down the tree she ran the shortest way to the main encampment, caught hold of a picket sentinel she happened to run across and begging him to save her. He however had not run past him as she had expected but into the arms of the guard, for he was standing directly in her path and caught her. He witnessed her danger, and helped her to escape by shot shooting down the rebels closest to her.

The little girl immediately brought the news that general Ferguson of the foe one of the ablest leaders of general Hanley's main army was threatening the besieged encampment with annihilation. At once general Hanson Vivian ordered general Isaac Shelby and general Sevier to take their brigades and march against the rebels besieging general Robertson. Soon a hundred thousand men were riding and marching through the woods with artillery and provisions and wagon trains to meet this rebel force of which every man except the commander, was a Zimmersmannian. They came upon the besieging force in a strong position near Cedar Nile. Without delay the whole christian force made a furious assault. One division after another of the christian forces fighting with great heroism heroism. The Angolinian brigades for every onslaught charged against the strong rebel positions with reckless bravery. They were usually divided into many brigades and bodies of men, but main forces were in three wings, one on the right of the rebels, one on the left, and another in front. General Sevier commanded the division on the left. After fighting for all day at just the right moment, he led his men in a resistless rush against the centre of the foe position helped by the assault of the besieged Angolinians and this made victory certain. One of the rebel regiments unable to escape raised the white flag of surrender. All of this regiment's soldiers who had not been killed or wounded were made prisoners.

By this victory the Angelinians greatly weakened the main force of rebel besiegers. In his usual way general Sevier driving back his besiegers and joining the main force which had come to his help struck a swift crushing blow, by pushing the foe back and destroying their encampments and a thousand barracks, and destroyed fifty hundred thousand bushels of their corn and other provisions. In spite of this defeat however the rebels on the morning renewed the fighting with redoubled ferocity. A general Robertson determined to strike a blow himself. At the head of fifty thousand men he charged over the enemy lines and after taking the main works, burning two other encampments, and three buildings of army barracks extending for ten miles capturing two hundred horses, destroying a large quantity of provisions, and doing other damage, he made the remainder of the enemy withdraw to the protection of the Evangelina Granita Heights. His under the rebels after afraid for the time being. These glimpses into the life of general Robertson himself met help you understand why he became a hero among all the Angelinians under his command. They admired him for his brilliant leadership, they were very grateful for his protection, and they loved him as a friend very dear to them. They on, called him many good nicknames and without doubt few of his men were his equal as a fighter. It was said that in all his fighting during the siege of "Ivian Wickley" he won thirty five great victories and never lost a battle. As we can imagine he moved with the greatest swiftness upon his rebel foes. Through his most able scouts he learned the strength and weakness of his enemies, and before they realized what was going on with a wild shot he and his bold army of soldiers swept down upon them like a hurricane, striking terror to the hearts of even the bravest.

Three weeks after the battle of Evangelina Granita this general was active in all parts of the field in the battle of Aurandacillo even to the last hour of his life. When at the height of the tremendous conflict he was at the head of a large brigade of Abyssinians, and during the thickest of the fray he was wounded ten times the last wound being mortal. He died two days later in his tent with many soldiers and officers around him and many children also. He was buried where he died, and a simple slab with his name inscribed upon it and the heroism heroism he displayed indicated the spot near Jennie Ivian where his body rested. Very after the war stories of his brave deeds and the brave deeds of other Christian generals were still told to eager listening children, for his memory was held dear in the hearts of old and young alike. In all Angelina owes much to this brave, loyal, and high minded general who played a large part in shaping her destiny.

THE EXPEDITION OF GENERAL HUBERT JACOB EN MANLEY.

Among the foremost of those who promoted himself to great heroism was general Hubert Manley the brother of general John Jackson Manley. He was born in Calvernia in the town of Monticello, November 19th 1868. He and his brothers came of a good mother but his father was a wicked cruel child slave driver and all his sons inherited their fathers wicked cruel nature. Hubert Manley was the worse of all in cruelty and yet a brave man. He and his brothers had received fairly good training in school and were good Catholics when small, but when grown they abandoned their religion and became like their father who was even now still living. When twenty years old he was already in the Christian army in the rank of a general and did something worth while in his efforts to excite his country to start a revolution against Abbie man.

About two years later, he had command of many vast armies, and when later the deadly struggle was going on in Calvernia, general Hubert Manley took his armies from Calvernia and by sea and by way of Ivian Wickley and the secret tunnels soon overran all of northern Calvernia. Why it was that in hardly six months time this young Christian general of twenty four rose to a position of high generalship among the rebels, and was chosen his Holiness' Johnstone's adviser later on we shall probably see when we come to understand his sterling qualities.

Wicked as he was in character and cruel and fierce a man as he was, nevertheless nature had given him a very pleasing face which any man not knowing him could have trusted. His forehead was kind of high and broad under a shock of blond or sandy colored hair, and apparently honest blue eyes peered out from under heavy shaggy eyebrows. In strong body could endure almost any hardships, and his splendid health was matched by his adventurous spirit. His fearless courage was equal to any danger great as it was and his resolution or resolute purpose, could not give way at all in the face of almost insurmountable difficulties.

The great task he had to perform during his service in the army could have been utterly impossible except as he possessed these qualities, and we know that no one comes by them suddenly. They grow by bravely and unflinchingly conquering the fears of every day life and not giving in to difficulties.

It was in this way that the many fearless Christian rebel generals quickly recognized him or in him a warlike spirit and since one of the most daring and wisest of Christian generals ever living, general Hubert Manley as you may imagine was not content to remain in Calvernia as merely a stationary general and bold leader of war parties sent out to hunt the only roving small bands of Angelinian soldiers, for only to direct the movements of women and children as he was sent to do his own mind during the progress of the rebellion had worked out a most brilliant plan which hoping for success he was eager to carry through. It was nothing less than to conquer for his country and for the cause and help of the rebellion the vast stretch of land lying northward of the region approaching Besiged Ivian Wickley and her fortresses, and part of the Horns gun, now included in the present Lake Angelina and Lake St. George. If this could be accomplished he would be able to bring up his vast army and strike a blow on the rear of the army of Christian leaders.

In this vast region of Calvernia forest and prairie the only settlements to oppose him were the scattered Calvernian hamlets, begun in the early days before the war, when the Calvernians and Angelinians coming there occupied the land and traded with the Abyssinians for the provisions. These hamlets had passed into the hands of the Christian authorities since the beginning of the rebellion and were to be the centers of Christian power, from which we will see the Christian leaders drafted many local Calvernians who claimed themselves as born Christians and put them into armies to use against the Angelinians in all territories. These few villages which were defended by strong fortresses, were scattered here and there on the approach to Ivian Wickley at convenient places along the mighty river courses, all these having been captured by the Christians during general Hubert's advance on Ivian Wickley to help general Hubert Ivian in the siege of the strong fortress. These three were in the possession of strong Christian forces. Over all the rest of the territory, scattered hostile Angelinian forces in small and other troops acrossing the country for hundreds of miles in efforts to catch out for any possible rebel armies that may have into them to move upon any portion of the rear and flank of the besieging Christian armies.

To be surprised by these forces was absolutely dangerous and general Manley saw that if this region should be reconquered and the surrounding prairie be run upon as for the gathering of rebel soldiers he would have to make a bloody campaign. As the first step in carrying out his desperate plan, he needed to secure aid from Calvernia. Early in October he started out on horseback from the town of Herod one of the rebel settlements to ride through the forests and over the mountains to reach the capital of this section of the Calvernian state at Am. So urgent was his task that he stopped on the way only a single day at his fathers army general Johnston Jacob Manley being the far on ruler, and then pressed on to his destination. It took him a whole month to make this journey of six hundred and twenty miles and when he reached Am he was well exhausted and out of provisions.

And yet he was far from Ivian Wickley or his places of goals.

He reached Calvernia still garrisoned by an immense rebel army, and the rebel commander there general Hubert Manley who at once fell in with general Hubert Manley's plan. He arranged that the government authorities of the city of Calvernia should furnish sixty million six hundred and six thousand men and nearly ten billion dollars. But as it was needful indeed that the utmost secrecy should be preserved nothing was said about the matter to the Calvernian Assembly.

General Hubert Manley was to raise other forces to add to his army among the rebel frontiersmen in Calvernia. The whole burden of making the necessary arrangements rested upon him.

MANLEY STARTS ON HIS LONG CAMPAIGN.

With good heart he shouldered it, and in November was ready with one hundred and fifty thousand more men to start from the Red Stone Junction on the Sandstone river. He stopped both at Salenburgh Landing and Wheeling for needed supplies and during the advance captured many prisoners and supplies and provisions in during raids his officers made. Then part of the army went in flat and gunboats and other ships manned by many officers, floating cautiously down the river while the other force

But the same misfortune of meeting with some disaster which had already cost the Angolians many a victory here again saved the day for the wicked rebel armies. And the weather had become so cold, and the route was so long and the other difficulties in his way so great that Jimmie Viviane advanced with a rebel scout. About a few weeks later general Manley learned from a rebel scout how small the christian force was under general Jimmie Viviane. You may be sure Manley did not wait for someone to change. quick to realize this was his chance to drive Jimmie Viviane back toward Vivian Wickay, he gathered his whole force of rebels nearly half of them Mio-Hollesianians, and in a few days he was on his way to meet Jimmie Viviane himself.

MANLEY CAPTURES NILES CENTRE.

The route two hundred and forty miles in length led eastward across what was known as Calverinia Tillingsmeier. As often happened at this season the weather had grown so cold that the ice and snow had tawed, and the Angolians retreating this, and of Manley's pursued had dined up rivers caused causing many of them to overflow, and the meadows and lowlands which lay along a large part of the route were under water from three to five feet deep. And we can remember also that by burning and blowing up and destroying in every way possible the retreating christian army left no houses or any place for the shelter of the advancing enemy. strong obstructions of every kind were made, and all bridges were across streams were destroyed or broken down, and so we can imagine something of the hardships thereabouts had to face in the long journey against Jimmie Viviane slowly retreating army. Only strong men could endure such exposure.

Knowing that cheerfulness would help greatly in keeping his men well and willing, general Manley encouraged feasting and merry making of all sort as all campers were gathered at night around blazing logs and sticks of the many camp fires. There the food provisions secured in many raids were cooked and eaten, while many soldiers sang or danced according to their own customs, others sat before the huge fires and told thousands of exciting stories about hunting, long marches and bloody warfare. When warmed and fed well all lay down in their tents, under shelter of trees. And by the fire for the night rest, and many sentries were placed on the outskirts of the immense camps. As long as this lasted the journey was by no means hard but by the end of a week conditions had changed for they had reached the lands drowned by the floods caused by the christians checking the rivers.

Coming first to the two branches of the Little Sunbeam Creek, they found the floods so high already that the land between the two streams was entirely under water, and they were facing a mighty river twenty miles wide and at no point less than from three to ten feet deep, while of course all his men make log rafts.

But general Manley was resourceful. He at once had all his men make log rafts and dugout canoes and ordered them to take what boats they had with them. In this he and the army rowed across the first branch of the river, and on the edge of the water covered plains put up immense scaffolds. Then the men and baggage and artillery were ferried across in the hundreds of thousands of pirogues and other boats, and the baggage and artillery was placed on the scaffolds. Last of all the many pack and cavalry horses and those pulling wagons even the channel without much mishap and standing by the scaffold in water up to his hips received again their immense load of baggage. All then finding themselves to be steadily under fire from an unknown christian position were compelled to proceed more hastily to the second channel which was crossed in the same way. It took no time to build the pirogues with so many men working at them and being skillful but it took three days and nights to get the immense army and baggage and artillery across the two flooded branches of the river.

During this time hunger was added to the other sufferings of the men, for the flood had driven all the wild animals away so that there was no longer any game to shoot and time and again they had encountered roaming parties of retreating christians who constantly poured upon the advance forces a harassing fire of rifles. Advance thus on account of the flood, abatis, and other obstructions they met and also from opposition was slow and extremely tiresome, for the men had to march from morning till night up to their waists in mud and water, and it was a sad scene to see how the many horses tugged and pulled to get cannons and cannons and wagons through the mire. Many wagons had to be abandoned when stuck in the mud but the artillery got through so far though covered thick with dark mud. They were now nearing the region of the Great Horns River.

On December 20th the men were quite exhausted and suffered from the ambushes they always encountered here and there. There had been nothing to eat for nearly two days. Many of the rebels themselves were so downcast that they began to talk of going home. General Manley putting on a brave face laughed and said:

"Go home if you want to but the Nationals roaming about will shoot down Glandelinian stragglers like deer."

But meanwhile his men noting under all orders had built three huge rafts about three hundred feet long each and on the morning of the 22nd the entire force was ferried across the other stream belonging to the sunbeam river known as the Eva St. Chair.

One on the side of this stream where the distant town of Niles Centre stood, they began to feel more cheerful, for by night they expected to be near the town and confronting the christian army under general Viviane's sons. It was well they did not know what awaited them, for they had yet a bitter experience to go through. Almost all the way was under water even as far as Horns Run whose levees the christians had blown up to stop his advance, and as they continued on they often stepped into hollows where the water came up to their chins and the artillery if they pressed forward until they reached a hillock and other foot hills, where they prepared to pitch tent and fortify themselves and spend the night. During the night his advanced guard was surprised by a force of Angolians which made a desperate attack, and the conflict raged all night. During the long hours of that trying hour and night when many times it seemed possible as if the christians were going to win the conflict general Manley had kept up the spirits of his men in every way he could. In telling about it later he said:

"During the battle of Hillock Mountain I received much help from the antics of a little Glandelinian drummer boy and by many of my boy scouts who showed me by signs just where the heaviest christian attack was launched. We repulsed the christian foe by morning and they retreated but I had lost heavily in men and provisions."

Starting out again late the next morning many men were so weak and famished that they had to be taken in the canoes, and the Glandelinians even killed the great numbers of child slaves they had with them not all of them but a great number, while those who were strong enough to wade came to water too deep to walk through, and painfully struggling began to huddle together as if all hope had fled and worse of all many unseen christian foes began firing at them many times at distant objects and trees picking of the rebels by scores and many times a desperate expedition found a watery or muddy grave. When as many became exhausted, suddenly he blackened his face with mud and gunpowder, and sounding a "Devil Yell" fearlessly sprang forward. His men plunged in after him without a word. By dusk they were still six miles from Niles Centre. Their clothing was drenched, their muscles ached with weariness, and they were well up exhausted from lack of food. To make matters worse, the weather that day was bitterly cold and the water froze to their uniforms. Yet the worse experience of the whole trying march was to come.

Before them stretched what appeared to be a shallow lake five miles in extent but was only a flood. With something like a score of the strongest and bravest warriors just behind him, general Manley himself plunged into the ice cold water, waist deep. When they had gone about half way across some of them were so cold and weak that they could not take another step. So the canoes, boats, and rafts were kept busy rescuing them and getting them to land. Those who though weak were still able to keep their feet, clung to the strong and prodded forward. When they finally reached the eastern section of the Red Riding Hood Woods bordering the farther side of the flood, they had not strength enough to pull themselves up, but clung desperately to bushes and logs and trees on the shore, even exposed to the fire of canoes far off, until canoes were so exhausted that they fell upon the ground with their faces half buried in the water. But the stronger ones built fires and fed them broth made from some venison or from the flesh of slain child slaves they had taken along with food and warmth courage soon returned.

In the afternoon a part of the army started out and soon by night all the army was setting out again. After crossing a narrow stream by pontoons and rafts and by wading and marching a short distance they reached a forest covered with long lines of cannon. Here they made a stop, and hidden by the trees threw up positions of their own, raised their own artillery and made their own and soon were ready for the attack. Here was severe fighting three days later but the coming of Christmas two days before and it was continued for two days with respiratory losses on both sides, and both sides charged back and forth in many clear charges. When general Manley demanded the surrender of the town, Jimmie Viviane and on the following night made an assault so desperate and tremendous that it made, it certain to general Manley that he was not going to be able to even ab Jimmie Viviane's army leave the town and he had to abandon the attack, but he realized in the words nevertheless Manley expected capture of Niles Centre as the first stroke of his gigantic hope for conquest against the besieging army at Vivian Wickay. He had succeeded in so many of the boldest enterprises undertaken in Calverinia by the rebel armies in this campaign that he expected at all costs to capture Niles Centre. All the vast region he had set out to conquer now still remained under Angollian control thanks to general Jimmie Viviane, and in carrying out his own plans to frustrate general Manley Jimmie Viviane had not only risked his life and health, but he had used up nearly all of his own provisions and own property and money until if it was not for his own father's riches he would have put himself into poverty.

In his modesty general Jimmie Viviane had always felt himself unfit to be a start to lead the Angollian armies in time of war as he had only been the outbreak of the rebellion only a captain of a fleet plundering rebel possessions along the shores of Vivian Wickay. In fact this new kind of service was for him perhaps the hardest that he had ever tried to render his country and he was wholly astonished at his tremendous victory at Niles Centre. Yet as he believed with all his heart in the Angelinian cause he had decided to accept the offer of generalship and now since his victory at Niles Centre and in keeping the brave general Manley at bay he was ordered by general Mansion through Hanson, Ivian dogged to fall back slowly toward Punkin Centre and hold ground there, and if Manley still followed to offer him general battle there.

So on Christmas day during the time general Hanson was engaging the foe at Norma, Ivian after being informed of the order he ordered the retreat and started with his officers far ahead of the main army it being probably a seven days journey to Punkin Centre. He wished to a retreat as quietly as possible but the many women and children who came to greet his troops were so eager to show their love for him and his brave men that they thronged to meet and welcome him at every stage of the slow retreat. When he passed through the southern part of the more better section of Red Riding Hood Woods under an escort of brightly uniformed generals, he rode a prancing black steed almost alike to the horse known as Jack Beauty and had a crown of laurel on his head, but the most touching tribute of all he received at Punkin Centre. Uncle Josh and others were there, and on a large bridge spanning the Gunbeam river which he had crossed a more than once when he was battling for his country's cause was despite winter weather the most tremendously and most beautiful floral arch. Under this a party of matrons and many little girls carrying baskets of flowers took their stand. As Jimmie Ivian passed beneath the arch the little girls sang a song of welcome and strew many flowers in the road before him. Many a little girl he had embraced that day. On the arch was the motto "The Hero who defended his country's cause will also defend mothers and daughters and end schild slavery and all its horrors forever."

When he arrived on the other side of the stream he was met by a committee of both houses of other generals. They escorted him to a handsomely equipped boat, manned by fifteen pilots all dressed in yellow uniforms. Landing on the Jennie Ivian side he rode through the streets amid throngs of shouting people and soldiers and women and children, with salutes thundering from warships, and from cannon on the batteries, and bells ringing joyfully from church steeples, to give him a welcome.

On that same day a new general was commissioned to the army. The new general was escorted out to a balcony overlooking a large space in the streets below, which were thronged with people, women and children and soldiers and other officers. He took his seat by the side of a yellow covered table on which lay a Cathi Catholic bible.

As the new general stood up face to face with the Angelinian chancellor of the State of Angeline Ivian of Calvernia, who was to give the oath, a deep hush fell on the multitudes of men women and children and soldiers below. "Do you solemnly swear" Asked the chancellor "That you will faithfully execute the office of generalship of the christian armies, and will to the best of your ability, preserve, protect and defend all women and children imperiled by rebel armies?"

"I do indeed solemnly swear," answered the general. "That I will faithfully execute the office of such generalship and will to the utmost of my ability, preserve, protect and defend the women and children in the face of any advancing foe even at the cost of my life."

Then with deep earnestness he bent and kissed the bible three times which was held before him with the whispered prayer. "Go, Heide me Sacred Heart of Jesus and the Blessed Mother of God."

"Long lives the new general," exclaimed the chancellor, and the excited throng took up the cry shouting with wild enthusiasm. Thus was a new general commissioned.

A PECULIAR EXPEDITION.

Before general Jimmie Ivian had repulsed general Manley's attack and advance on Niles Centre general Conventinian Aronburg who was at the time getting ready to mass troops upon Aurandocille had planned an expedition to explore the region of the enemy. Two main christian generals of the christian army whose names were withheld for a time were put in command of the expedition. They were to ascend the Norma gun river if you please to its very head if possible and then find the nearest water way to Vivian wickoy Bay. They were directed to also draw maps of the whole region and of the fortresses and Vivian wickoy itself, and to report on the nature of the country, and the size and strength of the enemy, to find out why they were holding out against the siege of Stubbornly and other matters of interest to the main christian generals.....

This expedition was started if you wish to know in the month of October and so in that month the small army of forty thousand men (small army indeed) left the main christian armies and in disguise started up the Norma gun River, passing by the rebels. After two days of marching they reached the region where general Mic-Holleston Johnston's army was or had been, the last rebel encampment they passed on the Norma gun. Leaving that they found no more rebel encampments for a time, and so there was no lack of food. On the middle of the month of October they arrived at the region of the main stretches of rebel lines situated at the great Bend of the Norma gun river. The enemy here who camped occupied countless great huts, and the entire camp was called Fort Hermer. Although the rebels not discovering them in their disguise gave them no trouble, the explorers suffered greatly from cold and hunger, from peril of wolves and panthers and many died. Nevertheless as they reached the northern region of Vivian wickoy they found it to be a new country to them. They met few rebels fortunately though dangerously near the rebel lines, and to prevent themselves from being discovered or fired upon they acted all like rebels themselves. And for their provisions seen secured from the rebel encampments such things as sage fowl, and prairie fowl, ducks and geese of all sorts, swans, and even wild cranes and huge geese.

They saw that the enemy even had in their encampments to draw their artillery to places of advantage deer, elk, and even whitetail and black tail reindeers, and antelopes, and even big horned sheep and cows and countless horses. They even had herds of tame buffalo which ploughed their way through deep snow dragging gun caissons and artillery to their respective places. To the explorers it was indeed the strangest sight they had ever witnessed. It was known however many of the animals the enemy had secured were very tame for they had not learned to fear man.

Yet among the rebels the explorers found indeed some very dangerous enemies. One was an officer who recognized some of the Angelinians, and from another a number of rebel boy scouts and they had to be careful lest they be seen and attacked. But the greatest scourge of all were the tiny children who acted all like rebels themselves. And for their provisions seen secured from the rebel encampments such things as sage fowl, and prairie fowl, ducks and geese of all sorts, swans, and even wild cranes and huge geese.

The last week of October was almost upon them when they arrived at the main section of Vivian wickoy and were surprised to see that a great and terrible fire was raging in that quarter for over Andrian was a sea of smoke and immense pillars of it rose from the city. This was the fire which had a narrow escape from as we already had read. They however realizing their hardest task had not to be accomplished did not pay much attention to the fire great as it was though to them it was the worse fire they had ever seen in their lives and looked such like the smoke pall of a gigantic crater of a volcano in eruption. Tongues of flames shot hundreds of feet above the city making a scene worth watching.

Before them rose high rebel positions teeming with cannons and shaping such like high embankments, supposed to be called fortifications. These they knew were the main things to study upon and draw maps of. The boats in which they had come the day far now being useless were left behind and horses were wiped from the trails during the night enough for the remaining band of Angelinian explorers. Then they set out again on their journey, which presently became more difficult. Already for nearly a month they had been painfully making their way through dense forests, over steep hills, and horrid raging torrents, which by water chilled both man and beast. Sometimes great storms of sleet and hail and snow beat pitilessly down upon them and again they were almost overcome by intense cold.

Provisions had become so scarce that the men often went hungry, and were at times driven to kill some of their own horses for food. But brighter days were ahead to come and at last they reached a river which they saw was flowing toward the west and it proved to be some branch of the Norma gun River and little did they know they were on the bank of Gunbeam Creek. With fresh courage some of the men built boats and dugouts and large rafts in which the ragged travel worn men and now triumphant men made their way down stream. The rebels for whom the most part they met not recognizing them were friendly, welcoming them and proving them with food and provisions and better boats, though of course a few rebel officers were for a time easily suspicious and troublesome.

Having accomplished as much as possible and finding out it was impossible to proceed any further for now they began to be discovered they gladly turned their faces homeward and after a fatiguing journey of a weeks duration reached the Great purified plains of the Norma gun and here found immense rebel encampments. Then the large party separated for a time into six companies, general Clark Haddon following the course of the Gunbeam Creek, and his companion general Saint Lewis the Norma gun, and the others following the Norma and Gunbeam Rivers proper planning to meet where the two rivers united.

This after some difficulty they did succeed in doing, though all parties were troubled considerably by the Gandelinians. The Mic-Holleston rebels stole horses from general Clark's party and eighteen hundred Zimmerman rebel warriors attacked general Lewis and his band killing and wounding five hundred and hundred Angelinian soldiers. At general Lewis got the better of them after a sharp fight, and captured a large herd of their horses and deer.....

399 Manley's army of course seemed in a bad condition not fit for another battle. The long journey of the army had caused the rebels to suffer more hardships than can be written in a list, disease during the campaign had laid hold of many of them and four thousand had died in a week, and many more for lack of food and provisions. It was also general Jimmie Vivian's plan to cut off Manley's three means of retreat. The first was by sending a fleet of ships around Cape Angeline on the Norm River where Manley's right wing was situated. This movement would of course take seven hours and must be done with utmost secrecy. Another was to secure the rear positions of Manley's army, and the third was to cut off all retreat through the wooded country by playing a large army there. This could not be accomplished however until three days. Many officers were so eager to follow out such plans that often several joined together in exciting conversations. Manley also had a large wagon train of a thousand one hundred covered wagons resembling 'Prairie Schooners' but much larger and longer. The concentrated troops had also made up works with tools of many kinds, pickaxes, crowbars, and spades.

In some cases the enemy had to kill and eat their mules and horses, and at times they lived on dead dogs, cats, game and wolves and even slain child slaves and other victims. The scattered bones of men and beasts and children marked the trail of the horrible campaign for in the frantic desire for food, the rebels would not stop at nothing. In the concentration of troops before Punken Centre however it was a time of great excitement.

THE BATTLE OF PUNKEN CENTRE!

The first important even of this desperate struggle was the capture of a strong christian position by the rebels along a small stream called the Alamo San Antonio. Although the christian force there numbered about one hundred and ten thousand they were men of reckless daring, without fear, and during the battle they were so determined to fight to the last that the enemy who attacked in numbers of four or five million strong had to annihilate them all to capture the position.

Among the hardy christian generals of this division was David Manner. After repulsing many charges in which more than once he came near being killed amid the dreadful carnage he prepared to meet the next one and frantically sent to Jimmie Vivian asking for aid and reinforcements. He knew that he was taking great risks in not falling back to his own main line but as he had no orders to do so he did not. The rebel divisions after having made six onslaughts near this section and having been repulsed with frightful loss brought up artillery to cover the next charge and when the rebels rushed forward in surges the long lines of artillery opened a destructive fire upon the christian position. His terrible cannon fire riddled the long lines of breastworks, making wide breaches in the extensive line of abatis through which immense torrents of rebels thronged though, even though shot down in thousands. The Angolinians emptied their muskets and cannon until their ammunition completely gave out, and then fought with stones, rocks, snowballs, bayonets and knives and revolvers. They fought with such desperate bravery until only a few hundred of the soldiers and the general were left. He had drawn his sabre and was using it in his desperate struggle with the scores of rebels who sought his life. There he stood with his back against a tall tree with the bodies of the rebels and other Angolinians he had slain lying in a semicircle about him. His foes had not dared rush him, though they held him at bay with their bayonets and lances. Just at that moment an order through a swift messenger came to him to abandon the position and so with his few followers he retreated hastily through the woods the men firing occasionally as they went. It was indeed a horrible tragedy and a massacre. The outlook for the Angolinians was dark enough, but general Jimmie Vivian who commanded the vast army then before was determined not to let Manley advance any further under conditions and with seven million Conscientians on centinels he decided to make Manley retreat. He withdrew the small defeated christian column and general David to his right. Learning that the victorious division had broken up in three divisions and was approaching in three columns in parallel course but far apart general Jimmie with one million Angolinians put himself into position in front of the main line and waited for the victorious rebels to come up. On their approach he stood ready for attack in a well chosen spot near the Santa Jacinto River just a half a mile from Punken Centre. The conflict was renewed with redoubled fury. During the height of this second part of the battle which raged all the rest of the day one of the rebel generals was killed and shot in the head. He lingered during the long hours of the night however and on the following morning breathed his last. Indeed both sides were losing a fearful number of generals. The battle indeed was a struggle that tested the manhood, quite as much as the resources of the fighting sections and each side night as well be proud of the bravery and skill of its officers and soldiers. Certainly each side in that terrible battle had among its generals some of the greatest military leaders of all time.

during the following morning general Jimmie Vivian after repulsing a series of great charges, advanced his forces so close to the enemy's enormous encampments that for a time all seemed lost for the rebels. But Manley's positions were so strongly fortified that the christian forces were forced to retreat and in this retreat which lasted seven hours were fought seven desperate conflicts in one day. Having thus saved his positions from capture general Manley pressed on against the christian forces and then was compelled to repulse a fearful counter assault of the Angolinians and with fearful loss and on the following hour drove back the Angolinians who assaulted his left with still greater loss and making an inferno of firing. In all these sections of the battle Manley's most effective helper was general Jensen, who trying to hasten his men when driven by a christian charge showed himself to be such a stubborn fighter and so furious in his enthusiasm that all of his soldiers marched and rushed to death when he bade them. That was even harder they marched and ran through deep snow at the charge, and they cheerfully did his bidding because they loved him. The sight of his old uniform and his handsome horse always stirred the hearts of his followers so that they easily drove back the christian troops. He was devoted to general Manley and placed the greatest confidence in him. He however was shot by a rebel Angolinian squadron I mean when attempting to get his men to swarm across a captured christian trench. He was mortally wounded and indeed his death was a great loss to the rebel army. Another of Manley's leaders was general Pandian. He was absolutely fearless.

Another of Manley's leaders was general Pandian. He was absolutely fearless. He attacked the christians anywhere, and he inspired his men with the same zeal. He had fallen three times during the battle with his command in the most dangerous situations and then cleverly got himself out after suffering much loss.

General Jimmie Vivian however proved himself to be an able and good christian general himself. All his men were used to him and all his ways. They trusted him completely and without question. They loved him too for his good comradeship. It is true general Jimmie Vivian like all other christian generals reserved the strictest discipline, but he frolicked with his officers and even privates like a boy, playing at snowballs, marbles, or whatever whatever they choose, and enjoying it all heartily. He even played with little child slaves girls and boys and he was so fond of gay martial music that he always marched in the rear of his army bands, and worked in the cheerful accompaniment of his favorite songs and other pieces, and then leaning back to laugh and join in the choruses. In gay spirit he found expression also in the uniform he wore. His fighting jacket a red one usually covered with medals shone with dazzling gold buttons and was covered with gold braid, his purple and red hat was topped up with a gold star, cross and two sabres designed in front, around his head all colored plumes, his fine buff gauntlets reached to the elbow, around his waist was tied a splendid sash of six bright colors, red, green, yellow, purple, blue and black, and his spurs were of pure gold. His trousers were of yellow color with purple stripes on the sides of the legs. These spurs of which he had been immensely proud of were a gift to him recently from his little sisters. In his little finger was a gorgeous one many colors which he insisted in keeping with him through the worse battles, although it often drew the enemy's fire. General Jimmie Vivian was very so proud of his men and their pluck also. He knew by name every man in his army. But to return to wicked general Manley. After winning the two recent important actions of the battle he decided he would again on the next morning push on. He believed that a greater advantage of the struggle might lead to the capture of the entire christian position and thus end the battle and enable him to pass on and strike Hanson Zimmermann or Manion in the rear and annihilate these christian forces so they would be compelled to raise the siege.

Having pressed boldly onward at night without even resting his troops he struck against the other christian troops under general Gettys. There for three hours the first section of the most terrible struggle of the battle raged, and in the result one of the greatest actions of the whole fighting in the rear of the main christian army. After three hours of fighting in which the loss on both sides was most fearful, Jimmie Vivian's army was defeated, and a part of it forced to retreat to the main works. The defeat of the first immense division of the christian army was a crushing blow for the hopes of General Jimmie Vivian. General Jimmie Vivian for a time felt this to be true, and groaning over the heavy loss of his men in the famous rebel charge he said to one of his generals andly:

"The affair is a very bad fault. It is I that is going to lose this fight, and if the christian army is to be saved at all you must help me through the rest of the day the best you can."

But even in the face of this bloody defeat his officers and soldiers still trusted their commander. General Robert Vivian's nephew will get us through the battle yet. They said. But the capture of another division of the army fighting far away on the river added defeat to defeat. For the hour following Gettys' defeat and loss of his position, the greatest of general Jimmie Vivian's stronghold and works was captured and general Jimmie Vivian could no longer hope for victory.

To show a little symptom of how fierce the battle had been and the firing itself several generals on the christian side one after the other had mounted the horse from which a leader had already been shot, only to share a like fate. General Jimmie Vivian himself was among those who also sprang upon the animal to lead his forces forward to a charge but the horse itself was struck by three bullets and fell almost catching the main christian general under him. General Jimmie Vivian led for a while on foot and then mounted another horse which was soon killed by a bursting shell which killed and wounded ten men around him simultaneously. Nevertheless general Jimmie Vivian had given the same striking evidence of bravery that fearless bravery that his parents and even his uncle and other relations had shown. Jimmie Vivian however after the disastrous defeat of the three hours bloody action though he felt it hopeless did not give up as yet. He had his other armies ready and if these could not accomplish anything he would have to abandon Panken Centre and fall back. When the news that his main divisions under general Gettysburg and the other had been almost destroyed and another captured his patriotism had been aroused more than ever. Without delay he withdrew the panic stricken columns to the rear and at once took an active part in getting ready for the general part of the battle which would decide who was to retreat.

He prepared his troops therefore to stand in a stand in the way of the advancing victorious rebel troops under Manley and his power as a leader no longer now quite so quickly developed.

The first of his achievements in repelling the attack of the enemy was the capture of the works on his extreme right under general Henry Pennington not rebel works but work captured by the enemy themselves, which had during the time of the first success been the centre of the new rebel line of defense. At this point after making two terrific onslaughts with many men led by many generals and officers he compelled the unconditional surrender of all of a sudden of nearly fifteen million glandelinians, and by this great victory of that day, bloody morning compelled the remainder of the glandelinians after redoubled fighting of great violence to abandon two of the other captured strongholds under general Columbus and Nashville Johnston. The Angolians at this point had in the heat of the contest rushed up to the face of many glandelinian guns, and still while the conflict raged like a mighty inferno of slaughter and flame and smoke on all sides, the artillery was the first to be captured and though the christians and foe infantry fought hard to hand all around them many brave fellows and officers though exposed by the fire to the fire literally sat on the captured cannons and waved their hats to cheer on their comrades who finally carried all before them strewn the whole battle line with windrows of dead and dying. The cannons were mostly centermester and parrot and other rifle cannons also krupps and big calibre and mortar cannons. At this time the remainder and inactive part of Jimmie Vivians big army was at Panken Center near Lileghur Landing No-two eight miles away not far off the village of Little Jimmie from which the battle also was generally called.

Here early in the afternoon while the struggle elsewhere was going on general Manley to prevent the christians from being too successful in their attacks upon Columbus and general Nashville, attacked Jimmie Vivian at Panken Centre and Little Jimmie and amid the dreadful carnage a tremendous charge along a whole line nine miles was made. The firing was inconceivably terrific making a perfect sea of smoke over the whole battle field. The rebel line was torn with thousands of gaps but the remainder of the foe yelling like demons rushed on, and though their columns were mangled and torn again and again, and whole brigades shot to pieces, with commanders and horses and everything else going down like corn before the tornado the rebels finally pushed over the christian intrenchments and drove a part of the christian army back a mile or two toward the river capturing the two towns after raging an inferno of firing there. The Angolians in the town fought like demons and this gave evidence of the streets being cumbered with killed and wounded glandelinians as thick as straw in a corn barn.

It was a fearful battle and lasted until three o'clock in the afternoon before at this point the foe gained the tremendous success. Not until after three o'clock did poor general Jimmie Vivian be able to do anything and all that time wounded by two bullets more since his last two wounds he saw watching the battle in the rain sitting with his back against the foot of a bullet headed tree, and giving continual orders to every officer who came up to him for commands.

Knowing what had happened he finally threw upon the victorious rebels reinforcements from his second army renewing the contest with tenfold violence, and he finally captured the two towns with the same fearful results on his own side but won a signal victory. By this bloody action general Jimmie Vivian for a time broke the rebels own line of defense. Although Manleys veterans fought bravely to prevent the christians from getting control of this region, by the close of day Manley had lost every stronghold works on the battlefield except those held by himself, and generals Hudson, and Vicksberger. These three trenches was so strongly defended that general Manley believed they could never be taken whatever.

That night following the third day of the conflict a resolute effort beyond describing to capture these works was made by Jimmie Vivian at nine o'clock. After a brilliant movement of strategy by which he got two heroic battling brigades around to the rear of the defenses, he laid siege to the position and for seven hours amid the most sanguinary fighting heard at Vivian Wickey and the main christian armies besieging the glandelinian army under Hudson held out. The christian losses in the attacks was dreadful but finally general Hudson was forced early in the morning to surrender to general Jimmie Vivian. Two hours later general Vicksberger whose division was some distance further was also compelled to give way, and thus the last of Manleys strongholds or what he literally had captured himself came back into christian possession and so the christians had recaptured the lost sanguinary fighting all the ground they had lost in the three days before. From this success general Jimmie Vivian had become the hero of the Angolians army. His success was in no small measure due to his dogged perseverance. While his army was laying siege to general Hudsons division one of the onlooking and daring child slaves a little girl of seven years of age to whom she brought a drink of cold water inquired timidly whether he ever expected to capture the works stolen by the enemy.

"Certainly little one," he replied tapping her gently on the head.

"But when can you do it?" she asked more boldly.

"Quickly come his answer;

"I cannot tell exactly when I shall be able to retake my lost positions or capture the foe I'm besieging but I mean to stay here until I do, even if it takes me all the years I live."

General Jimmie Vivian by capturing general Hudson and recapturing all the ground lost by his army in the three days contest won more and more the confidence of his soldiers.

In the morning of that day of the fourth struggle all the christian armies were back in their own works once more and had recaptured mostly all of their artillery.

But that was not ending the stubborn contest. General Manley still had two large unlinked armies in the field. One of them under general Josephine Jensen was defending the works on the extreme left centre under general Cal Caldwell Richmond.

The other under general Joseph and Raymond Richmond Federal, held works which was also commanded by general Tennessee, defending the main army in that region.

General Jimmie Vivian plan now to drive Manley away and first frustrate his wicked intention was to send his brother general Germaine Vivian in whom he had great confidence against general Federal, with orders to capture his positions near Capatlanta Capatlanta which was the apparent workshop and storehouse of the intrenched rebel army. General Jimmie Vivian himself would advance against Manley and drive general Richmond from his works. The two great watchwords were]

"On to victory. On to Calverina."

Early that morning both general Jimmie Vivian and his brother began their desperate advance. Starting from Panken Centre Germaine Vivian fighting his way onward most obstinately began to crowd Federal toward Capatlanta. In order to keep his line of supplies open from the captured Nashville works, he kept his army in close touch with his artillery and cavalry, and to hinder him as much as possible the God confederates of general glandelinian sent back bodies of troops immense in size both cavalry and infantry supported by artillery to tear up the rear of the attacking christian armies. But so quickly were these rear columns rallied and so quickly did they hurl back their flankers that the glandelinians declared;

"Jimmie Vivian the National of Angolians must carry extra armies on his back." His advance was swift and steady and on the hour of ten o'clock he had captured Capatlanta. A little later he started on his famous attack, from Capatlanta to the other line of works, with the purpose of weakening the rebel armies by destroying their supplies. His army attacked in six columns the battle line covering a belt of territory forty miles long and ten miles wide. Four hours after he captured general Savannahs works driving the foe back and sent to his uncle the telegram;

"I will have to beg to present you my dear Uncle as a gift for the coming Christmas, the capture of many rebel prisoners with nearly two thousand one hundred and fifty nine cannon of big calibre, and immense stores of ammunition, and about two hundred and twenty five thousand bales of provisions and two long trains of covered provision wagons."

Let us make an acquaintance of this remarkable brother of Jimmie Vivian. He may have been at this time twenty three years old. Standing six feet high with almost a Christ like face, with muscles of iron, and a military bearing he gave the impression of great physical and mental endurance.

And no matter during the bloody fray whether he was exposed to drenching rain bitter cold, flying bullets, bursting shells, to the noise and shock of horrid explosions, to horrible scenes, and wild stormy racket of the conflict he never gave signs of fatigue or fear. Many nights during his advance before the battle he had slept for only two hours, but he was known to be able to fall asleep easily almost anywhere he happened to be, whether lying upon the wet dirty ground, or on snow drifts covered over by blankets near a fire, or on a hard floor, or even amid the loudest din of and roar of battle. In battle he could not and never did sit quietly smoking and looking on like his brother Jimmie Vivian. He was too much excited to sit still, and every time his face would always reflect his thoughts.

Yet nevertheless his mind was always clear and his decisions were always rapid. There was never a time that his soldiers and officers did not admire him, and give him their unbounded confidence. One of his staff said of him while they were leading a charge during the battle;

"The christian army and even his own father and other superior generals, and even a little children and even women and girls have such an abiding faith in him that all love him and his army will go wherever he leads even to the bottom of the earth if necessary. At the time general Savannahs glandelinian army was worsted the christian soldiers had remarked proudly at their general with his staff rode by;

"There goes one of the sons of general Robert Vivian. When ever you see him or his brother everything is all right."

In fact the two sons of Jimmie Vivian were better leaders than their own father and uncle.

During the trying experiences of this famous battle of Fankon centre Germaine face had grown anxious and careworn. But indeed behind the careworn face, there were always kind and tender feelings, especially for the children, mostly child slaves who he or his troops had rescued occasionally. Little children and even child slaves would show their utmost trust in him, by clasping him about his knees, or by nestling in his arms. While he had captured the works under general Savannah large groups of rescued children made a general playground of a general Germaine Vivian headquarters and private rooms, the doors of which were never closed to them. While general Germaine Vivian was pushing his army on to Capatianta, general Jimmie Vivian was trying to again defeat Manley and capture general Richmonds command and the general also. With these aims in view a general Jimmie Vivian had pushed his armies across the streams and entered a wooded country in direct line for Richmonds army. Here a fighting was stern business. The woods were so gloomy and the underbrush so thick that despite snow on the ground the firing was so fierce that one could not see each other twenty feet away. General Manleys army furiously contested every foot of the advance. In the terrible conflict that followed general Jimmie Vivian lost heavily, but he pressed doggedly on proposing to fight it out along that line if he had to do so till doomsday. It took all day nightrary fighting and longer, and moreover general Jimmie could find that he could not possibly capture general Richmonds army from the west. So he crossed the St Annu river and attacked the enemy from another portion. Again the battle resumed with great violence and toward morning general Manley was still desperately holding out, and Jimmies army was suffering heavier and still heavier losses. Many men had even been overcome by smoke of powder it was so thick from the intense firing, countless troops fell on account of being torn through by the storm of bullets, canister and shot shell and shrapnell. At this time one of general Jimmies most skillful and ablest generals and helpers next to his brother was Phillip Joseph Mc-Gantler who was a brilliant cavalry leader and infantry general together.

So on that following morning general Jimmie Vivian sent him with orders to work his way around Manleys rear with the orders to drive the enemy into a gaunt let of guns and destroy all their food supplies they had in their wagon trains. Mc-Gantler entered the region by a long route march around Manleys army in secret, making a detour almost like general Jackson did in the civil war at Chancellorsville, but a longer march, and striking the rebel rear from the east, carried all before him captured wagon trains, and destroyed or secured large quantities of supplies, and after fierce fighting he saw a part of his army in full retreat, and fugitives told him that finally the flank attack had been a failure and everything was lost. With two aids and twenty generals and a large force of cavalry men the gallant general dashed forward to the front as fast as his foaming steed could carry him.

On meeting a retreating officer who cried out:

"Our whole army is whipped now!" General Mc-Gantler replied: "You and your army is a but not mine."

As he continued onward another officer reported to him that many cannon countess in number were being fired in the direction of the line of battle. At first he paid little attention to the noise grow louder he became a little disturbed and soon he was reaching the scene of battle. As he pushed ahead at full speed dead ahead he said to his panic stricken soldiers:

"If you had put more trust in god and the Blessed Mother and shown less fear of the enemies of god this disaster would not have happened. Come on come all. We must for the sake of god and His Blessed Mother face the front and drive at the foe. We must go back and recover everything at any cost."

As his panic stricken troops caught sight of him their they threw their hats high into the air and with enthusiastic cheers and shouts and yells, shouldered their muskets and faced rapidly about. General Mc-Gantler then though six horses were shot under him and having secured a seventh was wounded himself brought order out of the immense confusion and panic, and in the resumption of the conflict that followed drove the rear of the enemy two miles back from the field in utter rout and panic breaking the line all to pieces and set upon capturing the whole rebel encampment in that quarter. Great was the rejoicing among the Angelinians over this victory indeed. And this victory was mainly due to Mc-Gantlers magnetic influence over his men. Even during this battle a number of wounded christian soldiers in a line of battle near Mc-Gantler stumbled and fell behind his regiment which at least from a regiment was now only a squad so fierce had been their loss. But when general Mc-Gantler cried out:

"Never mind boys there's no harm done to your soul but only to your bodies!" The soldiers though mortally wounded, went forward with his fighting comrades until other shots from rebel gunners struck them dead.

Let us now return to general Jimmie Vivian once more if you please. He had already pressed on hard upon the enemy army under general Richmond, that Manley had made attempts to move to Richmonds aid but was cut off from him by another portion of Jimmie's army and Richmond therefore was compelled to rapidly march eastward in his efforts to escape capture. For a week later general Jimmie Vivian closely followed general Richmonds troops who were a m almost starving, all they usually had to eat was parched corn, and green shoots of the treex, and the outlook was so dark that many Calvinianians who had fought with the rebel army had deserted and started for home...

There was indeed only one thing for general Richmond to do. That was give up the struggle for he knew his army was in a hopeless condition and could never escape the christians since he was cut off by the Angelinians from Manleys aid. An interview was therefore arranged with Jimmie Vivian. It was held on the following morning in a house standing near the woods. At the time general Jimmie Vivian was without a sword having forgotten his, and instead of a generals uniform wore a soldiers blouse for a coat with only the shoulder straps of his rank to indicate to the army who he was.

The Angelinian general Richmond was dressed in a full uniform, dressed fit to kill, the uniform covered with medals of all sizes and shapes was entirely new, and he was wearing a sword of very great value very likely the very sword which had been presented to him by his own king. General Jimmie Vivian in his rough traveling suit and the unfire uniform of a lowly private with the straps of a major general must have indeed made a great contrast and in a very strange manner with a Angelinian general so handsomely dressed, six feet and a half tall, and of very faultless form. The result of this great interview was the surrender of general Richmond and his whole army and cannons arms, and provisions. General Jimmie Vivian however had great kindness of heart. He had abundant food at once sent to the hungry rebel prisoners, and never did general Jimmie Vivian appear more truly great than on the occasion of Richmonds surrender.

Indeed general Jimmies son Jimmie Vivian was a remarkable man in many ways. And while in the army he had seemed to be a man of very powerful endurance and was very much like general Grant in the civil war in American but taller and strong in health and mental ways. He always either slept on the ground, or in a tent, sometimes only slept one hour, or ten and eight in the twenty four hours, and it was seldom when he had more than one meal. On some occasions his soldiers had observed him lying down and sleeping in the rain or snow without caring for the results. He was six feet five inches high, round shouldered but straight, and not at all military in bearing or walk. Put his dark brown hair, a blue gray eyes, and musical voice always gave a most pleasing expression. Never in his whole life was he known to speak any unclean words or swear and curse or tell lies and mention objectionable stories and yarns. In manner he was quiet and simple, yet he was always ready for the severest ordeal he might have to face. While the two great commanders Jimmie Vivian and Richmonds Manley were much alike unlike in personal and character appearance and ways they had certain qualities in common for they were both different. And M n Manley was not simple hearted.

Though he had been victorious in driving off M n Manley and capturing a rebel army it was nevertheless a sad day for Jimmie Vivian. He had lost so many men that he could not now meet a new rebel army in an actual battle and prepared to fall back on Vivian's army. As he stepped out of the door of the house where the terms of surrender had been agreed upon and stood in silence with tear dimmed eyes waiting for his horse to be brought to him, he clasped his hands together as if in the deepest pain and looked far away into the distance. He mounting his steed, he rode back to the christian encampments where his officers and army was awaiting his coming. Indeed on his approach they crowded about their beloved righteous chief in their eagerness to touch his hand and his horse. Looking upon his veteran soldiers he said with saddened voice:

"We have fought through this long battle together, I have done the best I could for you. We have won but my heart is sad for our losses are too dreadful to relate or estimate. But I have seen of the battle it is too much. My heart is too full to say more."

Then he silently rode off to his tent. Rarely did poor Jimmie Vivian leave his tent to sleep in a house and often his main diet consisted of salted cabbage only. He thought it a great luxury to have sweet potato potatoes and buttermilk or even fresh milk. The gentleness and kindness of general Jimmie Vivian was seen also in his fondness for animals. Many a horse which had been very dear to him had been shot in the battles he fought through.

...captured himself came back into christian possession and so the christians had recaptured the most sanguinary fighting all the ground they had lost

If we could count those who were slain in on the christian side alone in this field of bloody battle at Punkin centre, and those who died from mortal wounds, it would be just as if in many years time a platoon would have swept off whose whole sections of a nation. During one day of the battle itself the loss of men in fallen on the enemy side was equal to seven hundred a minute.....
Mr Manley however after going through all his hardships had failed and he was sad as he saw he could not accomplish his purpose and left the region altogether and where he went no one knew for a while.

CHAPTER THIRTY FOUR.

CHAPTER THIRTY FOUR.
DO YOU OLA GENERAL JACK EVANS, FOR LOVING THESE DEAR LITTLE GIRL HERODIES, FOR SAVING HIM FROM THE HORROR'S OF A GLA DELINIAN PRIDE.

During the frightful battle of Tartarin one of the wicked Gla delinian officers came galloping up to Violet's tent where she was confined under guard, and dimmounting said with a sneer:

Your friend general Jack Evans has taken many of at my friends prisoners; and I thought it best to tell you so you would know that you will soon have none of your best friends with you soon as we'll do our best to catch him; or I kill him one or the other."

This report stunned Violet and her sisters. For a while they were silent and then Violet said:

"We will see him again soon in spite of you wicked Glandelinians and we will warn him, and prevent him from being captured, if it cost us our lives. I even believe you wicked glandelinians are afraid to tell us whose men are going to make the try for his capture!"

"No we are not afraid to tell you and we'll prove it. Bengisera troops have been sent out to decoy the general if possible." Said the officer. "He may be captured by a different force anyway, even though he had captured our men during this great battle we have already won, and we'll have him transported to general Bengisera's command. I for one am not such a bad Glandelinian as you think; by my lo's, or way of speech and if I was I would not have told you he was in danger, as us Glandelinians are not allowed to mention it to any christian prisoners we have in our possession. If you intend to rescue him, or prevent his capture, you are going through a most dangerous undertaking. I hope you great successes though."

"Maybe so," answered Violet. "But I would rather die than lose him as he is the best friend we ever had. We never failed to rescue any one before, so I or my sisters do not see why we would fail to do so now."

"That's what you may say," said the officer. "But nevertheless IT'S it's very dangerous, and besides I'm telling you the truth, I don't think it's impossible to get out of these lines without help. And if you will grant me a very serious request, something which I never done in my life before on account of being a Glandelinian, I'll see you through the lines, and no one will know of it."

"Mention your request," said Violet.

"Though I'm a glandelinian I'm in love with children, christians though they be, and if you will let me give you little girls just one good hug, and a kiss, I'll bring you out of the lines entirely, and give you full directions to where the troops are sent to trap general Jack Evans, and you will be able to warn and save him."

Violet and her sisters saw that he was really honest; that he was not treacherous, but she answered:

"You must do it first, and then we will grant your request. We are willing right now, but if we waste time doing it now we will be delayed and..."

"Sure I know, I would be seen and also suspected as a lover of christians," said the officer. "But you promise!"

"Yes," said Violet, and also her sisters.

Violet and her sisters indeed felt bad about this, but nevertheless they were determined to rescue him. But how! That was the question. They would not do anything rash for it would not be effective enough to warn him, and it would not effect his rescue in the least. Jennie believed it was the best plan to enter the enemy's lines in disguise find out the place where he was going to be seized upon, and then watch where they take him, and then steal him away by some trick. Violet and her sisters decided to do it, and in ten minutes they were on their way with the officer, and several men, and at every point they were questioned, but the officer officer answered:

"Oh the temptation is too strong. I can't wait to murder these christians."

With this answer they were not displeased. It was, indeed, the best plan, before the officer with his child loving soldiers with him, and he was so soon in the far distance Bengisera's divisions of Turnamannians, which was so soon in the far distance, and he strictly and firmly told them to be cautious saying:

"If you are ever discovered by these fierce fierce soldiers you are gone surely before heaven and earth so for the sake even of your own God be careful!" Then he gave them directions, what they should do when within the lines, then finishing he said kind of shyly:

"Why about your promise!"

christians had recaptured most of the ground they had lost

407
"I could swear those who were slain in on the christian side alone in this 1905.

"Times you kept your own promise we'll keep our's." Said Violet, and she threw her arms around his neck and kissed him. It was the first time that he felt the arms of a child around him, and drawing her close to him he hugged her, and then her sisters for a long time. When he hugged and kissed poor little Jennie, Jennie he thought he had never a happier moment. She was a sweet well formed little girl, and placing her chest against his he embraced her long and fondly, and when they were finally dashing off toward the Tunesaramian lines he said to his men: "God he, help those poor little girls if they get discovered by those furious Gargolians."

"I assure you that won't happen." Laughed the other officer with him. "They are mere children, and almost helpless for their size, and ways, but are also full grown women, when cornered, or in danger of their own lives. They are crackshots too I can tell you."

"We must be careful that they don't make prisoners of us." Said Violet. "We must find out their scenes unnoticed, and even get within their lines unnoticed. These kind of glandelinians are now more dangerous than of late."

"If with Gertrude Angeline was with us now." Said Joise. "She alone could do anything." Violet was a large group of glandelinians all cowering in hooded heads in the form of badian fiamas advancing swiftly toward them, and as it seemed as if they were actually devils approaching, the little girls not wishing to be seen, hid behind the nearest bushes. In a moment the Gargolian cavalry were passing by at a thunderous gallop. The little girls recognized general Hanson Draggard Johnston as their leader. It was a few moments before the enemy's lines was reached, the brave little girls working themselves nearer and nearer to the Gargolian works and fortifications, from tree to tree, but in a very cautious manner. They could now also see an immense city of tents and taboures, in brown and olive drab color, and also in gray, and even in strange yellow hues with tall black and white stripes running down their sides, and soldiers were searching around in gray and blue uniforms with glistening guns.

"It seems as if we won't be able to do it." Said Jennie. "We wish to find out their scenes and warn him before to night. It's the only chance I see."

"Maybe we can find a way." Said Angeline. "Could we cause something to happen that would draw most of them away?"

"I don't believe so." Said Catherine with a vague shake of her pretty head. "They might disguise us anyway, even though they are a new command and never saw us before. They might have heard about us anyway and know us."

"That may be true." Said Jennie. "Yes, because no boys are as pretty as us, and it hardly does any good to disguise myself as boys, and so they would suspect us, so we believe we had better not enter among them."

They all realized this. But what was to be done? Sentries were seen by the hundreds and several gun mounds pointed at their very hiding places.

"We had better start something that will cause most of these Gargolians to be drawn away." Said Nettie. "I have a small grenade or mine in one of my pockets, and I could cause considerable excitement by exploding it. Shall I try?"

"Yes." Said Violet with a look of inquiry. "But where and how are you going to explode it?"

"Over yonder." Said Nettie with shining eyes. "I have a small electrical instrument attached to it, which will discharge it. The glandelinian who was embraced by me gave it to me in case I needed it."

She went off a considerable distance, dodging from tree to tree, and soon buried it under a large hemlock. She then unstrung the wires, and retreated back to her sisters.

"Now as soon as we see a clear space, we must dash into it." Said Nettie. "This explosion I'm sure will cause them to come here and investigate. That will be a good chance for us. Once we get inside their camp, we may make our success, though even then we must be cautious. She now worked the small battery, there was a deafening detonation, and a cloud of earth and smoke ascended into the air, the hemlock tree crashing to the ground with a thundering roar. There was a regular table of confusion among the glandelinians, and a whole swarm came rushing toward the scene of confusion and disorder shouting:

"What was it? Anybody Killed? Who done it?" Violet and her sisters soon saw that a goodly portion of the camp was cleared, and dashed for it reaching it unscathed.

"Where will we hide?" Gasped Violet all out of breath.

"Anywhere where we won't be discovered." Panted Jennie with her hands on her chest, and wildly beating heart. "My but I'm winded. That---that---was a long run!"

They now stopped to regain their breath, and searched quickly for a hiding place, and finding a high tabour entered, and hid in a big pile of straw, still panting for air. Fifteen minutes later the glandelinians were coming back ploughing through the snow, two generals entering the tabour, where Violet and her sisters were hiding.

"Some one played a dastardly trick on us, for here are the proofs." Said the leading officer furiously, producing the wire and batteries. "It's a clever trick at that, and the battery is one of our own make. They probably wanted to enter our lines and did that for no other reason."

"They may have succeeded." Said the other officer. "We had better have this whole section of the tent seats searched thoroughly and warn the other sections of the camp."

"I intend to." Said the main officer. "There are spies somewhere among our lines, and they must be captured." The other officer went out giving the order, and soon the entire camp was being searched. Not a single tent was overlooked. The two officers did thinking of looking through the hay on the floor of their own tent, but fortunately did not prod it properly, and so discovering no one they did not believe that anyone could hide beneath the straw which they believed only covered a bed of quicksand over which he had placed his tent on purpose to catch any spies under it who may be foolish enough to hide under the straw. But Violet and her sisters were indeed indeed searching under something else, than a quicksand bed, and that was in their terrific super human effort to keep from bursting out into a laugh over their clever trick, and of the confusion it caused. They were under his bench, and he did not know it. A whole two hours passed, then many officers reported that no suspicious persons could be found anywhere.

"They may have escaped." General Cookken Spieler, the assisting general officer said. "They may have gone into this tent no doubt, and hid under that straw, and after trying to secure the plans, died because they could breathe no more."

"My plans are safe." Said the other general. "For I generally always carry it with me, and a perfectly strong man even would have a perfectly hell of a time to get it from me. Those spies who ever they be may have been around, for some other purpose, probably learning something of general Shoemann's intentions, of when ever whether he will resume the attack on the christians besieging Evangelina Crania, for they still retain the siege of that big place, though beaten in the last bloody fight."

"It is rumored that the christians are intending to retreat west for Norma Catherine, or either will concentrate their main line of siege toward the town of Norma Rossinia, and also on Norma Roseanna, and Eva Crania."

"It may be so." Said the other officer. "These the christian dogs hope to be reinforced, and then try once more to drive us poor devils back. I fear they may either resume their concentration to morrow or begin another attack. They will do all they possibly can to suppress our rebellion against christianity and God."

"Those christians will surely beat us yet." Cookkenspieler cried. "The rebellion may be lost already. Jiminy is a damn fool to separate from Shoemann, after his great victory at Calverine, or Saxton Run. I myself will be tired of the Civil war if we cannot have more sensible commanders. It's bringing more terrible carnage and destruction, than sweeping success, and the success we gain does not amount to a pin's head."

At this moment an orderly saluted and said:

"Your excellency general Cookkenspieler. You are wanted at our supreme general Shoemann's headquarters right away, or quickly as possible. He thinks he sees a stupendous forest fire of great fury approaching our way."

"A forest fire approaching our way in all this winter snow that lies so deep on the ground?" Cried the commander. "Why Orderly you are jesting. It cannot be done."

"If you don't believe me sir, look for yourself." Answered the orderly. The general did so.

"Why those beastly christian dogs are causing the destruction of property and provisions we could subsist on, just to compel us out of Evangelina Crania." He gasped as he viewed the scene from the opening of his tent. He went out followed by his officer. As soon as all was quiet Violet and her sisters, came out from under the straw under the bench.

"Maybe we can cause some more confusion by setting their tents on fire." Said Violet to Daisy and whose eyes were flooded with tears from laughing quietly to herself, while her sisters were also blinded by tears of laughter. "I have some matches, and with this straw we can do some wonders." She continued.

"But the one we are in will catch also." Said Daisy.

"I don't believe so," answered Violet. "And as the wind is blowing on opposite direction we are not in any danger. And if it burns well let it then. It would do us no harm. We could not probably stay here anyway. Ours is the only one separated from the others are close together."

"All right, then let's do it," said Jennie herself. "But be careful that you are not seen. You are as good as dead if you are discovered, for they will stick you into that bag, or shoot you, and then another you under it." Violet crawled slowly from under the tent, dragging a good supply of straw. She reached the tent about two yards away, and seeing that all the others were less than half a foot apart, decided that her plan would work out better than she expected. She laid straw alongside, and lighting a match set fire to it. Then she quickly crawled back to the tent just opposite, as the fire was not noticed, then as thousands of short time as few were really about, the fire was not noticed, then as thousands upon thousands of tents, the tops of evergreen trees, and even mossy covered twigs, and even wooden boxes of crates and everything was going in a roaring, spitting hell and crashing scene of explosion and confusion and flames, there immediately came a scene of the liveliest disorder among the glandelinians.

Hundreds of men scampered from their burning tents, yelling, shouting, and howling, while many others desperately fought the fire, with snow and buckets of water, but the fire burning a long time as it was before it had been discovered was completely beyond control, and was soon threatening not only the whole city of tents but a general forest fire as well and the light high glowed with such brightness that objects could be seen for miles. Why indeed hundreds of thousands of tents within an hour were completely consumed, while the tops and trunks of trees were roaring torches, and bushes of all kinds, and evergreen trees were going like blazing oil. In the pandemonium of confusion that followed this great conflagration, Violet and her sisters managed to get a considerable distance away, and nearer the prison tent than before where they had heard a christian officer was being held. The confusion continuing however, as the fire was now ten times worse the little girls managed to reach a large tabour, where right in front loomed the palisades of a small stockade, and they managed to spring upon and overpower the outside sentries, before they were aware of any danger of attack....

Violet and her sisters tied a gag around the mouth of the guards, and placed them in a certain location, where they would not be easily be found. Then they made their way into the little stockade, finding a general and two christian officers slowly guarded. The little girls were not even seen by these glandelinians however, so they crept up as cautiously as possible, then sprang at the graycoats, knocking them senseless before they could utter a cry with a large gun they had each snatched up from a corner.

"Quick! Then Thomas and Jack Fulton," Violet cried. "We can get away if you follow us for we have set their tents on fire to cause confusion. The fire has become worse than we even expected, and we'll be overtaken by it if we don't hasten."

The two christian officers and the general obeyed without a word, and were soon leaving the camp without being detected despite the bright glare of the conflagration, but as they were fleeing through a portion of the woods which was already starting to burn, they were discovered by Braggard and his covary men.

"After them!" he cried furiously. "What pesky critters those little boys are, to dare enter our lines, and make off with our prisoners. And by gosh I can tell the way they run, they are not boys but little girls." The glandelinians roared after the little girls and the three officers, yelling and hooting. But suddenly a large force of scouting angelinians having come nearer to investigate where the great fire was made their appearance, and not wishing to come into collision with such overwhelming numbers of christians, the wicked glandelinian pursuers hastily retreated after firing two volleys and relieving a hot fire in return.

"We were out looking for you little girls for five days," said one of the officers. "General Hanson Vivian your uncle tried to see you before the bloody battle started and found you missing. Then he was worried."

"We will report right away," said Violet.

She and her sisters with To, and Jack, and the other christian officer followed the angelinians to their own lines where they met general Jackson Evans, told him of the enemy's intentions to trap him and other things. He promised to be on his guard.

General Jack Evans after Violet and her sisters discarded themselves of the disguise and showing their real selves, turned to them and said:

"You are the bravest little girls I have ever seen, and in gratitude for your deed I can never explain. I only say I can wish you were my own little daughters. The only way I can reward you is to let my brother stay with you as much as possible and to get myself to be appointed your own guardian for life. And I'm sorry I recalled him before the battle, but then I needed him, and he also saved my life during the battle."

...when himself came back into christian possession and so the glandelinians and reconquered the ground they had lost it's all right," said Violet blushing. "We did not care as long as we could save and as long as he was not killed."

General Jack Evans did not say anything more, but the look the great general gave the little girls thrilled them. No better friend had they now, and they knew it, and deserved it. How he would reward them the first opportunity he could grasp. The little girls, and general Evans went directly toward his own headquarters, and reached it toward morning, and then they met general Hanson Vivian who was on horseback he having limited to survey the direction of the enemy's new positions.

"Where on earth were you little girls?" he asked. "I thought the enemy had captured you."

"They spied on the enemy, learned their intentions and warned me of their intended tricks and plots against me," said general Evans himself saluting. "I don't believe they wanted to tell you though. Some of my best officers also got captured during the battle."

"Oh I see and I wanted to tell them of their capture, for I had found it out by means of another officer," exclaimed general Hanson. "That is why I wanted to see them. And how did the little girls manage it, after the glandelinian officer told them, and helped them to the other lines?"

"For the officer told us he told us where the officers were or at least only mentioned the plot planned against general Evans, and with his help we done the rest...."

"But how did you little girls get among their lines without being seen?"

"We played a trick by the use of a mine, which the officer had given to Hattie or Daisy, and then we reached the stockade after creating confusion by setting the enemy's tents on fire."

At this moment a very mysterious little girl looking like Little Eva in Uncle Tom's Cabin came up on a horse. She was Gertrude Angeline.

"There must be a great big fire in the direction of the enemy's lines, for I see the smoke," she said. "I saw a bright glow from your headquarters general Evans and went out on my horse to investigate."

"Another of those brilliant forest fires," he said musingly. "It's a wonder why this world don't burn up. I thought we were through with forest fires and everything else."

General Hanson himself could also see the ruddy glare, and said: "It must be advancing on advancing on the flank of the enemy. As long as it does not strike for us I don't care. I'm going to pillage the city of Tataria to-morrow, and fire her too."

Gertrude Angeline well known to them, and a little girl of ten years of age, now rode over to Violet and her sisters, and the seven beautiful little girls dismounted and went into general Hanson's headquarters with Evans, and here they had a well-suppered feast ever tasted in a long time.

"I wonder how long this war has already lasted!" asked Angeline. "And why is it so fierce and bloody? It makes me shudder to see all these men killed, and torn up."

"As this is the month of January or whatever it is called the war must have lasted already ten months if I'm not wrong," said Violet. "And it is so fierce because so many are doing the fighting at once. Millions charged every hour sometimes, and hundreds of thousands go down mangled and bleeding. We pray daily for its ending, but it seems in vain."

General Evans and Gertrude Angeline looked with pity at them.

"And we have never seen a good Christmas all our lives," said Daisy.

"Never seen a good Christmas! How's that?" asked General Evans.

"Never since this trouble began," answered Joice.

"I understand," said Gertrude Angeline. "Neither did I ever see a happy Christmas for seven years since I had been a child since before I broke away from rebellion and I'm only ten years now. And when I was taken to the Boy-King Islands I was six years old. But I believe you seven little Vivian girls suffered the most and I'm also going to be your guardian."

On this scorching day general Hanson determined to smash the enemy and captured the city he was besieging. He rushed a large body of his men into the town of Tataria, and a scene of pillage ensued. Every house was stripped of its belongings. All the provisions of the stores were taken away, and many buildings set on fire. The inhabitants who were glandelinian citizens of Galverinia fled from the angelinian raiders leaving everything behind in their mad haste to get away, the inhabitants being punished for helping the angelinians, at the time the day before when a troop of Abbeismians had passed through their streets....

ing there having been no activity of any serious consequences that day, christian army concentrated closer toward the besieged glandolinian at midnight general Kindermund's forces which had been changing their line from the right of the main christian line to the left, were attacked by a thousand thousand Turnamunians, the contest lasting incessantly all night, the loss on both sides amounting up to near, nearly 200,000 in killed and wounded. The assailants were repulsed however after making thirteen desperate charges, and concentrations, with two of their main leaders killed. The next morning the glandolinians were reported sucking one of the towns near the christian lines two miles south of Tartaria, and the inhabitants were in the greatest consternation. The enemy harmed no body however as they dared to not to commit any massacre too close to the Abbaeanian lines.

In the meantime general Manley's armies were now entrenched near or at Norma Rossinia, which was close to Evangelinia Grania, and Manley expected to be attacked, as he hoped also to raise the siege, but general Robert Vivian had no intentions of attacking him right away as he wanted to pass the week before Christ as it was really December and not January as violet had thought. General Vivian did not wish to create any carnage on that beautiful day if he could help it. Many peculiar movements were made however at different points which resulted in many small conflicts, but which were not of any importance though bombardments at series occasions were incessant and exceedingly heavy. Three other small cities and towns were pillaged, then on December the twentieth the strong concentration of the christian armies was resumed. The enemy's new lines at Evangelinia Grania and Norma Rossinia extended despite their appalling numbers for only forty three miles, and indeed another bloody part of the siege was to be renewed.

It was estimated that nearly fifty million men would be engaged in the coming struggle at Norma Rossinia, as Hansons and Evans armies were rejoining general Vivian's, and indeed violet and her sisters realized that they would not see much of a Christmas this year. The military authorities of the christians estimated the strength of the christian army of nearly 25,000,000, 25,000,000 of whom there were 10,000,000 infantry, and the rest cavalry and artillery men, and nearly four hundred guns on the christian side under general Vivian while Hansons and Evans now made the full number over sixty million entirely while the enemy force was only 41,987,000 strong. The christians also had over eleven thousand big and small machine guns. It was impossible at this stage more than to conjecture how these many corps were to be organized in mobile armies, or how it was intended they should maneuver for the purpose in view of a combined attack of such a big force on so wide a front, something never before attempted during the glando-Abbaeanian war. The northern section of general Vivian's Angelinians were concentrating in three separate divisions, the first army near Meldons, the second near the vicinity of Evangelinia Grania, and the third on the plains and in front of Lucille Rickson or Gaudandoni. As for Lucille Rickson and Norma Roseanna seemed to be near his objective point general Vivian's intentions were to take the offensive all along the line by a simultaneous advance of all his armies, covered by the heaviest artillery fire that could be brought to bear. It was impossible to look upon a map of this bloody Lucille Rickson scene without feeling that if the fierce Turnamunian and Mc-Hollestinian armies under general Calmannia Shoemannia, able to link up with general Chappell's armies in sufficient force to undertake a strong offensive movement against the christian armies concentrating at Meldons. A great chance presented itself of dealing a smashing and perhaps a decisive and paralyzing blow at the christian army by rolling up its right flank, at the opening of the struggle, and to strike before the christians assumed the offensive themselves.

It was on Christmas eve while a blinding blizzard was raging when general Jack Evans and Gertrude Angelina was alone having the best time among themselves, when they learned to their sorrow that poor Santa Claus had been captured by the enemy while he not knowing of the danger had tried to give the poor war stricken unhappy children who were in Galverinia, and that they were holding him tight on the charge of being a spy, and that they were going to destroy the toys and Reindeers, and even put him to death if they could find evidence against him. They felt powerless to do anything, but Violet and her sisters went to general Robert Vivian and told him about it. General Vivian remembered when he was a little poor child, when in spite of all he had never been missed by his old time friend Santa Claus or the other child friends he had, and he indeed felt bad over it, but he was entirely at a loss what to do. He did not wish to cause any actual fighting over it, for he hated the idea of any slaughter on a Christmas day, a "Day of Peace on earth. Good will to men". But Violet and her sisters pleaded and intreated him to go and do something before it was too late.

"You little girls succeeded in rescuing those officers, and warning general Evans, and so why not try to rescue him yourselves!" said general Vivian.

They needed no further advice, and so the little girls themselves did not show up that night for supper, and general Vivian feared they would be captured. All through the night of that December the twenty fourth, a terrific hurricane and blizzard of exceedingly great fury was raging, but despite the fierce snowstorm and wind, Manley was soon pushing Shoemannia's army to attack the christian right wing in all its force. At Seven O'clock the glandolinians came in sight of the christian line and at once in the midst of the raging storm, a severe skirmish ensued, which soon became a general struggle. The glandolinians were soon attacking with terrible fury, general Phellinus glandolinians pouring over the works along his front spreading confusion as he charged. A dull booming sound broke out, and a broadside of shells screamed shrilly among the many tree tops, and among the glandolinian assailants killing hundreds. Then Baldwin's batteries supporting the whole of the christian line went into action with a great roar. The assault of the enemy was exceptionally heavy, more than expected by any of the Angelinian commanders, and most terrific in the extreme, but as so many gathling guns were in action the assault of the foe was being torn up and mangled, and many of the divisions of the glandolinians had to fall back to gain some respite for their own losses was heavier than that of the christians themselves. The glandolinians soon made a rally and attacked with a wild fury, being supported by the fire of their own artillery, then a sudden spitting fire of rifles mingled with the incessant discharge of fresh gathling guns, which settled into a deafening crash of a general firing all along the line.

It could not be estimated how many men general Calmannia Shoemannia had but nevertheless it seemed evident that Shoemannia was throwing forward about one quarter of his whole division for the searchlights of the christians showed that the line of desperate attack was about six miles long, and that the line was assaulting every point of the christian line almost simultaneously, and that most of the assailants were the fierce Mc-Hollestinians, and that the Turnamunians were being held in reserve. The firing was so wild now that nothing else could be heard in such a wild confusion of sounds.

captured himself came back into christian possession and so the christians had recaptured the most annihilating fighting all the ground they had lost

In the meantime during the great battle of Liebhurg Landing or Tataria, especially in the later part of the battle a great explosion of some unknown origin occurred among a large portion of the enemy lines and though it cannot be said how many the blast killed it nevertheless was one of the most marvellous and tremendous explosions the world itself ever heard of. It was positive however that scores of thousands of the glandelinians had been injured and the whole neighborhood of the region of the river was terror stricken and it was believed that the explosion came from a gas mine or a mine loaded with T.M.T. and the shock of the blast caused the collapse of a small section of Norma Catherine. Even the earliest and latest incomplete compilations put the number of injured Glandelinians at sixty six thousand five hundred. The terrific blast happening during the desperate battle so frequently raging hand to hand came without warning, and the flash of the blast itself was so great that it in a peculiar manner spread burns, desolation, and fear among the glandelinians throughout a district of more than ten miles radius from the focus of the explosion. Within two minutes a whole encampment of glandelinians not yet having been engaged in the bloody battle which had been enjoying the scene of distant conflict became a bedlam. Child slaves by scores of thousands who had been forced into trenches to help the foe erect guns ran screaming this way and that crying with the pain of burns and other injuries. Some glandelinians were human in nature than others forgetting similar pains did their best to assuage the tortures of the little child slaves under their charge.

Thousands of glandelinians were even hurt over a mile away from the scene of the explosion. Many of these glandelinians who were ill unlimbering cannons and placing them into positions, others who had been digging trenches, and doing other similar work more than a mile away from the scene of the explosion had their eyes brown fairly blown off and burned off and their hair singed from the far reaching flash and suffered blisters on their faces and other exposed portions of their bodies, and many even suffered severe contusions and bruises, lacerations and broken limbs and eyes ruined or blinded. The millions of pounds of explosives ignited by some mysterious cause during the battle which even the Glandelinian and as well as for engineers were not able to explain tore a huge crater in the ground a mile and a half wide and three hundred feet deep.

As the immense force of the explosion of earth and other debris was blown high up into the air according to witnesses on the Christian side, who saw the explosion even ten miles away from the scene, there was a terrific detonation like a million crashes of thunder going off at once, and which was heard for many scores of miles. This was followed by a most mammoth sheet of flame, which shot thousands of feet into the air and then apparently settled back momentarily to the earth surface extending over districts of ground for a mile around the scene of the great disaster setting foliage and woods and even houses on fire in a few moments.

Rocks and water fronts clear across the immense ten mile wide gorge Run river, the great Norma's Bridge and Jerome's Bridge and other bridges, and hundreds of houses in the southern part of Julio Gallo and a great number of outbuildings within the distance of five or six miles were ignited by the cloud of flame. For the worse part miles of lumber in lumber yards, and bigger river docks loaded with lumber and other materials were ignited and within two hours afterwards the sky a over a river wiley was blackened by the sea of black smoke coming from three of the most immense conflagrations ever known. The flames also could not be extinguished despite the efforts of all the fire fighting apparatus used by the enemy. Not only did the peculiar flames from the explosions flash settled to the ground in a most peculiar manner and around the buildings in the neighborhood, but they had been also blown through windows and doors by the force of the blast setting in a few moments the interior of many hundreds of houses on fire, and the interior of houses not entirely ruined never nevertheless bore mute evidence of the sweep of the flames.

As the flames swept up at the crash of the explosion a portion of one of the fortresses seemed to fairly buckle in and collapse from the concussion, and the munition dumps where the explosion really occurred was left by the conflagration a mass of glowing embers and wreckage. The massive steel girders and beams of one of the leveled fortresses also had given way in many places, and the twisted beams and crushed and powdered concrete gave further evidence of the terrific force of the blast to which they had been subjected by the concussion of the explosion.

Whole rows of the heavy steel beam beams had even been severed by sheets of flames during the conflagration that followed, the fire cutting through them as though they had been made of paper.

At the outbreak of the explosion, instantly pandemonium broke loose through all sections of that glandelinian encampment where the explosion tore through. Thousands of ambulances not sent to the scene of the battle augmented by fleets of baggage wagons and private ambulances with a perfect sea of horses when rushing to the rescue of the victims of the blast.

Even among the generals headquarters of the rebels telephones jangled as thousands of excited glandelinian officers and higher leaders sought information regarding the explosion they had seen and heard so plainly. For more than an hour every wire in possession of the foe was busy with inquiries. Wire alarms and so on from various parts of Norma Catherine brought enemy fire fighting companies into the neighborhood of the raging conflagrations where they first centered their efforts on preventing the spread of the flames to other regions of the city. The conflagration outside the city itself especially near the foe lines made such terrific heat that no one could endure it five hundred feet away and the rolls of smoke was nearly a mile large looking like immense piles of boulders or mushroom on top of one another, and the flames made a weird roar that was appalling.

One of the most seriously injured victims among the glandelinians was Colonel Sebeckler a glandelinian officer of the Engineering Corps. He had just seated himself in his room in his general headquarters to eat his supper when the blast occurred. He was at the table and the chair was lifted from the floor three feet by the concussion and hurled nearly twenty feet across the large room. He, the table, and everything being scattered profusely around the room and a chair went flying through a window knocking ash and all out. He escaped with severe bruises a broken leg, and burns however and all the fur furniture was demolished.

A General was also wounded. His name was Albert Turner, in charge of one of the Grand divisions of the Glandelinians. He was outside on his horse watching the smoke of the distant conflict and he and his horse from the concussion was hurled a hundred and twenty five feet, to an army traveling crane. He too escaped with severe burns and bruises but his horse was killed and badly mangled. Joseph Peters chief engineer officer of the engineering corps was inside general Watson's headquarters when he heard the detonation that shook his house like an earthquake. He ran outside the building fearing that the Christian gunners were shelling the buildings. As he stepped outside the door a sudden sheet of flame from the near approach of the conflagration passed over him burning his hair and eyebrows away.

General Joseph Bedwicker driving a team of horses about a hundred which was pulling a gigantic catapult: gun was passing on a road near the scene when the explosion occurred. He said he heard a terrific noise as if all the fortresses and the city itself was blowing up at once and before he could locate its source felt a severe sting as though he had held his hands and face too close to a hot fire. A few seconds later this officer discovered that his eyebrows were gone, and his many horses had been singed to the hide and the gloss on the cannon and shield scorched off.

Many companies of the glandelinians within two or three miles of the scene of the great explosion startled by the noise of the blast, looked up and saw the cloud of flames and smoke spread in a seconds time toward them. Many ran hoping to keep ahead of the rolling sea of flame, others pulled coats over their heads and shoulders but nevertheless all were painfully burned as the sheet of fire suddenly passed over them. One aged Glandelinian was found a few minutes after the blast, cursing wildly in his home. As his fury passed he told others that he had seen fire and smoke sweeping toward him and believed the judgement day may have arrived. Many of the glandelinians privates and officers, drew comparison between the bale of fire and flames and smoke and tons of debris rushing into the air and the volcanic eruption of Mt. Calverine, which they had seen in eruption. Colonel and Major Hoffmann both brothers James and John told of having seen the lake of flames rolling toward their place where they were staying waiting for to be shifted. They sought refuge in a vault and thus escaped injury. Many officials of the engineering corps asserted after the blast that it was the clarity of the atmosphere that probably prevented such more severe injuries to persons of the foe encampment. Probably had the day been so cloudy, raining and foggy with too much smoke of battle lying close to the ground as it so often does during a battle the injuries would have been much worse. Such an atmospheric condition would have held the cloud of flame closer to the earth and it would have spread with a corresponding greater ferocity, instead of shooting as high as it did. Fortunately that day the air was bright, the sun shining and the wind high.

On account of the explosion more than a hundred glandelinian officers some of them generals had been out, or bruised, and killed, scores of officers narrowly escaped death, and many generals headquarters within the rebel lines were even fired that fatal afternoon when the great underground mine and the munition dumps exploded with a roar that was said to have been heard for more than a hundred miles.....

and captured himself came back into Christian possession and so the Christians and reinforcements most sanguinely fighting all the ground they had lost

It was not exactly known what the munition dumps to themselves contained for the glandelinians not wishing any information getting to the besieging christian lines did not reveal the contents of the big dumps, but the mine itself was believed to contain, dynamite, gun cotton and T.N.T. and the blast was so terrific that it rocked both opposing lines and the whole city of Vivian,iskey, and many towns around frightening everyone and causing considerable damage to houses and trees. The property loss to the glandelinians was placed at one hundred million dollars. Many who had only noticed the sudden trembling and heard the roar mostly thought it was an earthquake taking place. In many of the child slave districts and terror stricken regions terror stricken children dropped to their knees knees and muttered prayers. Twentyfive of the injured officers of whom a majority were lieutenants, and captains were taken to a hospital inside of Vivian,iskey, where one of the glandelinian doctors and his assistants made special arrangements for their care. More of the injured glandelinian officers were rushed to the County hospital and other hospitals in Vivian,iskey, and scores who suffered less severe injuries about the head, face, an and hands, were attended in Vivian,iskey drug stores and the headquarters of army physicians. In some instances officers and even some generals in their headquarters, or in on their horses in the camp my streets or in front of earthworks and intrenchments nearly a mile from the scene of the explosion were burned, the flames filling the air for more than two or three miles about the scene. All the officers of one headquarters building were also injured, and their building caught fire. They were standing on the front veranda of the building watching the distant building when the burning sea of flame swept over them. General Orlando was in the district also when the explosion occurred and helped to attend to many of the victims until army ambulances arrived from practically as many portions of the army encampments as possible. One of the high officers was riding with a party of fellow officers across a portion of the wooden bridge over the wide river, his horse and the horses of his followers were signs alighted by the sheet of flame.

He had heard a most deafening roar and the bridge to him and his companions had seemed to be shaken like the leaf in the wind. He and all of his officers were knocked from their horses, and soldiers in the company streets were running in all directions to see what had happened were shouting a confusion of orders and commands.

Their own hands and faces were burned. The gaseous smoke of powder and other explosives was so strong that the survivors had difficulty in breathing. Very now and then afterwards there was a flash in the air and the sound like the explosion of many pistols at once. The air seemed to be charged with the fumes of exploded shells.

Part of the flooring of the bridge bursted into flames shortly after the wounded officers were picked up by soldiers and ambulance men. One of the guards who was sentry on the bridge said he also saw the explosion.

"First I heard a deafening crash like a world of cannon firing at once, and then I saw a great arch of flame go high into the sky, followed by a thick roll of black and white smoke and debris for hundreds of feet." He said. When the great conflagrations occurred."

Often. Even during war and when in the army it is positive that most fellows never like to own up that they are at first afraid or a slightly afraid when in battle, even though when they do speak up and say: "Oh my no, I'm not afraid, I'm not scared, their teeth are chattering and their faces appear to be pale and white. The night before the outbreak of the battle of Tataria or Bighow Bighow landing when many soldiers and officers, and even the Vivian girls, that is Violet and her sisters were sitting around a large army camp fire if you please, one of the officers started telling probably a scary battle and massacre story. It was sort of gloomy in the wooded country anyway, and it seemed as if enemy soldiers would appear and attack them in ambush any minute. They were glad however that the main force of troops and the encampment was not far away, because general John Clarke's christian encampment, was close by.

"It's funny general John spoke up when the soldier was true through telling his story. The way boys and men like to scare themselves is it not. But any one you would not like to go alone for water right now." "If

"Nobody said anything then and the general laughed.....
"There's something about being in the woods that generally makes people and even soldiers easily scared anyway no matter how brave they are." Said Violet herself while her sisters nodded. "And mostly little things seem much worse. Even people get panic stricken easily by being even lost in a lonely woods when there is nothing really to be scared about. They even generally lose all control over themselves when if they would only set down and figure things out quietly they would find they did not have so much to worry about after all..."

"I remember one time when out spying on the enemy I and my sisters were compelled when pursued by rebel troops on foot and horse, all by ourselves and there were no soldier companions with us either. It was late in the season of last fall and most of the christian encampments and protecting persons were about twenty miles away and our pursuers were gaining closer every minute and even startlingly open fire upon us. I however went alone with my sisters without seeing any one in front. The evening was quite gloomy and it was raining and trying to snow occasionally with the rain. It was really I believe not evening but late in the afternoon let's say about two o'clock and as the storm was gathering it was beginning to get a little dark and a high wind was blowing, and being pursued by foes we were not quite sure where we were going. Suddenly we were chilled to the very bones by hearing suddenly a most horrible series of screeches, a sort of long drawn out wails from whom we knew not. and my sisters stopped so quickly we almost lost out our balance and looked around. It seemed to come from just above us, but there was no one in sight. I can tell you I and my sisters are known to be unusually brave and even reckless, and we care are generally called little dare devils but I tell you that afternoon I certainly did feel queer and so did my sisters and at first we were afraid to proceed any further forward. I remembered stories I and my sisters had heard from many friends of bambas, ghosts with weird shrieks, which generally appear before a death takes place and usually on the eve before a bloody battle is fought.

I and my sisters were not superstitious, but nevertheless it did give us a chill. However gaining courage, and being hard pressed by our pursuers who we dreaded the most we continued on and after a few minutes the series of shrieks came again. This time it was even more blood-curdling than before, and there was something human about it too. Though darkness from the storm was coming it was still light for me and my sisters to see that no one was in sight in front or above us.

We gritted our teeth and went on nevertheless until we had almost reached the top. It was very barren up there, only a pile of jumbled rocks. As we stopped to look around again to see how near our pursuers were a strong gust of wind came and rushed against me, and at the same time a cry similar to the one came again double fold but at a greater distance. Then I realized that my bambas was only the peculiar cry of enemy sentinels with their do by means of a horrifying sounding whistle which they signal to their comrades the whereabouts of their fugitives and the distance they are. We escaped easily from the enemy however but never forgot those our outcries and never wished to hear them again, they sounded so uncanny.

...unwounded himself came back into christian possession and so the christians and recaptured the most annoying fighting all the ground they had lost

"After did I said general vivian. And I believe indeed that the rose work do to it my brave little daughters, and may God bless you all and you in your interprise." "I'll be there."

THE VIVIAN GIRL SPIES AT WORK AGAIN.

"Halt who goes there?" "The sisters were startled at the summons, and at first did not know what to say. They could not cry 'friends' without falsehood, and even 'starring and his companions.' But again Jennie hit upon a ruse. 'We have a warrant from general Johnston Manley, for the prisoners you men arrested this morning.' She said imitating the voice of a boy and are you one of Federal guards?"

"We did not arrest no one and we have no man prisoner who was arrested this morning, and this is not one of Federal guards, and neither is this general Federal's lines." Answered the guard in a surly manner. "Advance and show yourselves." Violet and her sisters did so.

"Oh you are Gerald Starring and your two companions are with you I see," said the guard. "Well I'm surprised at you to not know the way to general Federal's lines better than this. You are near the wrong lines for this is Bicknell's army who is preparing to fortify the heights of Ava Maria. Federal's army is next to this one and a mile west of here." Violet asked directions saying they were indeed lost from being confused by the thunder of exploding shells, and then the guard said: "Show me the summons so that I can see who the man is who is wanted by Manley."

Violet to ally any suspicion that might arise, showed the warrant to the sentry. The guard then called a general officer who happened to be riding near, who on seeing them and the warden's warrant, gave them full directions how to reach Federal's lines, without running the risk of falling into the path of a large force of christian assailants which were at the time attacking Federal's lines. Violet and her sisters fortunately received a pass to Federal's lines, and they then rode westward.

"I hope the real starring boy and his companions are not with Federal," said Violet. "If they are, our mission will be a failure and will end in our destruction. How the sound of firing increased. And look over yonder sisters. The sky seems full of bursting shells, and is clouded with smoke. The whole scene before us is like a conflagration."

"Violet's sisters observed this scene and then Jennie said: 'The starring boys I believe are in general Bicknell's command. We had a close shave at that. We had neared Bicknell's lines without knowing which army it was, and if we had come across those boys there would have been trouble for their suspicious twins.'"

After riding for an hour, and listening to the terrible din of the distant battle, the tents of Federal's command at last appeared in the distance, and far to the front could be seen the oncoming breastworks and cannons all ablaze like a fierce forest fire, and shells exploding above them, and also saw the christian forces coming upon the works like a perfect wave and close in a storm of horrible firing. They saw close by to the section way out of the region of firing the three sentries incessantly pacing back and forth, and being halted by one of the guards violet showed him the pass.

"You are starring and this are your boy companions, so you can pass on," said the guard shouldering the musket again. Feeling relieved, the little girls continued on, but they had to show their warrant, and pass to at least fifty six sentinels, before they were well within the rear of general Federal's active lines.

"Then," Whistled Violet. "How are we going to get out, with all this exciting tumult all around us from battle and explosions, if we are discovered with so many sentries around. We did not know it was so terribly hard. Fifty six sentinels in a line down the road. We are in a tight fix alright. We ought to have brought general John Evans along."

They were now in one of the rear breastworks of the army's position on top of the hill, and here soldiers fully armed swarmed everywhere to take up their position while artillery was being run up close to the works. They received greetings from many of the soldiers, were questioned by others, and teased by the officers who passed.

"Dan

direct me to general Federal's headquarters." "Asked Jones of one of the officers who had teased her and her companions." "Why this is Bicknell's line," exclaimed one of the officers with a

"Such a question. You starring and your companions must be losing us time. Surely you know very well that this is the building right in front of me and that just now he is not to be at the front directing his fighting troops."

"Well we count it fair to tease in return," said violet. "But to be serious, I have a warrant here for a prisoner taken early this morning, who claims to be Santa Claus, or whatever he calls himself, may be a christian boy. Manley ordered us to bring him to him." And she showed it to the glacially cold captain. "..."

He glanced over it carefully, and then led them forward toward the firing lines within fifteen minutes violet and her sisters were riding up before the old Pepper head. It was the first time that they had ever been face to face with the man or "terrible human tornado" as he was called for his fierce campaign he had made against the Abbeismians at the first outbreak of the war. He did resemble some hideous moonshiner and demons combined, and indeed violet and her sisters almost believed that they stood face to face with Lucifer himself, but in the disguise of a human being. He stood exactly six feet five inches, was a heavily built man straight as a stick, pugilistic in his nature and strength, and as ferocious as a human dragon. He wore a uniform that did not make him appear even as a captain, but he was a great general nevertheless, and his handsome and half villainous face was almost hidden in a long black beard, his steel gray eyes seemed to flash fire, and there was continually a sinister, pugnacious expression about his lips which attracted violet and her sisters dreadfully. But they were not afraid.

"Well what do you want?" He said gruffly. "We were sent by Manley. Was violet's hasty answer.

"Well what the hell do you want?" Demanded the general angrily. "What is the damned trouble now?" "Warrant from Manley for the man arrested this morning," said violet imitating the voice of a boy.

"FOR HIS RELEASE! BY CAPTURE AND SATEN NO, NO AND NO!" roared Federal stamping his foot angrily. "What the damnation do you mean by bring me such a message? Get out her of here double quick. What do you mean by coming and bothering me when I'm busy today. I'll kill the damn spy before I release him. To hell what Manley or his whole damn council says. What the hell does he want to release that christian hellhound for?"

anyhow."

Violet and her sisters felt queer indeed before this raving demon but violet summoned up courage and said:

"He you are mistaken your excellency," said the child. "Manley wants to question him about something important. It says so on this warrant."

"Why don't he come here and question him?" roared Federal in a rage. "Every time I get a most important prisoner that fell foul of a king's brother wants to take him as my prize immediately. I'll not give him up. Tell him to go to hell!"

"But Manley will come for him if you do not give him up and if he is here you cannot resist," said violet. "He'll, send him back to you."

"Federal looked at them closely.

"Are you telling me the truth about this?" He demanded.

"If we were to tell lies to you we would not be here," answered violet. "You starring, with your suspicious look strangely unnatural to me. He continued. You boys seem unusually handsome this afternoon. Let me see the god damn warrant."

Violet handed him the warrant, and glancing at the contents he said: "I doubt this just the same. I'll telegraph and find out the facts on this thing."

To begin with violet and her sisters were still safe, for after disguising themselves, they had set out for general Federal's lines, first finding his headquarters, and being ushered into his presence Manley had really heard of the prisoner, and not recognizing violet and her sisters and thinking that violet and the others were really the leading boy scouts of Bicknell's army, sent them to Federal with the warrant. ....

...and captured himself came back into christian possession and so the christians had recaptured the most valuable fighting all the ground they had lost fortunately there was no need of raising an alarm as the officers and the guards and the guards, may even the men of the army had seen the flames before violet and her sisters or Evans had, and thousands of men on horseback galloped up with their fire apparatus.

"At it boys," cried Evans. "I'll take the lead. It's exceedingly dangerous but we have got to stop it no matter what the cost."

The men were immediately deployed here and there in a long line, all with wet blankets, swabs, and heavy and covered bags and coats, and the battle against the flames began desperately the men working frantically and with all their own energy. The men with axes and saws worked like mad cutting down grass far in advance of the conflagration and hauling it away, the men with the axes soaked continually with water beat down the tongues of flame, and there was a confusion of commands, a reinforcing wherever the fire threatened to advance ahead and overlap the fighters, and the noise of shovels and spades as other men threw a storm of earth and gravel upon the conflagration. Men dropped by scores overcome by the staccato smoke and terrific heat, and yet the conflagration only held its own.

Violet and her sisters looked on with excitement, awe and fear, giving cries of warning, whenever when ever the fire darted ahead of the men who noticed it not but nevertheless they were being swiftly driven back by the fire wave. It was indeed a stirring scene. No men dropped from suffocation and heat, and though more and more went in until a solid front was presented to the fire, the fury of the flames and the terrific heat, drove them steadily back. It even jumped the wide spaces made by the men cutting down the grass, and started to leap ahead with a fury that nothing could stem. If it could not be checked the whole stretch of forests surrounding the region would smolder itself into hell. Four men were caught unawares and badly burned, and Evans narrowly escaped falling into a trap line. At some points the men were advancing on the flames now, but at other points it was still steadily driving them to the rear.

"Some of those beautiful glandolinian firebugs did this," said Evans as he came up to the little girls who were trembling with awe and excitement. "I could not have started of it self by no means whatever."

It took fully four hours that evening before the hundred thousand men fighting the conflagration was under control and put out entirely. That evening Violet and her sisters were awakened before general yvian, who sent them to general hanson, who then found sitting with kindredline, and roswell puster johnston at a table in his headquarters at Norma roseanna or Evangeline Granda, and where the full assemblage of the glandolinian members were also present. General hanson returned their salute with looks of love, kindredline with an approving one, and roswell puster johnston with a pleasant but pleading gaze and the words:

"How would you little girls like to go toward Evangeline Granda and learn the exact strength of the enemys position, the number of the force and the position, of their batteries and the number of guns they have."

When violet and her sisters grasped the full sense of this serious question they waited a moment for breath and then violet answered dully:

"We should be delight sir if general yvian and our uncle do not object."

"They don't," answered roswell. "It is almost absolutely necessary that we have information more reliable than the reports we are getting from loyal glandolinian inhabitants, for no two of these reports agree. There is a method just now by which almost detectives can enter manleys lines without difficulty, and without arousing suspicion there. This method requires that six children alone can possibly play the part. I am told that you little girls have the abilities. The gemini have told us so."

Violet and her sisters were told that they were to be sent to the island.

"Here," said roswell handing violet a sealed missive which he took from the table. "Is a letter from general manley who is somewhere up the line to Granda, which he had sent to general federal at Hurecman. The glandolinian messenger who carried has fallen into our hands. It was a careless messenger who carried but we were able to open and read it without causing to be broken or torn. You little girls are to impersonate the messenger, carry the letter to general federal, get the information we want and send it in a way I shall tell you of--for you will probably be kept in the enemys lines, and any failure in your own attempt might keep your information from reaching us. After that you little girls may best escape when you can. You understand that you are to report to me or any of the other christian commanders, but if you find this impossible then this report christians had captured themselves back into christian possession and so the most sanguinary fighting all the ground they had lost to be put to the test that your bodies will doubtless undergo in the back from the enemy....."

The understand."

General manleys message does not contain any description of the bearer so how many by eye are sent to him or by in I mean, but merely tells federal to enroll a new general called Phyllis Thorne into the service as a commander in chief, you little girls may assume what characters that please you children best..... The messenger was a little glandolinian boy scout with five companions, dressed as you do in disguise yourselves. So it may be well to pretend that character, wearing boy scout uniforms and disguises as will deceive the enemy. As general yvian tells me and so the do the gemini you little girls "now enough" of you Granda and the intervening country, from description to answer "now enough" if the glandolinians should question you little girls, about it sit over yonder and read this letter from general yvian must to me, and this copy of general manleys letter to federal..... They will let you know how matters were and are at Evans getting Granda, and with general manley the six boy messengers left....."

Violet and her sisters glanced down at the papers pushed toward them, and roswell's instructions which continued while the speaker now and then, settled down a word or two on a piece of paper....

"You little girls will leave this camp with these passes on the side northwest of the town of glandolinian, so it may appear that you are going to reconnoiter the woodlands, for of course your destinations must be a secret, lest some information of the enemys night follow and expose you. You will go around the enemys extreme lines and reach the fortifications of Evangeline Granda by night. The letter one of you will carry with you all admitted without delay. Once within the big fort for fortifications obtain the information you are best able to do. But it is in writing if possible, and take it to a little girl whom you little girls know by the name of Angelina Aronburg, but who calls herself by the glandolinian name of Gertrude Angelina, and when you meet this girl glandolinian member if no one else is about whistle the famous American hymn "The Star Spangled Banner"..... Do you know the tune...?"

Violet and her sisters who had heard it a thousand times softly whistled the softening part or opening part, in chorus. Roswell the supreme christian general nodded and went on:

"If you look at her in just a manner as to show that the time is a signal she will soon come to an understanding with you. You will ask her in my name to take your written message in a boat tonight alone to the plains beyond the broad valley on this side of the glandolinian mountains, near the foot of Mt. Jordan..... There she will whistle the second verse of "The Star Spangled Banner", and will be answered in words of the Third verse by a man whom I shall have in waiting there. She will give him the message and afterwards report to you little girls. When you are sure the information is safe in that sense lands you may escape and report to any christian general you may happen to meet. I have made some notes here, that you little girls will fix in mind before you start, but destroy that paper and my passes as soon as you are clear of the camp so you will carry no papers to federal other than general manleys letter."

Violet took the sheet handed to her and read the words while her sisters grouped around her.

5 "Strength of glandolinian batteries in serial numbers -- numbers of men in each division -- Gertrude Angelina -- Star Spangled Banner -- boat -- to night -- lands this side of glandolinian mountains near Ava Maria Heights, or Mt. Jordan....."

While the three great christian generals and the Gemini disguised in low tones at the other end of the table, violet and her sisters memorized every circumstance mentioned in the letters of general yvian, manley, and hanson. They then, and being noticed by general roswell johnston returned those two letters, and took their leave retaining manleys letter and the Pass. The little girls were followed from the rear by the body of general kindredline and hanson and the other christian generals while the Gemini bowed their respective..... It was now about nightfall. Violet and her sisters returned to their own quarters, changed their attire, took from their pockets whatever might betray them, and saw with realization that their clothes no longer bore any striking evidence of their hazardous trips through recent forest fires, though at a distance they did already see a great fire raging which was lighting the sky as brightly as at twilight. The glow seen for three hundred miles away from the conflagration.... They assumed themselves for the thousandth time that the miniature was still in its hiding place, ate a hasty but not unduly sumptuous supper, called Evans aside, and told him to accompany them, and the seven were going. Violet and her sisters tore up their passes as soon as they had been honored at last by the citizen's picket, for in their zeal to respect their commanders, every wish they were determined to make a wide detour in rounding the camp that they could not possibly case near another Christian man sentry.

The night had come on when they strode finally between Hanley's angle line lines and the frowning city of fortifications on a hill called Evangeline Grania which was under a fearful siege. Skulking past glider taverns, giving a wide berth to every farm house of suburban residence that might shelter Glandelinian sharpshooters on the lookout for spies, or attacking Christian soldiers, they were soon within Federal lines being challenged at some distance by a sentry on the plain. Their prompt account of themselves got them speedily through the lines, and soon a guard officer was escorting them to general Federal who sat in a room on a level of the floor holding vigil with his officers. Violet and her sisters again faced him across a table on which a candlebra writing materials and a great mass was a of papers was a large ball standing on a small box. He not recognizing them as the same boys who appeared before him before read Hanley's letter in silence then scrutinized Violet and her sisters and Evans with gray eyes as hard as granite and asked them with a store of harsh questions to which each of the little girls replied with quite readiness, and a steady return of looks. Never had Violet and her sisters saw this great Glandelinian general smile yet. Always that horrible scowl and frown mixed slightly with a little melancholy. The questions questions were all on matters covered by the letter which Violet and her sisters could so easily see the sagacious Glandelinian chief commander did not suspect of having been opened still. The answers of the little girls evidently convinced the great general that the letter had not changed bearers since leaving general Hanley's hands. Presently he asked:

"What are your names boys?"
At last it seemed as if they would be discovered in because they felt they could not tell any falsehoods under any conditions, but a hurried call from one of Federal's staff caused the general to immediately leave the room followed by his officers and the little girls were left entirely alone. While there was no one in the room now Violet and her sisters hastily scanned the papers on the table. They saw that most of them were lists of provisions, and fallen soldiers in the last few battles around Evangeline Grania and of trivial consequences. The next bunch turned out to be a state list of arms needed to complete the full equipment of a certain militia company. They turned their eyes with diminishing hopes to the third and last. This is what they saw, and which Violet and her sisters copied at once to make it quicker each taking different portions of the lists and with trembling fingers....

"In half besieged army at Evangeline Grania December 7th 1912.
1,700,000 Royal Fusiliers.
3,930,230 Royal Marines.

Twenty two artillery and small pieces.
One hundred thousand big guns.
Three hundred thirty three thousand, three hundred and thirty three machine guns.
Nine million, three hundred thirty thousand, five hundred Gargolian Militia.
Nine million, five hundred forty three thousand, five four three Gargolian Guards.
Nine million four hundred thousand Gargolianians.
Four hundred thousand Kurds.
Ten million, nine hundred forty four thousand, six hundred six six Mc-Hollisthians.
Nine million, four hundred twenty two, six hundred sixty Zborovians.

Christian had captured himself came back into Christian possession and so the Christians had recaptured the most sacred of all the ground they had lost and, nine hundred eighty four thousand, nine hundred ninety six five million Americanians.

five million on, dragons, cavalry, lancers, battalions on horseback black, and Caribbees.
three million Artificers.
Three hundred thousand Glandelinian special militia.
Five hundred forty four thousand, five four three Gargolianians.
Three hundred sixty six thousand, four hundred marines.....

Total of all.....167,643,796.

The copy of this return found just as defectively figured here in this sheet deluged with sand in the impetuosity of Violet and her sisters to dry the ink followed the artillery ascent to concealment, and Violet casting a glance at her sisters beckoned to them to follow, and out they went just as Federal appeared in the room. Violet and her sisters had also made a collection of valuable orders and papers which Federal did not miss until Violet and her sisters had cleverly fulfilled fullfilled their mission giving the most important papers to Gortude and doing as commanded. Then Glandelinians set out after them each party having four bloodhounds with them. The result was organized too late however, for Violet and her sisters had softly reached the Christian lines. General Hanson joined them and received the papers from little Gortude Angeline and finding the signature correctly added it all up. Federal himself was in a rage well worth witnessing if any one could stand to see the rage of a man so bullheaded as this Glandelinian general was. He realized who the supposed boys and the men with them were and reported the case immediately to general Hanley who had during the day placed staring and his companions under a cross examination but finding from many testbookies from many officers and men that Starring and his two companions had never left the lines or ventured near Federal's lines that day or before. Federal had also discovered during there's call that twenty of the men were missing, and had reported this to Hanley.

Hanley studied patiently on the matter and soon was convinced that his lines had been twice visited by Violet and her sisters, and that they had made away with Federal's most important papers, learned the strength of Hanley's whole army, and rescued the prisoner Gortude Angeline. He determined to lay hold of Violet and her sisters under any conditions, and once he had them in his power---well, they would wish they had never been born. He was not going to stand for their nonsense any longer. They had troubled him so often already that he was fairly wild. He would get revenge, and terrible revenge. To think of being outwitted twice so cleverly by the Vivian Girls was humiliating.....

Toward the earliest part of the morning the Christian generals decided to resume the onslaughts against the enemy's lines, and to begin it first with a tremendous artillery duel. This time it was evident to all the Christian generals that the series of struggles would be more general than the ones before, and it was also evident that the battle would be worse but none of them really realized how horrible the struggle was really going to be.....

Violet and her sisters were requested by general Hanson and his brother to keep out of the way of the terrible engagement, for there was too much danger for them during a battle and there was never so telling what would happen to them if they were to get too near the firing lines....

Preparations were made. Artillery was placed into a new position during the night, and hasty preparations were being made for the starting conflict and general Hanson rode back and forth with the officers commanding the artillery men to make every shot hit the mark.

"We must carry those heights to day or never." Said general Hanson.
"We can't too if we only try. No matter must be captured so that the seaports can be all opened once again....."

...OF THE INVASION, ON THEIR WAY BACK TO GALVERINIA, THROUGH GLANDERINIA AND ANGELINIA, SAW SOMETHING OF THE WAR. PREPARATIONS TO FIGHT THE SUFFERING VICTIMS OF THE WAR. GLANDERINIAN JUSTLY PUNISHED. PREPARATIONS TO FIGHT THE VICTIMS OF THE WAR. ANGELIAN VICTIMS OF THE WAR ARE FIGHTING AT LARGE. THE PROBLEM OF OVERCOMING THE GLANDERINIAN AGENTS WITHIN GALVERINIA.

The story power in glanderlinia broken at last. Think of it. After 7 months, and seven months of the bloodiest war that had ever raged in the Angelinian world, and it was a surprise to all the nations of that Christian world, and it could never be described the deliberations throughout the nations of the world. Over the successful ending of the invasion there could be found no happier than Violet and her sisters. They could not suppress their excitement for over a week, during the beginning of the march of most of the armies northward, but the results of the war was the most important to know off despite the fact that the soldiers cleared a thousandfold. The invasion of glanderlinia in the year of 1912 twelve, ended as a most disastrous christian defeat and overthrow. But the results of the second invasion resulted as the most important christian victory in the war, a victory that surprised and start led the world, and gave better oath unknown to the many christian armies left behind in Galverinia to keep the glanderlinian armies still there in their places. Hillmanburg Zimmerman and the other main greatest christian generals had kept hovering at the main gates of the enemy's country until reduced to fragments the armies of the whole country in glanderlinia alone especially had yielded under the hammering blows which had been delivered without a days pause or intermission. The glanderlinian armies who had so pugnaciously opposed the christian invasion had been whipped throughout, and most disastrously, and the results were most astounding, and flabbergasted Abbeonnia herself. The success of the invasion caused the sudden freedom of millions of child slaves that were held in glanderlinia, caused the very id islands which had belonged to glanderlinia and other islands to fall in the possession of the christian nation who were fighting so desperately to overthrow the greatest of rebellions. It was also the purpose of the Abbeonnians to take complete possession of the state of glanderlinia called No-Hollistinia and form it as properly to Angelinia to which it rightly belonged, and this determination had been all under way, and so the ransom the most of the christian armies were not being withdrawn so quickly as expected. Throughout the whole war up to now the wicked glanderlinians had retained their child slaves, and only when their invasion of Galverinia itself would be crushed would all child slavery still as existing there cease. Again I must not say the results of the invasion was indeed splendid. It resulted in the reopening of all the christian ports, and also of the recovery of the Bleng Islandman Islands as well as the Boyking, which for nearly four years had been under glanderlinian rule and possession. Glanderlinia had tried to prove herself stronger than Angelinia, and there is no doubt that the results would have been sad indeed, if Abyssinkile had not held out, and if Abbeonnia had not broken through the Abyssinkilian border and overthrown the impregnable foe armies before them along the border, before the fall of No-Whither and Julio Callio. The success of the christians in this great war in the great invasion also resulted in the capture of many of the wicked Glanderlinian chieftains who had been so guilty of so many lives snuffed out, especially of innocent children, and those who were still at large were to be speedily run down like dogs and treated like the rest.

In case now she should win or lose the war with the fall of her armies still in Galverinia, and glanderlinia was overthrown, in order to obtain the peace she would desire and keep her freedom, glanderlinia had a bookfull of deeds that must be atoned for, for the sore and sore wounds committed by the glanderlinian generals during the earliest and latest parts of the war before invasion. Also for the massacres of children and also for the child slaughter which had caused the outbreak of the war. Most of the orphaned young had been out of governor general Hanson's pockets and this was also to be atoned for by the foe, for those buildings had been destroyed by the foe. It was stated that the foe in glanderlinia were down on their backs and had been crushed in repelling the invasion made by the christian soldiers, but nevertheless with her armies still intact in Galverinia, she was still defiant, the war was still raging furiously elsewhere, and the glanderlinian governments in Galverinia despite the overthrow in glanderlinia already known had defied the Abbeonnians to take possession of the country. Thus the reason of the intention of the Abbeonnian government to take possession of the state of No-Hollistinia.

...had captured himself some back into christian possession and so the christians had recaptured the most beautiful fighting all the ground they had lost

Though the war was really overall the glanderlinian seaports were still blockaded, as it was the purpose of watching so that none of the fugitives would escape from the country by sea. Such preparations were made to run down these fugitives, that Violet and her sisters who were with Evans still were frequently now were startled when later they learned that all fugitives had been overtaken and were arrested within a short time, and were being sent off to share the fate of others. The glanderlinian generals whose good behavior to Violet and her sisters, and who allowed no massacre of children, had been arrested during the sudden down fall of the glanderlinian armies, such as Ricknell, Donald Aurandao, Chocummin, Adelo-degarbe, and so on down to Acocutinn, and Josephine remain, but they were tried fairly, and all the testimony about them by witnesses speedily got them their freedom as they were proven not enemies of god though they fought Angelinia, and that they had been more greater friends of the vivian girls than they showed. Ambrose Fuller was found guilty of persecutions however, and though the witnesses declared that by a friendly deed he had become their friend, the government decreed this:

"It is true that he did so after they saved him on one occasion, but on the list of children slain in war, his name if listed with those generals who caused it, and his punishment can only be prevented by having him brought before the Vivian girls, and governor general Vivian, or Ambrose Evans. If they allow him to be set free then the matter is dropped. He was brought before the little girls. They forgave him readily and willingly but general Evans decreed punishment despite all their pleas, and Ambrose Fuller was sentenced to the Bell-Jell-Pell-Jell penitentiary for the space of three years and one half at hard labor, to help rebuild the ruins without pay.

"I don't care what they did to you little girls or how good they had behaved," was his rejoinder. "When found guilty of the slaughter of children during the war, or found guilty of not suppressing their men from it nothing can save them from such punishment as I or the government decrees. But as he was your friend I'll lessen it somewhat and allow him his freedom within three years and six months. But nothing else. And so do not approach the subject again as it is foolish."

As soon as it was confirmed that all the fugitives had been captured and arrested, the order for the blockades to be lifted was sent in everywhere by wireless, and then general Hanson who had brought his returned armies into Abbeonnia and had then speedily mastered out ordered Evans and general Vivian to follow and master their armies out. The rest however were to stay for a year until everything was settled.

And surely now Violet and her sisters, with the other two great christian armies were also homeward bound. Soon again they would see their own beloved mother and Aunt, and also their two brothers who had also gotten word to return home, as other generals would be put in their place. Violet and her sisters felt happy indeed, as they with Evans, and the three other generals with their armies were prepared for the march northward. General Vivian was advised by Evans to go on ahead of the armies and take his daughters with him, but he decided to bring the armies, declaring that there was plenty of time to get to Abbeonnia and that he would sooner entrain somewhere else so as to bring the armies into Abbeonnia quicker and get them mastered out.

However Violet and her sisters, and Evans were the first to board a train, and soon they were speeding northward, for Angelinia. It was a most delightful ride for the little girls, and as they watched the scenery they indeed remembered it all. The train however in going through Galverinia, did not as any night pass within the regions of the ruins, for the engineer as directed by Evans did not wish to ruin through the devastated districts for fear of bringing sad memories to Violet and her sisters once more. So after about ten days riding day and night the Abbeonnian city Pandora the capital was reached, the very place where Violet and her sisters had formerly lived before the war, and where they had their little Bleng Islandman serpent which they had been forced to leave behind and which they had seen once, a great and huge creature by now. General Hanson with all the generals who had followed him was in the same old home, and so this Violet and her sisters were led by the good old guardian Evans. Three days later general Vivian arrived, and later on the two Holy Gently women, and then arrived the two brothers.

After being absent from home for some months Violet and her sisters were back once more, and how happy they felt it could not be described. But the little girls were known throughout the nation, and it cannot be described how the little girls were for three weeks straight incessantly welcomed by men women and old children, who carried and paraded them through the streets on their arms.
